It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

THE RIGHT HON.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

SPAIN—THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR.

MARCH, 14, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL (in reply to some questions put by Mr. Sheil, as to whether the Earl of Aberdeen had written to Madrid, expressing his concurrence in the proceedings of the French government, in reference to the course it had pursued with regard to the presentation of M. Salvandy's credentials, and whether, if the noble earl had acted in that manner, he had afterwards expressed any different opinion) stated that he cordially concurred with the right hon. gentleman, in lamenting that any necessity should arise for making reference in that House to debates and discussions in popular assemblies in other countries. In order that he might properly explain the course pursued by the British government, with respect to the matter alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, it would be necessary for him to enter a little into detail. Whatever opinion the government might have entertained or expressed on the subject, it had not had the slightest practical influence on the course pursued by the Spanish government with reference to M. Salvandy. That government had taken its course on its own sense of duty before the opinion of the British government was received at Madrid. The question was then disposed of, and therefore the expression of the opinion of the British government had had no practical bearing on it. M. Salvandy, the French ambassador at Madrid, was accredited by the King of the French to Queen Isabel. The British government heard with great regret that, at a critical period, a difference of opinion was likely to arise between the governments of France and Spain, that might lead to the interruption of all diplomatic intercourse. The British government, therefore, felt it to be their duty, actuated by a sincere feeling of interest in the affairs of Spain, to tender their advice to the Spanish government with respect to that possible cause of difference. There had recently been in Spain an attempt on the palace of the Queen—an attempt to seize her Majesty's person. There had been considerable excitement and disturbance in some of the provinces of Spain. The sense—the deliberate sense, in his opinion—of the people of Spain, was in favour of the existing government, and this had given energy to the government, and enabled them entirely to suppress those attempts. The British government, however, thought it would be unfortunate for Spain if, shortly after this excitement, the diplomatic intercourse between France and Spain should be suspended. The British government had very recently made proposals to the northern courts, particularly to Austria, earnestly recommending that they should recognise the existing government of Spain, for the purpose of giving stability to that government, and, through that, to encourage the people to apply themselves to those pursuits of industry and ordinary occupations of life, for which a state of tranquillity was so favourable; and the British government entertained serious apprehensions that if there should be, on the ground on which they feared it might take place, an interruption of the diplomatic relations between France and Spain, their efforts to procure the recognition of the existing government might fail. The British government, therefore, expressed an opinion to the government of Spain, that it might be possible to reconcile this difference. The question arose on the 59th article of the constitution, which declared that the regent should exercise all the authority of king, in whose name the acts of government should be published. The British government suggested to the government of Spain, that it might be possible that an arrangement of the following nature should be made, which should reserve to the regent of Spain the whole of the authority which that constitution intended to devolve on him, and yet respect the royal dignity in a matter which the British government thought right to consider one of ceremony and etiquette rather than of a substantial character. The British government, therefore, suggested an arrangement of this nature:—M. Salvandy being accredited to the queen, and not to the regent, the British government proposed that the letters, of which M. Salvandy was the bearer, should be delivered to the queen in the presence of the regent; but that any act of authority connected with the reply to those letters should be performed by the regent, and that any answer delivered in the name of the queen should be delivered by the regent. The course thus suggested was somewhat similar to that pursued in the cases of Greece and of Brazil, when the sovereigns were minors. In the case of Greece, letters of credence were delivered to the infant sovereign in the presence of the regent, and handed by the king to the regent. In the case of Brazil, the regent issued a decree, requiring the letters of credence of foreign ambassadors to be delivered to him in the absence of the king. This assumption on his part was resisted by the courts which had accredited ministers to Brazil, and an arrangement was made, by which, in that case, the letters were delivered to the regent in the presence of the king. But before the advice tendered by the British government could be received by the Spanish government, the latter acted on their own construction of the constitution of Spain. He believed that, in giving that construction to the article of the constitution, they acted with perfect sincerity. The government, and he believed the Cortes, resolved, that it was inconsistent with the constitution that the queen should receive the letters of credence, and even that acts of ceremony should be performed by the regent. The British government never questioned the perfect right of the Spanish government to place its own construction on the constitution; and, as he had before stated, the Spanish government had given its construction and acted upon it, before the advice of the British government had reached Madrid. The British government had suggested a different construction of the article of the constitution, solely from a sincere desire to promote the welfare of Spain, and because they were apprehensive of those results which had subsequently taken place; but they never questioned the perfect right of the Spanish government and authorities to decide the question for themselves. They were the supreme authority on the point, and the advice of the British government was offered before the construction of the article of the constitution by the Spanish authorities was known. With the construction given by them to their own constitution no other party had a right to quarrel; but the opinion of the British government had never changed on this subject. He knew not on what authority the right hon. gentleman opposite said, that Senor Gonzales had stated that there had been a change in the opinion expressed by the British government with respect to the construction of the article, that the act of ceremony on receiving the credentials might be performed by the queen. This was the suggestion offered by the British government, in ignorance of the interpretation that might have been put on it by the Spanish authorities, and the report—a newspaper report, he believed, of an allegation said to be made by Senor Gonzales, that the opinion of the British government had undergone a change, was without foundation and incorrect. Having given this answer to the right hon. gentleman, and admitting that he had drawn a just distinction with reference to his question, he trusted that the House would in future abstain, as far as possible, from referring to what transpired in angry debates either in the Cortes or the Chamber of Deputies; for nothing had a greater tendency to excite constant recriminations.

After a short conversation the subject dropped.

CORN BILL.—BURDENS ON LAND.

MARCH, 14, 1842.

The order of the day was read for the House to go into committee on the Corn-importation bill. On the question being put, that the Speaker do now leave the chair, Mr. Ward proposed the following motion:—"That a select committee be appointed, to inquire whether there are any peculiar burdens that specially affect the landed interest of this country, or any exemptions enjoyed by that interest, and to ascertain their nature and extent."

SIR R. PEEL: I wish, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the time at which, and the circumstances under which, the motion of the hon. gentleman opposite is made. This is, I believe, the fourteenth night, we have been kept in discussion upon the Corn-law, and as yet we have not been allowed to go into committee. There are some hon. members on the opposite side of the House who differ from this bill, who object to the principles of this bill, who are adverse to the details of this bill, and yet who—seeing the large majorities by which it has been affirmed in this House, and considering that the sense of the House has been fairly and fully taken,—considering, also, that the trade of the country in general, and the corn-trade in particular, is affected and embarrassed by continual delay—seeing, also, that this bill is admitted to be a great improvement of the law, seeing that it is admitted to be a considerable mitigation of the existing evils, derived from the present state of the law—have come to the conclusion, consistently and most wisely as I think, that the sense of the House having been so unequivocally manifested, the sooner the advantages of the bill are reaped the better. The question for them to consider is, whether there be any prospect of overruling the sense of the majority of this House, and if there be not, whether, upon a comparison of evils and advantages, it is wise to go on with a protracted, and in the end, useless discussion. The hon. member had the whole of last session to consider his proposal: he knew the Corn-law must come under discussion, he had full and ample opportunity for proposing his committee, yet he permits us to have thirteen nights of discussion, five of which were upon a subject identical with the present—the preference of an absolute repeal over the proposal of the government—and yet, on the fourteenth night, the hon. gentleman comes forward and proposes, that the whole proceeding on the Corn-law be suspended, until his committee shall have made their report. What I call upon the hon. gentleman to do is, to adhere to his own notice. The object of giving these notices was not to mislead. The object is to instruct the House, and to inform it of the nature of the motion which it is intended to bring forward. But here the hon. gentleman, who has been spending his time in ransacking hustings speeches—who has been looking over all the debates of 1834, after thirteen nights of debate, with the country expecting that the House will at last decide what is to be the law regulating the importation—here the hon. gentleman comes down and occupies our time, not with reference to the existing debate, but with a recitation and comparison of all that the Duke of Buckingham has said, all that I have said, and all that other persons have said, in the year 1834. And this, the hon. gentleman thinks, will satisfy the impatience of the country! This, he thinks, will afford a gratification to the people, who are anxious to have the question settled and the law determined! He satisfies the country and gratifies the people, not by discussing the question properly before the House, but by leisurely reviewing the proceedings which took place six or seven years ago. I ask the hon. gentleman, who has given so much time and attention to this subject, at least to make up his mind as to what his motion shall be. I came down to the house to-night, expecting that he would, at all events, adhere to the motion of which he had given notice. That notice of motion, no doubt, is a perfectly legitimate and fair one. It was in these terms:—"On the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair to go into committee on the Corn-importation bill, to move, That it is inexpedient to impose any duty upon the importation of foreign corn, until this House shall have inquired whether there are any special burdens peculiarly affecting the landed interest of this country, or any special exemptions enjoyed by that interest, and shall have ascertained their nature and extent."

According to that motion, the issue fairly brought before us is this—shall the Corn-importation bill be postponed till this committee which the hon. gentleman would appoint shall have concluded its inquiries and made its report? I ask the hon. gentleman to stand by his own notice, and bring that question to issue. I ask him to claim leave of the House to withdraw the motion with which he concluded his speech, and adhere to that of which he gave notice. Let me understand, as I have a right to understand, whether the House of Commons is now of opinion that the Corn-importation bill shall be pursued to its completion, or whether it shall be suspended indefinitely, until the hon. gentleman's committee shall have reported. I ask the noble lord who sits on the hon. gentleman's right hand, whether it be not consistent with the usages of parliament, that I should ask the hon. gentleman to adhere to the motion of which notice was given upon the paper? The hon. gentleman originally gave notice for the appointment of a committee. It was competent to him to renew that notice. But, instead of doing so, he alters the terms of his motion, and expressly joins issue with me, as to whether I will assent to the appointment of a committee, or take the sense of the House upon the question, that no Corn-law shall pass until a committee of inquiry shall have reported as to the existence or non-existence of any special burdens upon the land. I say that, consistently with fairness, and with all the usages of parliament, he ought to bring forward the motion of which he gave notice. He had ample time to consider his course, and determine what it should be before he placed his notice upon the order paper. It is something perfectly novel for the hon. gentleman to give a specific notice of motion—not to offer one word of intimation to those opposite to him of his intention to change that motion—to make the whole of his speech without saying that he had altered his mind, and then, at the close of a long address, quietly to put into the hands of the Speaker, not the motion which the House, from his notice, expected from him, but another motion of a very different character. I will not now stop to inquire whether, in this stage of our proceedings, it is fitting or not that a committee should be appointed to consider this question. But this I say, that I for one will not consent to a suspension of the Corn-importation bill until such a committee shall have been appointed, and have made its report. I separate the question of the fitness or unfitness of appointing a committee, from the question of whether this bill shall be suspended or not suspended. The appointment of a committee, considered by itself, may be proper or not proper, but I maintain it is not proper if adopted for the purpose of suspending this bill. Depend upon it, you will not carry public opinion and public favour with you, in the attempt to pursue this course of obstruction and delay. You knew last session of the intention of the government to deal with this question. I never taunted the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) for not stating exactly what were the burdens upon the land which he regarded as a justification of his proposal for placing a fixed duty of 8s. upon the importation of foreign corn. What I said was this, that the noble lord would labour under the same difficulty as I did, in specifying the exact amount of burden upon the land, in consideration of which he proposed to give a protection of 8s. I was challenged to show why a maximum of 20s. was necessary to protect the landed interest. I said, that that objection would apply with equal force to any specific amount of protection that might be proposed, whether fixed or graduated. I rested the claims of the land to protection, not upon its peculiar burdens alone, but upon other grounds. I said, that protection to the produce of the soil had been afforded for the last 150 years—that large capital had been invested on land under that system of protection—and that nothing, therefore, in my opinion, could be more unwise, than to risk the disturbance of the interests embarked in agriculture, by the sudden withdrawal of the protection which had so long been afforded to them, under which the existing relations of society had, in a great degree, been formed, and in reliance upon which, so much wealth had been directed to the cultivation of the soil. You have a perfect right to differ from me in that view, and to tell me, that my opinions are mistaken. I said, that another ground for affording protection was, to insure the cultivation of the land, and such a growth of domestic produce, as should prevent the risk, the imminent risk, as I thought, if all protection were discontinued, of placing the country in a position of entire, unqualified dependence upon foreign countries for a supply of corn. To make insurance against such a calamity, I said, I thought it necessary to continue protection to a certain extent to our domestic agriculture.

I said, also, that I firmly believe, that there are special and peculiar burdens affecting the land, as compared with the other great interests of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward) scoffs at the notion of tithes being a burden upon the land, and expresses his astonishment, that any man on this side of the House should be weak and absurd enough to suppose, that tithes have really anything to do with the burdens borne by the landed interest. The hon. gentleman may be a very great authority upon matters of political economy, but I must observe, that there are others, nearly equal to him, perhaps, who have entertained a very different opinion upon this question of tithes and their relation to the land. They wrote, perhaps, in times comparatively barbarous, and their names, perhaps, may not be so eminent as that of the hon. member; but Adam Smith, for one, expressly declares, that he regards tithes as constituting a burden upon the land. The superior intelligence of the hon. gentleman may induce him to discard the notion, and to discard it with contempt; but Adam Smith was certainly weak enough to look upon tithes as a burden upon the soil. Adam Smith expresses himself in these words:—"Taxes upon the produce of land are, in reality, taxes upon the rent; and, though they may be originally advanced by the farmer, are finally paid by the landlord. When a certain portion of the produce is to be paid away for a tax, the farmer computes, as well as he can, what the value of this portion is, one year with another, likely to amount to; and he makes a proportionable abatement in the rent which he agrees to pay to the landlord. There is no farmer who does not compute beforehand what the church tithes, which is a land-tax of this kind, is, one year with another, likely to amount to."

But the hon. gentleman says—"There has been a commutation of tithes of late years, which alters the whole question, because formerly, the amount of tithe was uncertain, and varying from year to year, according to the quantity of produce, whereas, it is now comparatively fixed and certain: therefore, whatever the opinion in former times may have been, it is now clear, that tithes no longer constitute a burden upon the land."

It may be so, but Adam Smith differs from the hon. gentleman upon this point also, for Adam Smith distinctly says:—"When, instead either of a certain portion of the produce of the land, or of the price of a certain portion, a certain sum of money is to be paid, in full compensation for all tax or tithe, the tax becomes, in this case, exactly of the same nature with the land-tax of England. It neither rises nor falls with the rent of the land. It neither encourages nor discourages improvement. The tithe, in the greater part of those parishes which pay what is called a modus in lieu of all other tithe, is a tax of this kind."

I must say, when in any country you throw the whole burden, or the great part of the burden, of maintaining the Established Church, upon the land, if you collect that burden by an uncertain rate, varying with the produce of the soil, it acts, no doubt, as a greater discouragement to agriculture, than if it were commuted to a modus or fixed sum. It is clear that the commutation of such an uncertain tax as tithe, into a fixed and definite sum, must operate as a great benefit to the land—a great encouragement to the improved cultivation of the soil, and an increased stimulant to the application of capital to the purposes of agriculture. I do not deny that; but I say, that Adam Smith and Mr. Ricardo, both of them, distinctly declare, that they consider tithes a burden upon the land. There cannot be a question as to what the opinions of those writers were upon the point. Mr. Ricardo says:—"If the importation price of wheat was 60s. a quarter in England, and it was 60s. a quarter on the Continent, and, in consequence of the burden of tithes, wheat was raised in England to 70s. a quarter, a duty of 10s. ought also to be imposed on the importation of foreign corn."

These were the opinions of Mr. Ricardo. They may be entirely wrong, but they certainly differ very much from those of the hon. gentleman. Don't let the hon. gentleman suppose, that three or four days will settle this question in committee. I am not now saying, whether it may be proper or not to appoint a committee for the purpose of inquiring into the burdens of the land; but this I may say, that as far as I have had any communication with the landed interest, they have evinced no apprehensions as to the result of such an inquiry as that proposed in the hon. gentleman's original notice of motion. I confine myself to that original motion, because it is the only one that the hon. gentleman can properly bring under the notice of the House. The landed interest, as far as I have communicated with them, have not told me, that they thought it essential to their interests that inquiry into the nature and extent of the peculiar burdens borne by them should be absolutely precluded; but I assure the hon. gentleman, that such an inquiry would be of rather longer continuance than he appears to think. Coming here himself, and laying down his dicta as an authority upon the subject, he will be met by others who may differ from him, and whose opinions, though opposed to his own, may yet be regarded as worthy of some consideration. I for one am not prepared to be governed by all the conclusions at which the hon. gentleman has arrived upon this subject. The question, "What is the exact amount of the special burden imposed upon the land? is in my estimation an extremely difficult one upon which to form an accurate opinion. It is a question which, according to my view of it, must be determined rather upon general reasoning, than upon the positive dicta of any twelve or fifteen gentlemen who may be formed into a committee to consider of it. Tithe, church-rates, in short, pretty nearly the whole of the maintenance of the Established Church, is imposed upon the land. I do not deny that, in towns, a very considerable sum is raised towards the support of the church in the form of church-rates; but, upon the whole, I cannot help thinking that the land pays a very full proportion of the amount which is levied generally for the payment of church-rates. That, of course, would be one subject of inquiry before a committee. Another subject of inquiry would be, how the stock and profits of trade were now allowed to escape the payment of poor-rates? Because there can be no doubt that the original policy of the law was, that stock in trade and the profits of trade should contribute equally with the land to the support of the poor. It was found so difficult, however, to collect a fair and proper quota of the rate from stock-in-trade and the profits of trade, that you passed, not many months since, an act directly at variance with the original object of the law, relieving trade from this contribution to the poor-rates, and, of course, placing the burden upon the land. I believe that of late years there has been a more equal apportionment of the poor-rate; but if I take the whole of the contribution now made for relief of the poor, I think I shall still find, I do not say in what proportion, but certainly that a very large proportion of it is levied upon the land. I do not think that my hon. friend meant to insist upon it, that the return of 1826 afforded an exact view of the relative proportion in which the different interests of the country contributed to this burden at the present moment. But I will tell you what the relative proportion was in 1826. The proportion levied from the land in that year was £4,523,000; from dwelling-houses, £1,788,000; from mills, factories, &c., £255,000. As I said before, I do not quote this as an exact indication of what the proportion is now; but I still think, if you refer to the original policy of the act of Elizabeth, you will find that the sum contributed from other sources is proportionately far less than that contributed by the land. Looking to other burdens that bear upon the land, I know that there are many, who contend, and to a certain extent their argument is true, that these burdens are borne, not by the land itself, but by the consumer of the produce derived from the land. This argument has been specially applied to the article of barley. The revenue derived from barley, including the malt-tax and the duty upon spirits, may be taken at £10,000,000 a-year. I know that the consumer pays a very large proportion of that amount of taxation; but I know also that in manufactures the doctrine is this: if you have a duty upon any particular article of manufacture, you diminish the consumption of that particular article. I am constantly told (and I am going to act upon the principle in some degree), "reduce the duty upon any article of great consumption, and the consumption of that article will increase." True; and if I were to reduce the duty on barley, I should, no doubt, promote the consumption of it; but what I contend is this: if I levy a duty amounting to nearly £10,000,000 a-year upon one particular article of agricultural produce, although it is perfectly true that a considerable proportion of that duty is borne by the consumer, yet it is difficult to estimate what proportion falls upon the consumer, and what proportion upon the land. It would be most difficult to determine where the land ceases, and where the consumer begins, to pay this tax. I say, then, that I cannot prove to you, as you call upon me to do, what is the exact and precise amount of the special burdens imposed upon the land.

It would require a wiser man even than the hon. member for Sheffield, to perform such a duty. Admitting that commerce, to a certain extent, may be injured by the protection given to land, yet if a minister, whose sees the justice of continuing that protection, is called upon to state precisely what he conceives to be the particular and special burdens which render such a protection justifiable, he will find himself in a very embarrassing and difficult situation. You say, "If these special burdens exist, define them—specify them—let us know what they are." I tell you that that is very difficult, and after all the research of a committee, I believe it would be very difficult still. These are the general impressions under which I speak; but they are distinct considerations from the present question, which is this, shall I postpone indefinitely the Corn-importation bill, until the committee proposed by the hon. gentleman shall have made its report? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say, "I only propose a committee, and if the landed interest, as you say, are not afraid of inquiry, why should that committee be opposed?" It is true that the hon. gentleman, in his original notice of motion, pointed only to the appointment of a committee, but in his speech of this evening he talks of that committee as a necessary preliminary to the passing of the Corn-importation bill; and speaking of the labours of the committee, supposing it to be appointed, he says, "It may be a very tedious business." Foreseeing this, I ask the House to decide upon the question before it, as practical men, acquainted with the interests and feelings of the country. I ask what the country would think of me, if I were to say to the hon. gentleman, "I think this is a very reasonable motion." I have been for a long time considering, not this question only, but all the questions which I brought forward the other night, connected with the finance and commerce of the country. I have endeavoured to suggest, with respect to all of them, as fair and practical a settlement as I could. What would the country think of me, if I now said, "Here is a very plausible motion for inquiry, brought forward by the hon. member for Sheffield? I will leave the corn trade, I will leave the landowners, the tenantry, all men who derive their income from the sale of corn or the production of corn, in a state of utter uncertainty, and go with the hon. member for Sheffield into an inquiry which may possibly terminate some three sessions hence." I leave it to the country to decide whether my objection to the hon. gentleman's motion is not a reasonable one. To that motion I shall certainly give my decided opposition.

The motion was negatived by a majority of 115, and the House went into committee, several clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

INCOME TAX—MACHINERY.

MARCH 15, 1842.

Mr. F. T. Baring submitted a series of questions, relative to the machinery to be employed in the collection of the proposed Income-tax.

SIR R. PEEL: Sir, the right hon. gentleman has put to me seven questions, to which he requires an answer. As I stated to the House, I shall bring forward a measure embracing the general principles which I have already disclosed, and on which the present government proposes to found a bill for the purpose of supplying the enormous deficiency which has been occasioned by the disproportion which has been suffered to accrue between the revenue and expenditure. In the bill for raising the property-tax, there are about 218 clauses; and the right hon. gentleman thinks it convenient for me to state, in answer to his question, what is the general purport of those clauses. Consistently with my public duty, I do not feel I could give an answer to the right hon. gentleman, without entering into explanations which cannot be properly made in replying to a single question, or a series of questions. The House, I am sure, must feel, that it is extremely difficult for any one who labours under the responsibility of proposing a great measure to parliament, and upon which it is of the utmost importance that the intentions of the government should be kept perfectly secret, as regards its operation on the commercial and manufacturing interests, to disclose the principal provisions of his scheme in an imperfect shape before parliament. The records of whole proceedings of the old property-tax commissioners were destroyed by a vote of this House. Almost all the officers employed under it, have ceased to exist. I do not deny the importance of the matter to which the right hon. gentleman's question applies, and I think the machinery under the proposed tax a question of grave consideration. But it is the first privilege, as I hold it, of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, to have an opportunity of explaining in detail the provisions of an all-important measure of this nature. It is perfectly open to the right hon. gentleman to debate this question on Friday; but I do not think it fitting that I should explain, in answer to a mere question, what are the general provisions of a bill, so complicated as one for levying a tax of this nature must be, I must, therefore, beg leave to decline answering the question of the right hon. gentleman.

In reply to Viscount Howick, Sir R. Peel said, that the noble viscount and every hon. gentleman would have the fullest opportunity, during the progress of the bill, of discussing the matter, if the machinery should appear to them unsatisfactory, or so unsatisfactory as to constitute a fatal objection to the measure. Acceding to the preliminary resolution would not bind the noble viscount to support every part of the bill. He was sure the House would not expect, in reference to a bill which might contain about 218 clauses, any member should be bound to all the details. He would, at the earliest period, whenever there was an opportunity of entering into an explanation (but not in answer to a question), state to the House the general principle on which he proposed the machinery should be constructed. He would do so when he had an opportunity of replying to the comments that might be made by various hon. gentlemen, but not when he was limited to a mere answer to a question. He apprehended, that Mr. Pitt made his explanations in the committee on the bill, and not in answer to questions. The right hon. gentleman would be at perfect liberty to ask for details on Friday next; but how was it possible for him to enter into explanations of the sort required, in answer to the right hon. gentleman's seven questions, as to who were to be the commissioners, what powers they were to exercise, what officers of excise or other department were to collect the tax, what powers each were to have, and so forth?

Conversation at an end.

THE INCOME TAX.

MARCH 18, 1842.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—I can assure the noble lord (Lord John Russell) that the notice he has given, of his intention to offer a determined opposition to my proposal, has not in the slightest degree disappointed or disconcerted me. Notwithstanding the silence of the other night—notwithstanding the calmness with which my proposition was received—notwithstanding the declaration that my proposal should be considered as a whole, I felt, that in the attempt to meet the difficulties in which this country had been involved by the financial administration of the late government, I felt, that whatever efforts I might make, whether by the continuance of loans, whether by the imposition of taxes upon the income and property of the country, whether by burdens upon the working classes, by means of taxes on articles of consumption, I had not undertaken an easy task; but I was confident that my chief opponents would be those who had involved the country in difficulties. But you (speaking to the opposition) shall not divert the attention of the country from the real point at issue. This is no question of Eau de Cologne; this is no question of colonial asses. Never did I see the right hon. gentleman (Mr. F. Baring) so much excited as he was upon that subject. The right hon. gentleman never felt half the indignation at the financial difficulties of the country that he exhibited at the imposition of a differential duty upon colonial asses as compared to foreign asses. He contemplated with the calmness of a philosopher, year by year, an increasing deficiency in the public finances; but, to propose a differential duty of 3d.

upon a colonial ass, excited the right hon. gentleman to a pitch of indignation. But the question to be considered is this—the financial administration of the country and of India having been, for five or six years, in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, in what position is the country placed? The time has arrived (again speaking to the opposition) when your tampering with saving-banks, and with 5 per cent. upon Customs duties, must be abandoned, and some decided and vigorous effort must be made to equalise the income and expenditure of the country. You say that you will submit to future and onerous taxation, when you are convinced of its necessity, in order to produce that equalisation. Well, upon the actual expenditure you will be called to make in the course of this year, there is a deficit of £3,000,000. It has become necessary, since I last addressed the House on this subject, to send additional reinforcements to India, in consequence of the policy you have pursued with regard to that country; and it will be my duty, in order to adopt the measures which are requisite for vindicating the honour of the British arms, to propose to parliament increased military estimates, in addition to those which I have already submitted. The actual deficit is £2,570,000. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. F. Baring) has seemed delighted at an error he supposed he had discovered in my estimate. The right hon. gentleman said he had been fishing, and that he had fished with great success, and he informed me that he was about to offer me a large sum, of which I was not aware. The right hon. gentleman said I had calculated an actual deficiency of £2,569,000, while he had discovered that it would only amount to £2,469,000, making a difference of £100,000; and he taunted me with my arithmetical inaccuracy in exhibiting such a blunder in my calculations. This sum of £100,000 I thought it necessary to provide, though I could not enter much into detail on the subject, to meet any deficiency which might arise on special emergency. But I must deprive myself of the consolation which the right hon. fisherman has offered me, for I will venture to say, that the result will be, that I shall have an actual deficiency to provide for to the amount of £3,000,000. I presume that a provident man, in calculating his expenditure for the year, will take into account, not merely the actual payments for which he has to provide, but any special expenses he may be called upon to meet. I said, therefore, that I calculated the cost of the expedition to China—which, in pursuance of the policy of the late government, we have undertaken to carry on, I trust, even with additional vigour—I calculated the cost of that expedition, for the year ending April, 1843, would be, at the very least, £1,300,000. I proposed merely to include in the estimates a vote of £500,000, because, I thought it might only be necessary to provide for the actual payment of that amount in the course of the present year; but £800,000 of expenditure is thus left unprovided for, and add that sum, supposing the actual deficit should amount, not to £2,570,000, but to £3,000,000 in the course of the year, to the amount which must be demanded for the service of the ensuing year, and you bring up the clear net deficiency to £3,800,000. I think that estimate will not be questioned. How, then, is this deficiency to be supplied? All appear to concur in opinion that it ought to be provided for by an addition to the revenue of the country. Sir, I wish, in the face of that deficiency, to incur a further deficiency. I wish, for the sake of public policy, for the sake of removing burdens which press upon the springs of manufacturing industry and commercial enterprise, to add to the existing deficiency. If it be politic to abolish altogether prohibitions—if it be politic to reduce prohibitory duties—if it be politic to mitigate the duties upon certain articles of consumption, and upon certain raw materials which enter into every commercial enterprise—I allude to such articles as timber—and if that policy be approved of and adopted, a fresh addition, must be made to the deficit of the year of from £1,000,000 to £1,200,000, leaving, therefore, a total deficiency of revenue, as compared with expenditure, for the ensuing year, of not less than £4,800,000. I explained to the House, on a former occasion, the mode in which I propose to meet this deficiency. I propose to levy a tax upon the income of the country—upon the income of persons, all of whom I cannot call rich, but the greater number of whom are in comparatively easy circumstances, and this tax upon the property and income of the country will produce the sum of about £3,700,000. If my facts be admitted as to the extent of the deficiency—if the policy of removing prohibitions, of mitigating prohibitory duties, and of reducing the amount of duty upon certain great articles of commerce, be allowed, the deficiency thus produced must be met in some manner; and the question at issue between the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) and myself—the question which will decide the financial policy, as it will decide the fate of the government—is, whether my advice, or that of the noble lord shall be taken—whether I shall be permitted to make this attempt to relieve the country from embarrassment, or whether the financial affairs of the nation shall be restored to the hands of those who are responsible for the difficulties by which we are surrounded. How does the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) propose to raise this deficiency of £4,800,000? He says, that if I had proposed any other tax, I should have had his cordial support. Does the tax upon coals afford me any striking indication of that cordial acquiescence, when the noble lord has stated, that I may not only expect his determined opposition to the Income-tax, but also to the tax upon coals? The right hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. F. Baring) has questioned the policy of increasing the tax on spirits, and has said, that he entertains opinions most adverse to such a measure. How I shall fare with regard to the stamp duties in Ireland, I know not; but I see a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Sheil) preparing for opposition to that branch of my proposal. [Mr. Shiel: I said nothing.] It is some consolation to know that the right hon. gentleman does not threaten me with opposition; but I do not think, from the indications I have perceived, that I have a right to entertain very sanguine anticipations, that if, instead of resorting to a tax on the income of the country, I had revived the tax upon leather, or salt, or any of the articles from which duties have been removed, I should have received very cordial support from hon. gentlemen opposite. The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) has intimated, that he will submit resolutions to the House in opposition to my measure. Those resolutions will, of course, involve the consideration of the Corn-laws and of the sugar duties. The noble lord will again propose his fixed duty on corn, as a means of raising the public revenue; and it will be for the House to determine, whether they will adopt the principle of the property-tax, or impose a fixed duty of 8s., or a lower amount, upon corn, in order to improve the finances of the country. Those right hon. gentlemen who are political supporters of the noble lord, and who tell me, that by the scale of duties I propose, I am ruining Irish agriculture, and destroying the hopes of the growth of oats in Ireland, will have to decide whether they prefer the noble lord's scheme to that which I contemplate, for the noble lord proposes to reduce the protective duty upon Irish produce, below that which it now enjoys, anticipating a supply of revenue from a fixed duty on corn. With respect to sugar, I admit that it is a subject perfectly open to consideration. The noble lord will be acting in consistency with the opinions he has before expressed, if he proposes a reduction of the duty on foreign sugar, in the hope that a revenue may be derived from that source. What other suggestions the noble lord may make for improving the revenue of the country, I cannot conceive. I am not a little surprised at the course which has been pursued with respect to the reduction I propose to make in the timber duties. I certainly thought it was a prevailing opinion on the opposite side of the House, that there was no more onerous impost than that upon foreign timber. It has been argued that the result of that impost is not merely to diminish the supplies from the countries on the shores of the Baltic—not merely to prevent us from availing ourselves of an extensive market for a considerable portion of our manufactures, but it has also been contended, I believe, that the operation of the tax is to give a preference to inferior timber, as compared with good, and to lead to the purchase of a comparatively bad article at a high price. The proposal I make is, to attach a nominal duty to Canadian timber, and to make as great a reduction in the duties on foreign timber imported into this country as is consistent with a just protection to the produce of our own dominions. The loss of revenue, I have no doubt, will be considerable; but I reconcile myself to that loss from the conviction that when you deal with articles of extensive consumption, or the raw materials of manufacture, it is on the whole good policy to make such a reduction as will insure to the consumer the full benefit of that reduction. I have read treatises on this subject, edited by hon. gentlemen attached to the principles of the noble lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), who have held office in connection with the party by which the noble lord is supported, and who have always been considered high authorities in reference to financial and commercial matters. I certainly think that the publications of Sir Henry Parnell are, on many points, entitled to considerable weight; but I have frequently heard them appealed to on the other side of the House, as almost conclusive declarations in matters of commercial policy. That hon. baronet has expressed this opinion, with respect to the duty on timber,—“The duty on timber affects and injures industry in a great variety of ways, in consequence of its being so much used in buildings, ships, machinery, &c.”

He then goes on to say, “That countries possessing forests in the vicinity of navigable rivers, have great advantages over others not so circumstanced, and by laying a duty on timber, you still further increase those advantages. It would appear as if it were an indispensable preliminary to a continued successful competition with foreign shipbuilders, that you should admit foreign timber free of all duty.”

“That, however (he adds), might be too great a sacrifice of revenue;” and he goes on to state that the particular measure he proposed was this:—that, in place of the present duty, it should be reduced to £1 10s. per load; and that, thereby, he calculated the revenue would be considerably increased, because then, nearly the whole of the foreign timber consumed would pay a duty of £1 10s., instead of a small portion paying £2 15s., and the remainder only 10s. His proposal was, to impose a duty of 30s. on foreign timber, and of 10s. on that from our colonies; and the duty I propose, from 5th April, 1843, is 25s. on foreign timber, 30s. on deals, and on colonial timber only a nominal duty. [Mr. Labouchere: That proposition was made when the revenue was abundant.] Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would wish me to impose an additional duty on foreign timber. Why, that was the policy of the late government; but I leave the House to judge which is the wisest policy—if you can afford it, to encourage the importation of foreign and Canadian timber at the duties I recommend, or to lay a duty of 50s. on foreign timber, and of 20s. on Canadian timber. If Sir Henry Parnell be right, I cannot help thinking that, if your object be to relieve the pressure upon the springs of industry—upon the ship-builder, the landowner, the builder of manufactories, or the builder of cottages and houses of every description—it is hardly possible for you to make a reduction of duty upon any article of consumption which will give such great and general assistance as the duty on timber, the facility in the importation of which will be so extensively increased. If you can do this without injustice to the colonial timber merchant, you will have accomplished a most important benefit. With respect to coffee, also, I am surprised at the comments made on the other side, on my proposed reduction of duty. I thought, after the evidence taken before the import duties committee, showing the gradual increase of consumption—after the testimony given by coffee-house keepers in London, as to the immense importance which the labouring classes attach to the cheapness of coffee—I did not expect to hear from the noble lord a doubt as to the policy of sacrificing revenue for the sake of increasing consumption. For this purpose, in addition to the deficiency caused by expenditure, I am willing to incur the risk of further deficiency by a remission of duty, making, as I before stated, the total deficiency to be supplied amount to £4,300,000. I do not deny the objections that exist to a tax upon income: I expected to hear it said, that it is a novel proposition in time of peace; but let me ask, is there any man who can be deceived by such plausible but fallacious observations? It is public necessity which justifies the tax, whether imposed in time of peace or of war. In time of peace, too! To call this a time of peace. Because you have not the cannon actually booming in your ears, you wisely arrive at the conclusion that we are living in a time of peace. Elevate your vision until it can embrace your Indian territory; look at the war you have been carrying on on the western bank of the Indus. I say nothing of the policy of the course you have pursued there, but can a country engaged in such a war flatter itself that it is at peace? Look again at your Syrian expedition of last year, and concurrently with that, the costly hostilities carried on in China. Have you been, and are you now, in that state of profound tranquillity which entitles you to call it peace? Mark, then, all these sources of expenditure, and tell me if you are not in a condition which excepts the present from the ordinary case, and justifies a resort to the Income-tax, and to the objections and inconveniences to which I know it is liable? The noble lord says,—“Do not impose the Income-tax, because you will show foreign nations that the resources of this country are exhausted."

I say, never mind what may be the impression upon foreign countries. Do that which you believe to be just—that which you think consistent with sound policy—and let foreign nations think what they will. If, in a time of peace—a time of European peace—you have a large deficiency to supply, and consider it more just that the affluent classes shall supply it, rather than pressing upon the poor by taxing articles of consumption, adopt that course, and do not be afraid of what foreign countries may think of your resources. If foreign countries misapprehend and mistake—if they print paragraphs in newspapers, to show that England is in a condition of financial embarrassment—what difference can that make in your real situation? The time will come when they will discover their error; and, in the meanwhile, act no unworthy as well as unwise part, but disregard all such consequences as to what others may, for the moment, think of your condition and resources. If you do what is just, and so far what is politic, depend upon it, after mists have cleared away, perhaps, in a little week, foreign countries will arrive at a more fair conclusion, and if their opinion be of so much importance, they will then admire you for making exertions corresponding with the necessity of the occasion. In order to prevent erroneous notions on their part, will you consent to pursue a course which you know to be neither just nor politic? With such a deficiency as I have pointed out, is it better then to call upon the income of the country to supply it, or to tax articles of general consumption? There is no alternative. In order to raise four millions of revenue, does any man think there is any alternative? You want four millions for the service of the present year, but to try experiments on the commercial tariff of the country will not furnish the money, and does any man mean to tell me that there is any middle course between imposing a tax upon property and laying taxes upon articles of consumption? Certainly, you may say, I will resort to a house-tax; but I can only say that Mr. Pitt adopted that course in 1797, and found the burden so great, and the evasions such, that in the next year he resorted to a property-tax. Mr. Pitt, wishing to affect the property of the country, produced a plan by which the assessed taxes paid at a preceding period, should be considered the test of property. He tried to obtain a 10 per cent. Income-tax by that criterion; but he was obliged to abandon it, and my belief is, that a house-tax would be much more unjust in its operation than an Income-tax. The objection to the Income-tax is, that it is inquisitorial. I do not deny the objection; but, apart from that, I feel it to be one of the best taxes that can be imposed: 3 per cent., in the present condition of the country, is absolutely necessary to procure the supply, and I make the proposition from a firm conviction that it will be infinitely less onerous and more just than any other tax. Moreover, I have the strongest persuasion that if my general proposal be received by the House, the actual sum each man will contribute will be exceedingly small. If my whole plan be adopted, there will be a diminution in the cost of living which will repay to the contributors of the Income-tax a large portion of the money they are called upon to advance. Take the case of a man of £5000 a year: he will contribute £150, and it is my fixed belief that he will receive back, in cheapness of living, the greater part of the sum he pays. My settled opinion is, that the burden will be less than that arising from any other tax we could devise. The noble viscount (Viscount Howick) states the case of a man who has only £153 per annum; but, wherever you draw the line, there must be some hardship; and I will venture to say, that it is impossible to propose a tax which will not be liable to an objection of that kind. But even in the case of a man of £150 or £200 a year, I entertain the most confident hope that the reduced cost of articles of consumption will enable him to pay the tax without inconvenience. Suppose the noble viscount were to take a window-tax instead, there must be an exemption of houses under a certain number of windows: seven windows might have to pay, and six windows be free from the impost; but still a line must be drawn, and, where it is drawn, there will, of necessity, be hardship; the rule must, to a certain extent, be arbitrary and inconsistent with the strict principles of reasoning. I do trust, however, that this tax will not be condemned upon individual cases of hardship, but that the House will rather attend to general results, and fairly consider whether any other tax, equally just, can be found, which will be equally effectual in raising the required supply for the public exigency. I said, on a former day, that I would avail myself of the earliest opportunity of giving a full explanation of the machinery for the collection of the tax, and I assure the right hon. gentleman, that when I refused to answer the question he put to me the other day, it was from a strong impression that I could not, in answering a question, give a full and satisfactory explanation. I thought it would be infinitely better to reserve myself to a time when I could go into all the details. The period since the Income-tax was imposed, is considerable; I know that I speak to many who are aware, from practical experience, or from being conversant with financial subjects, of the principles applied to the collection of the tax; but, in order to make the matter intelligible to those who may not be so well acquainted with it, I must necessarily refer to some points well known to such as have made the subject their study. I shall now propose to adopt, for the purpose of the collection of this tax, the machinery, speaking generally, applied by that act brought in by Lord Lansdowne, then Lord Henry Petty, in the year 1806, under the administration of Lord Grenville and Lord Grey; and a reference to that act will show any hon. gentleman, who may wish to ascertain it with precision, the general mode which I propose to adopt for the collection of this tax. The property tax was collected and assessed by that act, and it will be collected and assessed now under the general regulation applicable to the collection and raising of the assessed taxes, and the land-tax. There are in each county in England, certain persons known by the name of the commissioners of land-tax. Those commissioners of the land-tax will be empowered, and required to appoint, speaking generally, from their own body, but they will not be limited in the selection to themselves, certain commissioners, to be called commissioners for general purposes. Those commissioners for general purposes will have to select others, to be called additional commissioners. Those additional commissioners were not limited in the act, but, generally, two were appointed, and those two had the charge of the assessment on property. I need not enter into the mode in which bank stock, East-India stock, and stock in other public companies, will be assessed, but I may say, generally, that I shall adhere to the provisions of the old law. As far as the interference of the government is concerned, the duty will be placed under the general superintendence of the office of stamps and taxes, and their officers, as far as they are available, in all the duties connected with the mode in which the tax is to be levied. The local commissioners will appoint assessors, who will deliver at a certain time blank forms within the districts for which they act, with minute instructions how they are to be filled up. Every person will have to make an accurate return of the property derived from land, from the rents of houses, and from other property included in schedule A. With respect to the profits derived from trade, the provisions of the act of 1806 I propose to retain, and the income will be returned on an average of the three years preceding; but, of course, it will be necessary to make special provision for those instances in which the trade shall not have been carried on for three years, which I need not now detail. The general principle will be, to estimate the profits on an average of the three years. With respect to the income derived from professions, they are to be calculated upon the profit of the preceding year. I really, Sir, believe, that the chief difficulty will arise from the income in schedule D, the income derived from trades and professions. I believe it is with respect to that income, the inquisitorial power is mainly objected to. With respect to incomes derived from the public funds, there will be no necessity for this inquisition, the amount is easily ascertained, and few who have this property, will deprecate the mode of ascertaining it. Under an act, too, recently passed—I refer to Mr. Poulett Scrope's Act—the valuation of land is tolerably well known. It will, then, be generally conceded, that the chief force of the objection as to the inquisitorial nature of the assessment, will apply to income derived from trade, and to professional income. I, then, propose, that the return shall be sent to the assistant-commissioners, and that it should be accessible to the surveyor acting on the part of the government. With respect to the additional commissioners, there will be various regulations, and they will be sworn to secrecy. The return is to be sent to them sealed up, it is to be inspected by them, and it will be competent for them, or for the surveyor acting on the part of the government, to make a surcharge on that assessment. Then, as the law stood in the year 1806, an appeal against the surcharge could be made to the head of the general body of commissioners, called the commissioners for general purposes. They will hear the appeal, and have the power of demanding precise information as to the nature of the property. I hope, that I shall be able to retain that provision, because the policy of the law hitherto has been, with respect to the assessed taxes, and it was the principle with respect to the property tax, not to make the collection depend upon the will of the government, because it was thought more consistent with constitutional law, to entrust the amount to local parties, and that those who may have the confidence of their neighbours shall be employed for this purpose. I propose, Sir, to leave the provision of the law in this respect untouched. Although, however, it is more consistent with former usage to employ local parties in each neighbourhood to collect the tax, yet a great objection has been raised to their sitting in appeal on the affairs of their immediate neighbours. It has been peculiarly objected that it is inexpedient to produce before their neighbours, or those who might stand towards themselves in the relation of friends, or of personal or political enemies, these accounts, and divulging to them their true state. I propose, therefore, to appoint other persons, and to give an option to the parties. I propose that the tax-office should appoint a certain number of persons, to be named special commissioners, and I propose that these special commissioners shall have all the powers of hearing appeals which the commissioners for general purposes possessed under the act of 1806. I propose that the party shall have full power of going before the committee of general purposes, if they so pleased, but, if they preferred it, the appeal might be heard by the special commissioners under the control of the government, and appointed by the tax-office, which commissioners will be sworn to secrecy. I propose, then, that, at the option of the party, the appeal may be heard by these special commissioners. The decision that these special commissioners may come to, will of course be final. It has not appeared to me necessary to extend this option beyond those who make returns from property included in schedule D. When, Sir, I am stating this, of course I reserve to myself the right to alter it. There is, I fear, a disposition to blame the government if they make any alteration in the proposals they submit to the House. I trust that, with respect to minute matters, after seeing a variety of persons, the House will not make it a subject of reflection, if, having a great subject to deal with, I may alter the details; I am sure that in matters of principle there will be little for me to alter, but in matters of detail, I reserve to myself the right of making use of any information I may receive, in order to form a satisfactory arrangement upon this subject, and full power of making any alteration which I may be satisfied is consistent with public policy. Then, Sir, I hope to be able to include in the new act some provisions which are not in the old act of 1806; I hope to be enabled, with respect to parties who have been once in the returns, whether in respect to the income from trades on an average of three years, or to the profits of professions for one year, to make an arrangement by which they may be able to compound for their assessment. I am sure that every endeavour ought to be made to guard against evasion, since one great objection to the Income-tax is, that it will fall with peculiar severity upon those who are determined to act honestly. We ought to endeavour, if we can, to avoid entailing peculiar severity on any one; if this act and if this Income-tax is to pass, we ought to give every advantage to the honest man, and to use every prevention against fraud or evasion. I hope to be enabled to introduce some provision which will make one return endure for the whole time of the act. I do not say that in all cases it ought to be obligatory on the office of stamps and taxes to admit a composition; but when they believe that the person as assessed is properly taxed, I think, that with some such addition as the £5 per cent. on the assessed taxes, we can, by some mode or other, make some easy provision to enable the tax to be payable once for all. In making this statement, I do not bind myself to all the special provisions. I think that we may have recourse to some things which may be a great improvement, without acting with any undue severity. The House, therefore, will see, that these are two main provisions in this act which are not in the other. In the first place, if the appeal to the local commissioners shall be objected to, as leading to a disclosure of private affairs, I propose to give as an option of which the party may avail himself, to go before the special commissioners appointed by the government, sworn to secrecy, who may hear all parties, and determine the appeal. And, in the second place, I propose, if possible, that facilities shall be given for compounding for the payment of the tax, that composition to endure for the whole period of three years. I believe, Sir, that I have now answered the question put to me by the right hon. gentleman. I do not apprehend that the present establishment of the stamps and taxes will be sufficient for the additional duties I impose on them. All I say is, that every effort shall be made, in the appointment of additional officers, that their general character shall be a sufficient guarantee for the integrity with which they shall perform their duties, and every endeavour shall be made to prevent a permanent increase or encumbrance upon the country, of officers, who, I trust, will be employed for a merely temporary purpose. There is only one other provision proposed by me on which I wish to touch. It was included in one of the acts relating to the property-tax, I think the act of 1806. Many persons did object to payment to the collectors of the sums due from them on account of the property-tax; it was said that although there was no inquiry as to the property, it was still painful to some that a person in the immediate neighbourhood should be privy to the payment, from which they might infer the return that had been made of the amount of the property. I propose that a party wishing to make a payment may do so, without giving his name, into the Bank of England, on account of the property-tax. That was a provision in the act of Lord Grenville, and I might refer to that. I hope that as the branches of the Bank of England have become numerous, that as the ramifications of the Bank of England become more extended in different parts of the country, parties may have the advantage of making these payments with infinitely greater ease than if the place of payment was confined to the principal office of the Bank of England in London. A question, Sir, was put to me, respecting terminable annuities, and I was asked whether I proposed any reduction in the rate of duty on terminable annuities as compared with incomes derived from stock. Now, I am bound to say, that I do not intend to make any such reduction. The proposal which I make is a proposal for a tax on the income of this country; and if I once begin to make a distinction with respect to different kinds of income, it will be absolutely necessary that I should abandon the Income-tax. If the Bank of England—if the owners of terminable annuities were to be exempted—if a distinction were to be made in favour of those who are comparatively wealthy and affluent, I think that I could easily show that the remission must be made to a much greater extent than hon. gentlemen may perhaps be inclined to think. If there is to be an Income-tax at all, it must be uniformly laid upon all income, and in no case whatever can I allow a distinction to be drawn. Therefore, whatever inconvenience I may suffer from it in argument, I am bound not to admit the justice of an alteration of the bill with respect to terminable annuities. With regard to them, there was no distinction made by Mr. Pitt in 1798—no distinction was made in the act of 1806. I am aware that the terminable annuities had at that time a much longer period to run; but still the principle is the same, and the tax was laid on terminable annuities. At that time there were also exchequer annuities, and which were then in much the same position as are the terminable annuities now. The tax I propose is 3 per cent. upon income, and from that tax no remission or reduction can be made on account of any class who are thought at all competent to pay it. I now leave this question with the House. The noble lord intends, and I am glad to hear it, to ask by vote for the determination of the House, and I hope that that determination will be expressed at as early a period as is consistent with the due deliberation on so important a matter. By your vote upon this measure, you will express your opinions of the whole financial policy of the year, and by that vote the determination of the question in whose hands the government of this country shall be placed. If the House thinks it desirable to support the principle of the noble lord (Lord J. Russell), and the measures which he proposes—if it thinks that by imposing a fixed duty upon corn, and by reducing the duty on foreign sugar, it will meet the difficulties by which the country is at present surrounded—if it adopts these principles, and rejects those which I have recommended, then the administration of the affairs of government will again change hands.—But, for myself, I am not prepared now—considering the question of slavery, considering the prospects of supply, the condition of our colonies, and the other important points which crowd themselves upon one's mind in reviewing subjects of such general interest—considering all these things, I am not now prepared to advise a remission of the duties upon foreign sugar, and not being so prepared, I cannot advise a remission of the duties on the sugar of our own colonies. The more I look at this question, the more I consider the amount of the sum to be raised, the more confident am I that the best measure now to be adopted is to resort to a tax upon income rather than to impose a tax upon those articles of excise and customs to which I have referred, and upon which an abatement of the duties has of late years been made. I believe that such an attempt would far more disturb the application of capital and the operations of active industry, than will a call upon each individual to pay £3 out of every £100. I have a strong conviction that the great mass of the lower classes will consider the voluntary determination of parliament to accept for themselves, and to impose upon the wealth of the country this tax for the purpose of relieving its burdens—I have a strong conviction that it will be generally hailed on the part of the country, as a strong proof of the determination of the upper classes to bear their fair share of taxation. Although I admit that the tax may press with additional severity, on account of the uncertain nature of profits, on that property which is derived from trade and professions, yet, when I consider that one of the main objects of this measure is to reduce the duties upon the raw materials of production, and that such a reduction will give the best chance for a revival of commerce, I cannot but think that the measure will work for the especial advantage of those who are connected with the trade of the country. As to those who hold land, or those who derive their incomes from professions, I have a confident expectation that by reducing the cost of living I shall compensate them for a great part of their burden, but if I may not offer them that advantage—yet, if by consenting to such a burden, instead of throwing it upon the articles of consumption, they diminish the embarrassments of their country, and take from those who are disposed to agitate the public mind the means of creating discontent and disunion—if they effect this, surely the compensation they will receive will be ample. I hope that my expectations as to the revival of trade in three years will not be disappointed—that my anticipations as to the temporary character of this tax will be realised. Then, when that happy time arrives, when we shall be enabled to dispense with this tax, then shall we find a revival of commerce and of industry, and then shall we have the satisfaction of contemplating a people contented and united, from the proof they will have received that those in the highest stations, and those who are comparatively affluent, are prepared, in a crisis of commercial and financial difficulty, to bear their full portion of any charge which the exigencies of the country may render necessary.

The right hon. baronet concluded by moving the following resolution:—

“That it is the opinion of this committee, that, towards raising the supply granted to her Majesty, there be charged annually, during a term to be limited, the several rates and duties following, that is to say:—

“For and in respect of the property in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, and for and in respect of every annuity, pension, or stipend, payable by her Majesty, or out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom; and for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities, payable to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, companies or societies, whether corporate or not corporate; and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person or persons whatever, resident in Great Britain, from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, or from stipend or any annuities, allowances, or from any profession, trade, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively exercised in Great Britain or elsewhere; and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising and accruing to any person or persons not resident within Great Britain, from any property whatever in Great Britain, or from any trade, profession, or vocation, exercised in Great Britain; for every 20s. of the annual value or amount thereof, 7d.

“For and in respect of the occupation of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments (other than a dwelling-house occupied by a tenant distinct from a farm of lands), for every 20s. of the annual value thereof, 3½d.”

Debate adjourned.

SIR R. PEEL, on this, the third night of the debate, spoke as follows:—Sir, after the comments that have been made in the course of three nights' debate, upon the proposal which I made for relieving the country from its financial difficulties, I must naturally feel some anxiety to reply to some of the observations that have been directed against it; and I must first remark on the objection taken to the course I have pursued by the hon. member for Liskeard. I was told by him in the course of this evening, that having no confidence in the abstract merits of the measure I had brought forward, and being unable to support it by argument, I had resorted to topics calculated to excite party feeling, and had sought that aid from party excitement which I could not hope to find in reason and in argument. Sir, I refer for my vindication against that charge to all those hon. gentlemen who heard me make my financial statement. I ask whether, when I detailed to the House the causes of the present difficulties, and proposed my remedy for them, it was possible for any man more studiously to abstain from every topic of a party nature. It was necessary for me to refer, among other causes of expenditure, to the China war, and to the war west of the Indus, but in referring to those causes of increased expense, did I not abstain from entering into any political subject that could be considered likely to provoke discussion of a party nature? But, Sir, when on a following night, I had to vindicate the course which I had pursued, I stood in a very different position. On the first night I had been told that my proposition should be considered as a whole; there was an admission of the great financial embarrassment, and I was told that my proposition should be regarded with no party feeling, that it should be discussed altogether on its abstract merits; and I appeal to those who recollect the second night's debate, whether any measure could be attacked in a manner more partaking of party spirit? As I said on a former occasion, I had foreseen much opposition, and I expected to be called upon to vindicate my measure; and when I did vindicate it, having been thus provoked, was it not natural that I should remind those who attacked my measure, that they and their policy had been the chief cause of the difficulties in which the country was placed? And really, Sir, wishing, though I do not, to discuss the subject in the temper in which it has been begun, I must say, that a speech of greater bitterness I never heard, than that which fell from the right hon. gentleman, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. Why, Sir, was it not said that I had maintained the sugar duties, not because I was convinced of the policy of maintaining them, but because I wished to preserve my consistency—that I would not propose any measure that could unfavourably affect my own political position? Is it not true, that not one word was said against the present measure when it was first proposed? Was it not a measure in respect to which I received the assurance that it should be calmly and deliberately considered? Did not the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman state, that the subject was one to which they had given great consideration—that it was one which had necessarily occupied their attention? And yet they can now come to no other conclusion than that a more unjust, a more inquisitorial, a more oppressive measure, could never have been proposed by any minister. Why could they not arrive at that conclusion on the first night? Of course, in reviewing their financial difficulties, the subject of a tax upon income must have come under their notice and consideration, and they might have been as well prepared on the first night as on the second, to declare their conviction that a tax upon income was an unjust, inquisitorial, and oppressive measure. I must say, therefore, that I spoke on the second evening rather under the impression, that the attack on my measure was not dictated by that spirit of calm inquiry in which the noble lord had promised that it should be examined, such as guides philosophers in the closet, but partook much more of the character of a meeting at the reform club. Therefore, whatever might have been my wishes on first proposing the measure, yet, after the assurance I then received, after the manner in which I opened the proposal, and after the manner in which I and the measure were assailed, then, indeed, I did that which I always will do—I vindicated to the best of my power the measure which I had introduced, and the motives which had influenced me in introducing it. Sir, I must say I was surprised that this measure of the Income-tax should have been denounced by the leaders of the party opposite, without reference to the public exigency or necessity. I was surprised to hear it denounced as an odious and unjust measure—one which no minister ought ever to have proposed. Because I remember perfectly well, that among those who have been connected with the party opposite, those whose attention has been chiefly directed to matters of finance, direct declarations have been left upon record, that seeing the nature of our taxation, seeing its tendency to press upon labour and upon the articles which form the necessary consumption of the great masses of the people, a Property-tax might be resorted to with advantage during a peace. I have heard them with my own ears deliver that opinion. I heard Lord Althorp give that opinion distinctly. Sir Henry Parnell left it on record; and, at a period when no such financial difficulty existed, as now exists, for the sole purpose of relieving the articles of general consumption in the country, and the productive industry of the country from the pressure of taxation, Mr. P. Thomson, Lord Althorp, Mr. Hume, Sir H. Parnell, all declared in favour of a Property-tax. The principle, therefore, of a Property-tax during peace, were hon. gentlemen opposite acting from philosophical and not from party views, would not be denounced with quite so much sternness as has been evinced on the other side. Then, Sir, I am told that I have not established any necessity for a Property-tax. Let me pass in review the chief objections that have been urged against my course and against the measure. I am told, first, that I have established no sufficient financial necessity for the imposition of a Property-tax in time of peace; and here I must fairly own that I am now making an appeal, not so much to gentlemen opposite, as to the deliberate judgment of the country, on which I rely for ultimate support—that deliberating class who are enabled to form a just judgment of the financial difficulties in which we are now placed, and of the inevitable consequences that must attend our permitting them during peace, to proceed, without making any attempt to check their progress, and I ask them maturely to consider, whether I did not establish such a financial necessity as calls, at least, for some very decisive measure. It is proved, that there has been an increasing deficit during the last six years, and that during the last four years that deficit has been rapidly increasing. I include in my calculation the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, because there has been no complaint of my estimate for the year, and I am therefore entitled to assume that it is correct. It is shown, that on the 5th of April, 1840, there was a deficit of income, as compared with the expenditure, of £1,487,000; that in 1841, there was a deficit of £1,851,000; that in 1842, there was a deficit of £2,334,000; and that on the year ending the 5th of April, 1843, there will be a deficit of £2,573,000. It is proved that up to the 5th of April, 1843, on a comparison of your income with your expenditure, and including the deficiencies of the year, you will, in the twenty-sixth year of peace, have accumulated during six years a fresh debt of £10,000,000. It is proved that, for the present year, your expenditure will exceed your income by £2,500,000, taking the expenditure as voted upon the estimates, but it will be found that the deficit cannot be less than £3,500,000, for I shall have to submit an estimate for a reinforcement of our troops in India, and we shall have to pay the expenses of the China expedition for the current year. Why, that fact alone, is enough to establish a case of considerable financial difficulty. I, at the same time, reminded you of the position of a great branch of your empire in another hemisphere. I asked you to remember the position of Indian finance. I reminded you that Indian finance had followed the course of the finances at home; that in 1836, you began with a great surplus; that in 1841, you had ended with a great deficit; that in 1836, you found a surplus of £1,500,000 at least; that by 1840, you found a deficit of £2,300,000, and by 1841, a deficit of £2,400,000; that the Indian government were now raising £2,000,000, at 5 per cent. I asked you to remember that ere long your credit might be required to be brought in aid of Indian credit, should any great reverses or difficulties arise; and I said, also, that I thought it would be a wise course to abstain from incurring doubt, and to maintain the public credit here, by showing a determination to raise the necessary supplies immediately. Those were the proofs I adduced, in order to show that there existed a financial necessity. Sir, if I had not felt a full confidence in the spirit and in the resources of this country, I might have shrunk from developing the truth; but it is because I do know the country has within itself energy and resources sufficient to overcome all its difficulties, that I at once met the difficulty, and on that ground I would not conceal the truth from the public. I say nothing whatever as to the prospects in India. I have received no provocation to-night to enter into that subject, and I wish to adhere to the example set me by the other side, and say nothing as to our policy and prospects on the western side of the Indus. I must, however, say, that I take no desponding view of the state of affairs in India. I have just the same confidence that I have always had in the valour and energy of England, already so gloriously displayed in that great field of exertion; and I hope and trust that those exertions will be great in proportion to the difficulty, and will soon repair our temporary disasters. But I think the hon. member for Lambeth, the other night, was rather too hasty, in saying that he should refuse his assent to any measure whatever that might be necessary to adopt for the reparation of those disasters. "Not one shilling of the Income-tax," said the hon. member, "shall, with my consent, be applied to the war in Afghanistan." I shall not, as I have said, on the present occasion, enter into any inquiry into the causes of the present state of things there, but I do trust the House will suspend their decision until there has been a full investigation, and that they will not only consider the policy that undertook that war, but that they will also suspend their judgment upon the policy which ministers think it necessary to adopt, as British life has been sacrificed to a great extent, and sacrificed by gross perfidy and violation of solemn engagements. The hon. gentleman says, the Affghans are engaged in a battle for their independence, and, he adds, that he holds me responsible for the Affghanistan expedition. Sir, I beg leave to say, that when I first heard of the expedition across the Indus, I had the greatest doubts of its good policy or the extension of our empire in India. I acquiesced in the views of that gallant and distinguished officer, Sir Alexander Burnes, who has fallen a victim to his zeal for the service of his country, and who has left on record his opinion, that, "to attempt to restore Shah Soojah to the throne from whence he had been expelled in 1809, was a measure, the failure of which would entail upon us disgrace and disaster." I read that passage, and I said at the time, that the attempt to force Shah Soojah on the throne of Affghanistan very much resembled what our policy would have been, had we attempted to force Charles X. upon the throne of France. Shah Soojah had been expelled from the throne, and his personal character was held in the utmost contempt by those over whom we had compulsorily placed him to rule. Sir, it appears to me, that at a period when the policy of the country is determined on, and when ten thousand men may be required to assert our power in India, the hon. gentleman should not presume that we were unwilling, powerful as we are, to carry out the military policy of the country. The position of affairs is now very different to what it was before the Affghan expedition; you might, at the outset, remonstrate, but it is not now wise to damp the spirit and ardour of the troops by such observations. At the same time, however, I must disclaim for myself, and for those with whom I act, all responsibility for the expedition beyond the Indus. Whatever we may think of the original policy which dictated that expedition, we will take such steps as we conceive British honour now requires, with as much good faith and energy as if the expedition had originally been a part of our own policy. To revert, however, to our financial position. I have shown that a deficit of £10,000,000 has been incurred during the last six years; the deficit of India is nearly £5,000,000 on the expenditure of the last two years alone; and I submit it to the deliberate judgment and decision of those who hear me, whether it be not absolutely necessary to make some great exertion to rescue ourselves from such a financial difficulty? But the next question is, what shall be the nature of that exertion? I think the great majority of the House admits that we have made out the existence of the necessity for the exertion. It is a mere delusion to say that this is not the time for such a measure. I do not say I propose the Income-tax because of the war in Affghanistan, or because there is a war in China, but I say that we should review our financial position regarding those two wars, as causes of increased expenditure, which certainly of themselves would not justify the course proposed, but which, combined with other causes of increasing expenditure, do concurrently contribute with them to form such a cause as justifies some great exertion or other. Then, what shall that exertion be? I am told that the budget of last year was sufficient to relieve it. I am convinced, however, that if the budget of last year had been carried by the assent of the House of Commons, there would still have arisen a necessity for some such exertion as I now propose. The budget of last year calculated an increase upon the sugar duties of £700,000 to arise from the proposed admission of foreign sugar. That amount has been realized by the unexpected importation of sugar from the East Indies, and a reduction in the price of the article. As nearly as possible, the sum which the right hon. gentleman calculated upon, by the reduction of the duty on foreign sugar, has by these means been obtained. With respect to the duty on corn, it is, of course, very difficult to form any estimate of what it might produce. The noble lord calculated that the same number of quarters would be admitted at an 8*s.* fixed duty, as had been admitted at 6*s.* 8*d.* and at 1*s.* On this subject it is very difficult to form an opinion, but I cannot conceive on what grounds the noble lord argues that the same quantity would be brought in at an 8*s.* duty as has been imported at a duty of 1*s.* But, now, with respect to timber. I am quite prepared to admit, that the proposal of the right hon. gentleman with regard to timber would, had it been adopted, have produced a larger amount to the revenue than that which I submit to the House. The right hon. gentleman proposed to reduce the discriminating duty on Baltic timber by 5*s.*, keeping the duty at 56*s.*, and to continue the discriminating duty between foreign and colonial timber to the extent of 30*s.*, by imposing a new duty of 10*s.* on timber, the growth of the Canadas, thus leaving the duty on colonial timber at 20*s.*, and that on foreign timber to 50*s.* Now, I admit, that this alteration would have produced a larger amount of revenue, but, at the same time, I am prepared to contend, if the country can make any remission of taxation, that there is not a single article in the tariff upon which a reduction of the duty would tell with greater effect in encouraging the industry of the country, than the article of timber. I say, therefore, that I am surprised at the hostility which has been shown to my proposition by the other side of the House. Gentlemen opposite profess a great respect for the opinions of Mr. Deacon Hume. Now, what does Mr. Deacon Hume say on the subject of a reduction of the timber duties? He tells you that—"if the country could afford to give up the whole amount of the timber duty, there is not one other article to which I would sooner give perfect freedom from duty in this country than wood. We possess iron and coal, and we have not got wood, and our case would be complete with the three. We act towards wood, as France acts towards iron."

Sir, the ancient policy of this country was to encourage the importation of timber, at a nominal or a very small duty, as was recommended by Mr. Deacon Hume. Up to 1795, in the midst of war, the whole duty on foreign timber was only 6*s.* 8*d.* the load of cubic feet; the governments of that day considering wood in the light of a raw material entering into almost every species of manufactures, and consequently deeming it expedient that a low duty should be imposed. It was not, therefore, until the hottest of the war that wood was subjected to increased taxation. Why then, Sir, is not my proposal in accordance with the ancient principles of our taxation? at the same time, that it is calculated to benefit the consumer, and confer a greater benefit on him than he could obtain from the proposition of the right hon. gentleman. I again, then, repeat my conviction, that if I can secure a tax on the property of the country, and reduce the timber duty, I shall do more to restore activity in our trade and commerce, and to benefit the population of the country generally, than by any single measure that I could propose to parliament. And before hon. gentlemen decide on this point, I wish they would read the evidence given before a committee of this House, with respect to fisheries. They will find, by reference to the reports of the committees on import duties, in 1805 and in 1840, that our fishermen are represented to be subject to very great disadvantages in consequence of the existence of this timber duty. I would refer gentlemen, especially, to the evidence given by Mr. John Mitchell. Let them attentively consider what he says, as to the superiority of the dwellings of the humbler classes of Norway to those of our own country, arising solely from the cheapness of wood. Then, again, I would ask gentleman to read the evidence as to ship-building. They will find it stated, under that head, that the timber duties are acting most injuriously to the interests of our ship-builders, and that even the trade of the country in ship-building is leaving us, on account of the existence of these duties. Therefore, I say, that although under my proposition, so much may not be got for revenue, yet the reduction of the duty on colonial timber to a nominal amount, and the reduction of the duty on foreign timber from 55s. to 30s. is one of the best measures for the consumer, the shipbuilder, and the country generally, that it would almost be possible for me to propose. But, Sir, it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite, that I take a gloomy view of the state of our finances, and that I hold to the opinion that there is no mode of redeeming lost ground but by the imposition of an Income-tax. Now, I say no such thing. I have all along said, that I believed the energies of the country are not exhausted, and that they only require time to revive. I could, had I so pleased, have gone back to articles from which the taxes have been removed, or have imposed additional taxes on what is already taxed. But I do not think it would be desirable to add to the extra 5 per cent. imposed last year upon articles of customs and excise. The right hon. gentleman opposite dwelt at some length upon the question of revenue to be derived from a duty on corn. He also adopted a very triumphant tone in referring to the amount received from sugar. Now, Sir, I do not think the right hon. gentleman can be permitted to take credit to himself for the additional amount derived from sugar. That additional duty was received from sources which were quite unexpected, and which certainly do not bear out the position that any credit attaches to the right hon. gentleman therefrom. Sir, I will take the revenue of last year, and strike off the sums received upon corn and sugar. The right hon. gentleman levied an additional duty of 5 per cent. on articles of customs and excise. Now, deducting the amounts received on corn and sugar, I find that the revenue from these sources in 1840, was £17,532,000. In 1842, after the imposition of the additional duty of 5 per cent., the revenue was £17,906,000; but the sum ought to have been £18,409,000, if the right hon. gentleman's expectations of the proceeds from his additional 5 per cent. had been satisfactorily realised. From this I infer, that with respect to customs and excise duties, we have almost arrived at the limits of taxation, and that it would not be wise to lay on any further duties. Well, then, Sir, if I go back to other articles, on which duty is or was received, I have no doubt but that I might have obtained the consent of the House of Commons to an additional duty, or to the reimposition of a duty not now existing. But I think, that it is more just at once to resort to a Property-tax than to seek to reimpose such burdens. I take the case of salt and leather. Now, I have no doubt a large revenue might be derived from either of these sources, and I have no doubt, also, that a large revenue might have been derived from a duty upon beer. But I do say, that I consider it more just and more politic to meet the difficulty at once, by proposing a tax upon incomes, than by reviving indirect taxes, which entail a heavy expense in collecting, and which cannot be imposed without greatly disturbing the trade and manufactures of the country. The scheme I propose is certainly liable to neither of these objections. I solve the difficulty by the Income-tax, at the same time that I relieve the consumer by reducing the taxation upon articles of general consumption. Now, the chief objections to my scheme have been enumerated by the hon. gentleman opposite, the member for Liskeard. The first objection of that hon. gentleman was a curious one. He objected to the tax, because the people would be enabled to see what was taken out of their pockets. Now, this is exactly so. An Income-tax is very sensibly felt in its operation. Taxes on articles do not come home so directly—a tax on salt or beer, for instance, would by no means be felt so sensibly. But then I am certainly surprised to hear this sort of argument urged on the other side, where it has always hitherto, I believe, been held, that the people ought to know exactly what they were called upon to pay. But then, Sir, it is said, that the public credit is shaken by my proposition. Now, certainly I see no such effect. I look at the state of the public funds, and I find that since my proposal was made, nothing has at all occurred presenting any indication that the public credit of the country is shaken. Then the next objection is, that a tax upon incomes has a great tendency to drive people from England. Why, has not the present system of taxation a tendency to drive people out of the country quite as great as the Income-tax? What is there at present to prevent the great landed proprietors of this country from living abroad, and from thereby escaping the effects of both direct and indirect taxation? But what I propose is, that those classes should be subjected to a direct contribution to the revenue, and from that contribution I apprehend they cannot possibly escape. At least, then, my scheme has this advantage, that I call on him, who chooses either for his amusement or pleasure to travel abroad and evade taxation on consumption at home, to contribute his fair proportion towards the revenue of this country. But I do even more, I offer an inducement for the absentees to return. I propose by the amended tariff to reduce the cost of living in this country, which has hitherto, with a certain class at least, been the reason for residence abroad. I expect, that the result of the new tariff will be to reduce the cost of articles of consumption in this country; and let me ask, will not this have a tendency to induce absentees to return? I say it will. If by removing prohibitory duties, and reducing the scale of duties generally, I reduce the cost of living, I contend, that instead of driving capital out of the country, the general tendency of my measure will be to induce absentees to return, and insuring their remaining when once they come back. The hon. gentleman, the member for Bath, and also the hon. gentleman, the member for Liskeard, have addressed themselves to what they style the gross injustice of this tax. They say, they are content a tax should be imposed on property, but they object to its imposition on incomes—that is to say, to its being derived from parties whose receipts arise from professions or trades. [Mr. Roebuck: I objected to the rate being the same on the two species of income.] That objection cannot, I am afraid, be removed. The hon. gentleman did not object to the imposition, and he made no objections to the disclosure of the amount of an income. The hon. gentleman was singular in that opinion, for every one else who spoke on the same side with the hon. gentleman has contended that, with regard to incomes derived from trade or professions, the tax is most objectionable, and that not, be it remembered, so much on account of the amount of the tax itself, as on account of the inquisition it establishes. The objection, therefore, of the hon. and learned gentleman, the member for Bath, is not that which has been urged by the great body of those who have addressed the House upon the subject. Now, Sir, when I really look at the object of this tax, I cannot admit the force of that objection against it. And I cannot bring myself to think that it would be fair or just to impose the whole, or, at all events, the greater portion of this tax upon incomes derived from land alone. And, Sir, I am not singular, in entertaining that opinion. Lord Althorp also held the same opinion, and expressed it in the following terms:—"Much has been said about a Property-tax, and he believed that on that point he differed considerably from his friends about him. Still he had no hesitation in saying that to grant relief to the productive population by a reduction of taxes, and to impose a Property-tax to meet the deficiency thus occasioned, would be a very good measure. That was his own individual opinion. The gallant general (General Gascoyne) might perhaps say, that his present opinions were inconsistent with his former opinions, and he would admit that it might seem to many that he was inconsistent. But the country was now in a situation very different from that in which it was formerly placed, and he would say to the landowner, that if a Property-tax of 10 per cent. were imposed, he would be the gainer, because he thought that the landowner, in consequence of the existing distress and the large sums which he was obliged to advance for the maintenance of the poor, lost considerably more than 10 per cent. on his rents."

Such, then, was the opinion of Lord Althorp upon the subject of a Property-tax. But now, Sir, what again is the object of this tax which I propose? It is simply to call upon all persons of a certain income to make, for a limited period, out of that income, a contribution for the public good. It is contended that it is unjust to tax all incomes at the same rate, and that there ought to be a distinction made between the kind of income and the source from which it is derived. But, Sir, it appears to me, that if the exemptions which have been suggested were to be carried into effect, this tax would be altogether inefficient. I think a tax so assessed had better not be imposed at all. And let me ask the House what tax ever was imposed that was not objected to, on account of its inequality? What was the beer-tax—the house-tax—the window-tax—what were the assessed taxes, when first imposed? Are all these taxes just in every one's eyes? Must not all taxes—direct or indirect—bear unequally upon those who pay them? Take the case of the professional man. I think the professional man might urge good arguments against the justice of the assessed taxes. I show you that the owner of what you call permanent capital has the greatest facilities for evading the tax. He can remove to the Continent, and draw his income as he requires it; but the professional man—the lawyer for instance, or the medical man—is compelled to remain in this country, and to submit to the indirect taxation which prevails. All indirect taxation has a natural tendency to produce injustice, and I have ever thought that the chief argument relied on in opposition to the taxation of articles of consumption was, that if beer, or any other such article, were exposed to it, the tax always operated unjustly. You say that income derived from fixed property ought to be made subject to the tax I propose, but that income, drawn from professional exertion and the operations of trade, ought not to be taxed, partly owing to the inquisitorial nature of the tax itself, and partly from the nature of such property. But is it meant that the officer on half-pay should contribute to the tax, and that the physician of £9,000 or £10,000 a-year should not? You say that terminable annuitants ought not to pay the same rate as landed proprietors; but would you say that a widow who has a jointure—a fixed sum per annum—which terminates with her life—would you say that she should pay the same amount? Again, with regard to life interests in estates, is there to be no difference between an estate in fee-simple and a life interest in a landed estate? If I have a life interest in an estate that has to pass to a distant relative who feels no particular interest in me, is it to be calculated what my interest in such estate may be? If I compare my position with that of a man holding his property in fee-simple, and who can charge it as he pleases, surely there is a vast difference in the comparative value of our interests; and I say again, that, looking to the Income-tax as a measure that would have to be resorted to in time of war, and looking at the necessity of imposing perhaps a 10 per cent. tax, rather than resorting to a system of borrowing and funding, it would be much better to abandon it altogether, rather than make a large number of exemptions. Or, suppose I am endeavouring to make a provision for my wife and children out of my life interest, do you say that I am to be equally taxed in that case? Then, what will you do with the clergy? If your principle is to be adopted, the clergy must all be exempt from taxation. It is quite clear that they must. How is a clergyman differently situated from an annuitant for a term of years? He has a certain income, which he holds for his life, with certain onerous duties to perform. The property is an enduring one, but his interest in it is only a life interest. Take the case of two brothers. Suppose one brother invests £5,000 in the funds, and receives his 3½ per cent., and that the other purchases a living, making a higher interest for his money, am I to make a reduction in this case? [A voice, "Yes."] The hon. member says, yes; then I say if I am to make that calculation in every case, I had much better abandon the system altogether. For to do so would be virtually abandoning the principle of making every man contribute in accordance with his means. Suppose I buy an annuity from an insurance-office, or suppose the case of a single man, who, wishing to enjoy a large income, sinks the whole of his money in the purchase of an annuity, am I to deal with him in the manner suggested by the hon. and learned gentleman? [Mr. Roebuck assented.] Well, then, I must say, that, after these admissions of the hon. and learned member, which I have been anxious to draw from him, and as to which I knew he was far too logical a reasoner not to acknowledge the connection of each of these cases with the other—if you are to proceed upon the principle he lays down, then I say that the inquisition under his plan will be ten times worse than that I propose under the present system. I do hope that I have now stated all the grounds on which I am of opinion that, if you establish this tax, you ought not to make any exemptions. Upon these grounds I have proposed this plan. I never said I should make no modification in the details; on the contrary, I have stated the modifications with respect to the mode of collection which I was willing to adopt; but I do again declare, that with respect to the main principle—namely, the levying of 7d. per pound on incomes above £150, I must urge it upon the adoption of the House, fearing exceedingly the consequences of abatements and exemptions of the nature that have been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Then, Sir, I am told, another great objection to this tax is, that it encourages perjury and fraud; but I should like to know what is the tendency of indirect taxation. I should like to know what is the tendency of excise duties. I should like to know what is the tendency of all the excise regulations as to distilleries. Taxation, I take it, is inevitable. Taxes we must have. Sir, I perfectly agree with the hon. and learned member for Bath, that nothing can be more frivolous or absurd than the extreme sensitiveness as to what a man's income may be. I believe that a very good estimate is usually formed of the state of men's circumstances by those who care about inquiring into other men's property, and the state of their credit. There is a keen and quick instinct in such parties, which enables them to ascertain, without much difficulty, what their neighbours, or those with whom they may happen to have dealings, are worth, and as to the terrors of the inquisition, which I propose, into men's private affairs, it is mere folly, if men will only act honestly, and make bond fide returns. Sir, I do not believe that the tremendous consequences apprehended by the hon. gentleman opposite will follow the disclosure which will be required to be made, and I cannot suppose that any one will subject himself to inconvenience or embarrassment by being guilty of a fraud of this kind for the sake of £3 or £4. For my own part, I entertain a higher opinion of the integrity and fair dealing of the people of this country, than to suppose that an advantage of such an amount as £2 18s. in the £100, could operate as a temptation to perjury or fraud; but, at all events, as I said before, whatever may be the inconvenience attending direct taxation, depend upon it that it is better than resorting to that description of indirect taxation which leads to smuggling, and affords equal, if not greater, temptation, for fraud and perjury. Sir, I say, as I have already stated, that I do not propose an Income-tax for the mere and single purpose of making good the deficiency, but that I propose it concurrently with meeting the deficit in the revenue, to enable me to make extensive alterations in our tariff. There has been a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to undervalue the changes I propose making in our tariff; but I am happy to say that the hon. member for Bolton—and no one is better informed on the subject than that hon. gentleman—does not join with those who have evinced such a disposition; for he says, candidly and fairly, that the alterations in the duties which I propose, are not only extensive but important. He undoubtedly says, I have omitted corn and sugar; but, in every other respect, he admits that the changes I propose are calculated to encourage the industry, the trade, and commerce of the country; and on these grounds bears his testimony to the value of these changes. Now, what are the changes which I propose, and what is the exact position in which I stand? I am met by conflicting statements from all sides; and the hon. gentleman the member for Sheffield says, that, though I remove prohibitions with respect to the import of cattle, that such a change will be of no advantage, because cattle cannot be bought on the Continent. But it is, I think it will be, acknowledged, impossible for me to proceed on such a supposition. Well, but what is it I do? Why, I permit both salt and fresh meat to come in; but what the hon. and learned gentleman says is, that even though I do so, it will be of no advantage to the consumer in this country, because no foreign cattle can be obtained, and that the calves are not yet born. Sir, I hope that hon. friends of mine on this side of the House, who have expressed some alarm on this part of the subject, have attended to the statement of the hon. and learned gentleman as to the demand for cattle on the Continent absorbing the supply. From the hon. and learned gentleman's showing, it is clear that these apprehensions are groundless, and it must, I think, be admitted, that, as far as I am concerned, I can do no more than I have done—that is, to increase the facilities for the importation of foreign cattle. It is, Sir, I think, unnecessary to look at the demand for cattle in France, or any other country, but if we merely advert to the number of cattle sold in Smithfield alone during the last year, and if we found that as many as 167,000 oxen were sold in Smithfield in a single year, I think the impossibility of bringing foreign cattle into competition with the superior animals of this country, must be admitted: and, with such a fact before them, I must say that I consider the apprehensions of my hon. friends altogether groundless. Now, with respect to salt meat, will not the admission of salt meat afford great facilities to commerce, at least, as regards the fitting out of ships? Great frauds have been practised with respect to the provisioning of ships. The uniform practice was to take the salted foreign meat out of bond, giving a sort of guarantee that it should be landed in a foreign port, but it, nevertheless, is applied to provisioning the ship. The danger of a serious interference with fresh meat is very absurd. I do not overrate the benefits to be derived in the cheapening of provisions; but I do think those persons in Scotland and Ireland who entertain apprehensions on this subject, greatly overrate the evil consequences that may result from permitting foreign meat to be brought into the London market. I propose to remove every prohibition, then, on articles of provision. Look, again, at what I propose on the article of foreign wood. I have reduced to almost nominal amounts the duties on foreign woods. I believe, that the consequence will be, that new establishments will grow up in this country for the manufacture of articles of furniture. We labour at present under very great disadvantages in competing with foreigners in this respect. It will, therefore, be a very great advantage to have the duty on foreign woods, so materially reduced. I reduce the duty on every article of foreign wood, with one exception; and I trust, that by a treaty with Brazil, I shall be enabled to reduce the duty on that article also—I mean the article of rosewood. But then I am told, you should not proceed on this principle—you should proceed on the principle of remitting the duty upon articles of foreign production in every case, entirely regardless of what a foreign country may do. I am not altogether prepared to say, that it may not be good policy to buy at the cheapest market, without reference to the conduct of other nations. But, at the same time, it cannot be denied, that it would be a great advantage to us if we could get, when we make a reduction in our own duties, a corresponding advantage in return. We have every right to ask for it. For instance, it would be a great advantage to this country to receive the brandy of France at a much cheaper rate. I think its consumption would be very great. I believe France would derive great advantages from a remission of the duty; but it is quite clear, that France would derive as great advantage by permitting the introduction, at a moderate duty, of the manufactures of Sheffield, and I hope the people of France will feel that to buy cheap goods at Sheffield, would itself be of great advantage; but to act conjointly, with reciprocal advantages, would be better still. Then, with respect to the remission of the duty on timber, I do not mean to say that, abstractedly, it would not be a good thing to buy cheap timber in the Baltic, but I am sure there will be a greater demand for our goods in Norway and Sweden; and I do hope, that those countries which are concerned in the Prussian league will be convinced of the benefit of the mutual interchange of commodities, and that Sardinia, Brazil, Portugal, and Spain, will see the advantage of a great reduction of duties. That a reduction of duty should take place in foreign countries cannot be denied; that to give every access to the manufactures of this country would be a great advantage to them, I am ready to prove, and therefore I object to precipitate reductions of duty here, without attempting to obtain an equivalent corresponding reduction of duty on our own articles. That is the ground upon which I proceed. Look, again, at the reduction of the duty on oils, on drugs, on resin, on all those articles which constitute the raw material of manufactures. Who will be injured by that reduction? Look, again, at the reduction in skins and furs. I remit the duty. What is the effect of maintaining it so high as at present? It sounds like a prohibitory duty; but it does not act so. What is the use of maintaining a 30 per cent. prohibition, when the smuggler will undertake to deliver the article at an increase on its cost price of 10 per cent.? The advantage of the high duty goes into the pocket of the smuggler. Consequently, the moderate reduction of these prohibitory duties will be a positive advantage to the manufacturer, for it will enable him to know exactly and at once what he has to compete with. Take, again, the article of gloves; it is quite impossible to prevent the foreign import of such an article, because the smuggler, while the prohibitory duty exists, will find the means of evading the law. I also repeal the duty on manufactured leather,—on shoes and boots. In short, look through the whole of this tariff, and I venture to say it must, if the House sanctions it, tend greatly to reduce the cost of consumption. An hon. friend of mine has, within these few days, informed me that the union, of which he is one of the guardians, have entered into a contract for the supply of the work-house, 20 per cent. cheaper this year than the contract of last year, in consequence of the reduction of prices anticipated from the new tariff. On the other hand it seems that those who have hitherto produced those articles in this country will be injured by the alteration; but if you make a great reduction, not, I would say, in the amount of the poor-rates, but in the cost of living, on account of which the poor-rates have been kept high, those parties will derive considerable assistance from that reduction. I may observe, here, that there has been a tendency of late years to increase the poor-rates on account of the high prices of provisions. With respect to the colonial question, an hon. gentleman taunted me with the determination to urge all these propositions, without alteration, merely because I have a majority. But, because I am in possession of a majority, I am inclined to listen to any reasonable propositions of amendment. In propounding an extensive commercial tariff of this kind, embracing 1,200 articles, I do not deny that some improvements may be suggested; and if, on reviewing the proposals I have made, I shall be convinced that I have laboured under an error, no sense of shame shall deter me from at once consenting to modify the proposition. This, however, I must say, I have paid great attention to what has been said during these debates, and I have not heard anything which has convinced me that what I have proposed is not a very great advantage. If the reduction of duties on the raw material, and on articles half-manufactured, and speaking generally, if the great principle of the tariff be adopted, I have a very confident hope that it will tend to the improvement of trade. [Viscount Howick: You retain the principle of differential duties?] If the noble viscount will allow me, I will explain that in due time. I cannot say that there ought to be no differential duties between the produce of the colonies and foreign countries. Nay, more, I must say, that if you look properly at the relations between yourselves and the colonies, you must consider your colonies entitled to be put on a different footing from foreign countries, and that it is only perfectly fair to give to articles of colonial production a preference in your markets over articles the produce of foreign countries. I am disposed to think even, that you ought to carry the principle of assimilation, if you can, so far, as to consider the colonies an integral part of the empire for all commercial purposes. I think the application of a discriminating duty on colonial articles, as compared with foreign, to be founded on sound principles. The arguments which have seemed to make a great impression against this doctrine have not convinced me. This, I say, that where a colonial and foreign article enters into competition, when the article is not produced in this country, there the differential duty tells in favour of the consumer. Suppose there are only two producers, the foreigner and the colony, and that the article is not at present one of colonial produce, such as that on which the right hon. gentleman has been so facetious, Eau de Cologne. There the differential duty may introduce fraud—that is a fair subject for consideration—but in respect to the preference of the colonial to the foreign article, the establishment of the differential duty will tell in favour of the consumer here. That is a principle upon which we have been long acting. That was the principle on which you admitted rough rice from the west coasts of Africa on more favourable terms than from America, and brought us into difficulty. The equalisation of the previously discriminating duties on East and West-India rum and sugar, proceeded on this principle; the differential duty on timber, on corn, on sugar, proceeded on this principle; and I will undertake to show you that, so far from this being a new principle, there are at this moment, sixty or seventy articles and more, on which this principle is acted upon. In reference to those articles which are bonâ fide the produce of our colonies, I will admit that a differential duty ought to be maintained, considering the disadvantages under which our colonies labour, as to the introduction of our manufactures; but, as to the application of a differential duty in every case to the colonies, I shall reserve to myself the full opportunity of considering the question, and if I shall think the reasons assigned for an alteration of the tariff in this respect valid, I shall have no difficulty in making that alteration. With respect to the duty on tobacco, the produce of the East Indies, I should wish also to reserve to myself a full opportunity of considering the objections that have been urged to my proposition, and I shall not have the slightest difficulty, if I see reason, to make any alteration. Sir, I am not aware that there is any other point on which it is necessary for me to make any observations. I am quite conscious of the difficulty of the task which I and those with whom I act have undertaken; there are many of these, and not merely in reference to the tariff. It is impossible to deny that on our accession to office, we found many difficulties before us. We found war in the north-west of India—we found the Chinese excited to hostilities against this country—we found—I deeply regret to say it—a spirit, I will not call it hostility, but of jealousy, existing between France and this country,—a spirit which has arisen of late years, and which is deeply to be deprecated. It is of the utmost importance that the good-will which had previously for some years existed between this country and France should be revived—a good understanding—an amicable relation between this country and France, and the increased commercial intercourse between them, is obviously of the utmost importance, but, at the same time, it is felt that no concessions inconsistent with the honour or welfare of this country ought at any time to be made, even for the purpose of obtaining so desirable an end. As the causes of disunion are now removed, as the five powers, in respect to the Eastern question, or acting in concert, with united counsels, I earnestly hope that the good feeling which before existed between us and France will be completely revived. I think it impossible to deny that we found our relations with the United States in an unsatisfactory state, there having been for a long series of years unsettled causes of disunion, which we are doing our best to bring to a satisfactory determination. Above all, I think it cannot be denied, that we found the finances of this country in an unsatisfactory condition; and it has been our duty to apply ourselves to the proposal of those measures which we conceived to be the best calculated to replace those finances on a sound and proper basis. It has been made a charge against me, that I declared that the measure for the imposition of the Income-tax is not only proposed with the whole authority of the government, but that it is a measure in which the fate of the government is involved. On this point I might have thought it almost unnecessary to have made any declaration. Is it to be supposed possible that I could, in the present state of the affairs of this country, propose such a measure as that which I have proposed, without considering the fate of the government involved in the decision of the House of Commons upon it? To have made such a declaration appears to me to be scarcely necessary. I do propose it—I speak not of minor details, but of the measure itself, as the basis of the financial and commercial policy of the country; and as a measure which I never could have consented to propose if I did not manifest my conviction of its necessity by risking my fate as a minister on it. The more I consider the subject, the more deeply am I convinced that this measure, and the measures which accompany it, are necessary for the welfare of this country. I relinquished office in 1835, because I could not consistently acquiesce in a principle which I felt to be not founded in justice. I propose now a great measure, and if the House of Commons should overrule my proposal, I shall retire with perfect content, and with the consciousness that I have discharged the duty I owe to my country, by proposing a measure which has been characterised by one of my opponents as a bold, as a direct, as an honest measure. If these be the characteristics of it, it is suited to the exigencies of the present time. This is a period in which you do require that the measures proposed should be bold, direct, and honest. The measure may be rejected now. The attempts which are made to dissatisfy those interests whom I am supposed to have affected—to unite them in opposition to this Income-tax, may possibly prevail. I doubt it. I doubt whether there will not be on the part of the country a conviction, that the time is come when a vigorous exertion must be made—that the time is come when it is for the interest of property that property should bear the burden. My opinions may be overruled, and yet I have a confident belief that what occurred in 1835 may occur again; and that after the lapse of a short time—after making ineffectual attempts to repair the deficiency by other means—by resorting to indirect taxation, it will be ultimately acknowledged that the measure which I now propose is founded on reason and justice, and, though once rejected, ought to be adopted. But my conviction is that you, acting in consonance with the prevailing feeling of the country, will now adopt the measure, and that you will thereby give a proof to foreign countries—not that our resources are exhausted—but that you will not draw delusive distinctions between times of war and times of peace, but construe the times according to their necessities; and, disregarding plausible statements, you will, in a great financial exigency, adopt a bold, a direct, and an honest measure, which, so far from being misconstrued by foreign countries, will be hailed by them as a proof that the ancient vigour and energy of this people are yet alive, and that, whatever the difficulties they may be placed in, they are ready to triumph over them by the power of that vigour and that energy.

After several divisions, the question that the Chairman do report progress, was agreed to; the House resumed. Committee to sit again on Monday, April 4.

APRIL 4, 1842.

In reply to a question by Mr. J. Duncombe—

SIR R. PERL said, the hon. gentleman had asked him whether it had ever crossed his mind to postpone the consideration of the tariff, after he should have obtained the sense of the House in favour of an Income-tax. Without hesitation, he would answer that question by saying, that it never had crossed his mind to do any such thing. Some little delay had been found necessary before bringing on the discussion of the tariff, but he was sure the House would, when the matter was explained, readily acquiesce in the propriety of that delay. Many important interests would be seriously affected by the alterations proposed, and it was considered but just to give the parties an opportunity to have the subject duly weighed before the measure was introduced, in order that the tariff might undergo such changes as circumstances seemed to demand. He had great hope that, on Monday next, he should be able to introduce the tariff so amended; and he thought he could state with confidence that it would be considered by an immense majority of the House that, in the amended tariff, they had, in all its essentials, adhered to the principles of the original tariff. The delay between this and Monday arose solely from a wish on the part of the government to hear the statements of those affected; still he was justified in saying none of the alterations would be considered as a departure from the general principle of the measure. He trusted that because of these few days' delay, the House would not refuse its consent to this preliminary resolution on which to found his measure for an Income-tax. It was very important that he should have leave to bring in the bill, in which the details and machinery of the measure would be distinctly set forth. The amended tariff must be in possession of the House before they would be called on to vote for the second reading of this bill. If then the House should consider that there was any departure from the general principles of the tariff, after passing this resolution, it would be perfectly open to the House to withhold its assent to the second reading of this measure, and reject it altogether. With respect to the delay of a few days, he had already stated that such a notion had never entered into his head as that imputed to him by the hon. gentleman's observations opposite. It was quite clear that by the general reduction of the duties he had proposed, an important question arose as to the necessity of an Income-tax. The proposed reduction in the duties would involve a sum of £1,000,000 or £1,200,000; under which circumstances a little delay might not be considered unadvisable. He thought that hon. gentlemen could not accuse him of entertaining any such notion as, when endeavouring to get the House to pass this Income-tax, at the same time to be voluntarily engaged as a party to the postponement of the tariff. He had acted throughout with the most perfect good faith, and he did not think by the short postponement of the tariff, that they had any reason whatever for refusing their consent to this preliminary resolution, which was necessary to have passed, to form a foundation for the introduction of the bill. The House should bear in mind that it would have the fullest opportunity of recording their dissent against the principle of this bill in its future stages. The hon. gentleman, the member for Monmouth, had said, that the proposition of an Income tax had met with universal execration. Now his (Sir R. Peel's) impression was totally and entirely different. He, on the contrary, considered that the proposition had been received with general and universal approbation throughout the kingdom. He would not, however, quarrel with the hon. gentleman on this subject; but he begged to assure the House that, from the numerous communications which had been made to him, he thought there was a very strong and general impression among the commercial, manufacturing, and trading communities, since the commercial tariff and commercial policy of the country was made known, that they hoped to derive the greatest advantages from the passing of the measure, which would conduce, in a great degree, to the interests and prosperity of the country. After having delayed proceeding with the measure until after the holidays, in order that that tremendous burst of indignation which had been anticipated by hon. gentlemen opposite, might be allowed to have effect, every opportunity had been given for this tremendous demonstration. And if hon. gentlemen opposite were satisfied at this loud explosion of public indignation on the subject, he could assure them he was equally well satisfied. They could then approach the consideration of the question with mutual satisfaction, as each party had gained their end.

The House then went into committee, and the first resolution was read and agreed to. The chairman having read the second branch of the resolution, a discussion ensued as to whether the first resolution had been agreed to or not, several hon. members protesting that they were not aware the resolution had been put from the chair.

SIR R. PEEL: I hope the House will bear in mind the two speeches which have just been delivered on this subject; I mean the speech of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Hope Johnstone,) and that of the other hon. gentleman, the member for Finsbury, (Mr. Wakley.) The latter gentleman seems to hint that favour was shown to agricultural income, for the purpose of conciliating political opponents; and spoke of rumours being afloat, that the present proposition was brought forward for that purpose. On the other hand, my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Johnstone) contends, that it is unjust to the agricultural tenants to assume that their income ought to be estimated at one half the rental, and denies that such is the case, as regards that class of persons in Scotland. I hope that the conflicting opinions contained in these two speeches will serve to convince the House that it was the intention of government to attempt to deal out an equal measure of justice to all parties. I can, at all events, assure those hon. gentlemen, and also the House, which I hope will support me in carrying through the measure successfully, that in making the proposition there was no intention to conciliate any political parties in the country, the only object being to deal as fairly as possible between the producer and the consumer. I am relieved by the speech of the hon. member for Finsbury, from some difficulty which I might have, in answering various communications I have received, the whole tenor of which was, that the proposed financial scheme went wholly in favour of the manufacturer, and dealt with much injustice by the agriculturists. It will afford some satisfaction to the parties so complaining, to hear from the hon. member for Finsbury that there will be no material reduction in the price of corn, and that upon this point the agricultural classes are labouring under a delusion. The statements of the hon. gentleman are so completely different from the communications which I have received, that I owe him some acknowledgment for assisting me to dispel the alarm which existed on the part of the agricultural body. The hon. gentleman dwelt strongly upon the favour which the proposition conferred upon the agriculturists, as compared with the manner in which it would operate upon manufacturers, and the hardship to which those latter would be subjected by a scrutiny into their trade. I hold in my hand a statement made to the government on the part of the farmers with respect to the proposed financial plan. This document states that they have never, with the exception of one or two favourable years, made a profit on their farms, including the interest of their capital, nearly equal to half their rents, and that for the last six years there has been a succession of bad crops, which has made the return for their labour and outlay very inadequate. They conclude by saying, that they do not object to an Income-tax, that they are quite willing to pay their fair proportion of the necessary burdens of the State, and that all they desire is, that they should not be dealt with according to an arbitrary rule, different from that applied to other branches of the community, and which, in their own individual case, they think would be attended with injustice, affecting not only themselves but the public at large. The hon. gentleman opposite says I am unjust to the agricultural interest. To what part of them is that observation meant to apply? [Mr. Wallace: To my own country.] Oh! to your own country only. The manner in which, in former periods, the Income-tax has been applied to those engaged in agricultural pursuits, has been, by calculating the profits of the farmer on a certain proportion which they have been assumed to bear to the rent. That proportion I reduce from three-fourths to one-half, from a perfect conviction that the rent of the farmer has been raised in proportion to his profits, and because I do believe that reduction to be consistent with justice. I am quite willing to admit, that there are circumstances in respect to Scotland, which may make some difference. There are modifications in the act of 1806, which apply to the Scottish farmers. Allowances were made to them on account of the exemption of the land from the payment of tithe. There are also circumstances, I am ready to admit, as to the mode in which county and local charges are borne in England and Scotland, which require some consideration. All I can state is, that I wish to put the Scottish farmer as nearly as may be on the same footing as the English farmer, which is, I think, demanded by justice. I apprehend the peculiarity of the case is, that local charges in that country being generally borne by the landlord, and in England by the tenant, that constitutes a reason why a difference was made in the former act; and I readily admit, that it would not be quite fair to tax the tenants of the two countries in precisely the same ratio. With respect to the general question of imposing this tax, I find throughout the country, as I have said in the course of this evening, a strong sense of the necessity of some vigorous exertion for the restoration of the national finances. I find also, I must say, that interest felt in the maintenance of public credit, which induces all parties to come forward with cheerfulness, and take their share in the burdens which may be necessary for this purpose. When it comes to the question of imposing taxes, I must say, I think it highly creditable to this country that there is a generally prevailing inclination to make an exertion for the maintenance of national honour and good faith. I must say also, of the agricultural interest in particular, that I have found among them the greatest willingness to bear their part of taxation, and I am perfectly certain that the prevalence of that feeling will ensure ultimate success to this attempt to equalise the expenditure with the income of government. At the same time, however, I must say, that concurrently with that general acquiescence, there is on the part of every interest in the country a universal desire to remonstrate against any interference with them, each saying that they are the part of the community which is most hardly treated by the tax. The hon. gentleman opposite says, for instance, that there is no reduction in the protection to articles of food, corresponding with the reduction which I propose in articles of manufacture. It was impossible for me, in dealing with interests so extensive and so complicated, not to anticipate that I should receive remonstrances of that kind. But the consolation which I and my colleagues have is this—the consciousness that in dealing with those interests we have attempted to do justice, and not to conciliate support. The hon. gentleman the member for Manchester said at one time that he was perfectly convinced this tax would be a permanent one, and at another time he said he was perfectly convinced the outcry against it would be so great that a repeal must immediately take place. He said I had promised a repeal of the tax at the end of five years. I begged to remind him of what I really did say. I said I thought a fair experiment could not be made with respect to the tariff in less than five years; but at the same time I proposed that the duration of the tax should be limited to three years, and I reserved to parliament the full power of determining whether or not the tax should be continued. That was the statement I made; but I am perfectly certain, if the tax should receive that strong opposition with which I am threatened by gentlemen on the other side, and if the general sense of the country be decidedly against it, that, at the end of three years, parliament will be unwilling to continue it; but if no such aversion to it should be manifested, then I must say, I hope, that at the end of the period of three years, parliament will consent to the continuance of it for such a period as the public exigencies may require, and it will be for parliament itself to determine the length of that period on a comparison of the advantages of the tax with its inconveniences. Feeling every confidence that the reduction which I propose in the protective duties will afford ample scope to the development of the energies of the community, I entertain the hope, that unless circumstances not now foreseen should arise, there may be an opportunity of putting an end to this tax at the expiration of the period of five years to which I have referred, but I have a very strong impression that its imposition in the meantime will be for the general benefit of the whole country. With respect to the reduction of the protective duties on corn, I have always said that I thought there ought to be a corresponding reduction in the protection on manufactured articles. I propose a reduction of the protection on all articles, almost indiscriminately, on corn and provisions, as well as on manufactured goods. I entertain now the confident belief that there will be, from the combined result of all these measures, that which I think will be highly desirable to this country,—a reduction in the general expenditure of the people on articles necessary to their subsistence and to their comforts. We shall then hold out an increased temptation to gentlemen to remain at home, instead of spending their money abroad. I entertain the confident belief that, speaking generally, there will be on account of the reduction in the price of living—a reduction, be it observed, in the benefit of which the agriculturist will participate equally with the manufacturer and the labourer—a pecuniary saving in the amount of weekly, monthly, and annual expenditure, which will compensate, very nearly, if not altogether, for those sums, whatever they may be, which individuals are called upon to contribute on account of the tax of 3 per cent. on their incomes. Sir, I hope that this House, after having discussed the subject, will come to the conclusion which I have formed, and which further reflection has confirmed, that the present situation of the country does require a vigorous exertion to be made, and that the House will consent to enable us to make the experiment of restoring our finances to prosperity, by a tax on the income of the country. If they resolve on an Income-tax, then I hope they will adopt the principle of that Income-tax which has been in force in former years. I hope they will feel, that there can be no distinction expedient in time of peace, in respect of the nature of the income taxed, which might not be appealed to in time of war; and in establishing an Income-tax for a limited time, I hope they will take special care not to establish any precedent which would have a tendency to impair the efficiency of that instrument which you may be compelled to call into action in time of war, and on which your chief reliance may, perhaps, be placed, for enabling you to make the income of the country in time of war in some degree correspond with its expenditure. I trust the House will never lose sight of the importance of keeping this principle unfringed, and if an Income-tax is to be taken, whether in time of peace or of war, I hope the country will see the justice of a proposal to subject the income of individuals to equal taxation. If, in time of peace, you make exceptions in favour of persons holding a life interest, or holding offices, I do say you will be establishing a precedent to which in time of war an appeal may be made with equal justice. I should be inclined, Sir, to doubt the policy of an Income-tax at all, if you could not have resort to it without establishing a precedent which might lead to the most dangerous consequences.

Lord John Russell having replied, the second and third resolutions were agreed to, and the House resumed; report to be brought up on Thursday.

CORN IMPORTATION BILL.

The House in Committee on the 9th clause, relating to the averages. Mr. Childers moved the following clause, in substitution of clause 29:—"That from the passing of this bill up to the 1st day of May, 1843, the duty to be paid on the importation of foreign corn shall be regulated by the averages of those towns only which have hitherto made returns in accordance with the act of 9 Geo. IV.; but that from and after the 1st day of May, 1843, the duty shall be regulated by the averages of all the towns named in the schedule attached to the present bill, unless parliament shall in the meantime otherwise direct."

SIR R. PEEL said, that the hon. member opposite appeared to wish that the existing towns should be retained, and yet he proposed to leave out the only clause by which any towns whatever could be used for the purposes of the measure. If the object of the hon. member were to keep the law as it now existed, with reference to the towns at which averages were to be taken, why did he not move in accordance with such a purpose? If he aimed at keeping the law unaltered, the mode he took of doing so was extraordinary. [Mr. Childers proposed omitting all the words in the present clause for the purpose of substituting another form of words.] The ninth clause was the portion of the bill which the hon. member proposed to leave out altogether. He begged the House to observe what was proposed to be enacted by this part of the bill; the clause ran in these words:—"And whereas it is necessary, for regulating the amount of such duties, that effectual provision should be made for ascertaining from time to time the average prices of British corn; be it therefore enacted, that weekly returns of the purchases and sales of British corn shall be made, collected, and transmitted, in the manner hereinafter directed, in and from the cities and towns named in the schedule of cities and towns annexed to this act."

Now, by the proposition of the hon. member, it was intended to get rid of the averages altogether; in that he could not acquiesce. In support of his argument the hon. member said, that when the price of corn was 66*s.* or 67*s.* no duty whatever ought to be charged, and that her Majesty's government in bringing forward the present measure ought to have so modified the provisions of the bill, as that no duty should be chargeable at a price of 65*s.* or 66*s.* Surely that doctrine was fatal to the principle of a fixed duty, for the supporters of a fixed duty would impose a tax of 8*s.* or 10*s.* at all periods, and in every state of the market; the 8*s.* duty was a penalty attaching to the importation of corn under all circumstances. The hon. member was of opinion that the importation of corn should be free when the price rose to 66*s.*; the government measure provided that it should be so when the price rose to 73*s.*; but the fixed duty scheme would lay on a tax of 8*s.* or 10*s.* even when the price was as high as 73*s.*, or at any price whatever; that certainly must be the effect of a fixed duty. [Mr. Childers said, that under the plan of a fixed duty, corn would never reach to such a price as 72*s.*] But suppose that it should reach such a price, what did hon. members say to that? Could they deny that if it reached 78*s.*, the fixed duty would be the same as if the price were only 53*s.*? That in a certain state of things it would never reach 73*s.* was a mere matter of speculation, which it was very easy to suggest to the hon. member opposite in order to assist him in getting out of the dilemma in which he had placed himself. With respect to the additional towns at which the averages were to be taken, it was a mistake to suppose that the addition of them, or their being wholly omitted, would have the effect of raising the price of corn; the addition would not raise the averages, it would make the system more just. It had been said on the other side, that frauds were practised in both ways—were practised for the purpose of raising prices, and for the purpose of depressing them. On that he should observe, that he had multiplied towns for the purpose of preventing fraud. But then, the hon. member contended, that one fraud balanced another, and that the system, in its working, righted itself. The House surely would not say that one injustice ought to set against another. He did not say, that the frauds were confined to one side, they might be found on both, but he trusted that the effect of the measure which he introduced, would be to prevent sudden fluctuations. Much had been said of the frauds, but he entertained no doubt that they had been greatly exaggerated; admitting, however, that some frauds had been practised, he relied upon the gradual decline of the duty to prevent their continuance, and there might be many faults in the system, besides the frauds. He had been asked, why he had selected the towns contained in the schedule; to that his reply was, that he had selected those towns in fifteen of the chief agricultural and manufacturing districts. If the object was to ascertain what were the real prices of corn, the obvious mode of accomplishing that object could not be any other than to select the principal corn markets of the kingdom. It was true, that he had proposed to continue the Income-tax for three years, then to cease, unless parliament should otherwise determine; but that could form no reason for adopting the principle of the hon. member for one year, unless altered by parliament. He therefore adhered to the proposition he had made as it now stood.

After a short discussion, Mr. Childers signified his intention of not dividing the House till the 29th clause came under consideration.

Mr. Aglionby wished to ask the right hon. baronet whether any new expenses would be incurred by the addition to the number of towns from which the averages were taken, and whether it would not cause an increase, in some shape or another, in the salaries of the excise officers?

Sir Robert Peel.—I am quite sure that if, in procuring a correct account of the averages, any reasonable expenses are incurred, the House will be willing to provide for those expenses. Therefore I do not urge it as a strong argument in favour of the proposed alteration that there will be any saving of the public money produced by the change. There will, however, be such a saving, more particularly when certain existing interests expire. The expense of collecting the averages is at present about £7,000 a year. Now, I think that if excise-officers can assist in performing the duty, the public, by whom they are employed, have a fair claim upon their time. I do not think, therefore, that these new duties will lead to any additional expenses in the way of compensation. But, however this compensation may be awarded, the expenses of collecting the averages will, on the whole, be less under the new system than under the old. I must say, after the statement made by the hon. gentleman, about the price of wheat in the Carlisle market, my opinion of the judgment of Carlisle purchasers will not be higher than it has previously been. Of course, were the qualities of the two bushels of wheat different, the hon. gentleman would have stated it. We are, therefore, informed, that while one bushel of a given article was sold for 3s. 4d., another bushel, within a few yards of it, brought 10s. [Mr. Aglionby: That was the case.] Well, then, it appears that purchasers in Carlisle market, having the sacks open, paid 10s. a bushel for wheat, while within ten yards they could buy an article, the quality of which was equal, for 3s. 4d.

Mr. Aglionby begged to explain that there was a difference in quality. What he wished to show was, that in the same district the quality of corn was so totally different, that one bushel brought only 3s. 4d., while another fetched 10s.

Sir R. Peel: Oh, we on this side of the House understood the hon. gentleman to mean that the qualities were the same, and that in the same market the price of corn was subject to that great variation, and we did, of course, think it most extraordinary that so great a difference of price should prevail between articles equal in quality. With respect to fraud on the averages, I think that under certain circumstances it has been practised to some extent, more extensively, probably, during the last three or four years than previously, and, if there be any great and sudden variation in the duty, these frauds or combinations with a view to influence prices would increase. I use the term fraud as it has been before applied to these transactions, though I cannot myself give them exactly that designation. They are, in fact, speculations entered into, with a view to gaining a profit. The extent of these frauds I likewise think has been exaggerated. Its existence I do not deny, but it has not been committed to the extent mentioned by the hon. gentleman opposite in addressing his constituents. My opinion is that, as was very justly remarked by the noble lord (Worsley), the addition of 140 new towns from which returns of the averages are to be made, will not operate as a complete prevention of frauds; but the addition of these towns will have a further tendency to prevent frauds of another kind—not that of diminishing the duty by raising the price, but the fraud of raising the duty and diminishing the price, which has been practised when large quantities of corn have been sold and parted with for the advantage of high duties. I do not think it is correct to state that the price of corn always varies in proportion to the difference in quality; but the quality is doubtless a material element in determining the price. I should, I believe, be able to show that in counties which are not great corn producers, prices are higher than in those where the best wheat is grown. In Staffordshire, for instance, an inland, manufacturing county, far removed from the influence of operations in foreign corn, the price is higher than in the best wheat-growing counties. I should not be surprised to learn, that in Essex or Northamptonshire the price of corn was higher than in Kent, a maritime county, with the advantage of a fine soil. Much reliance has been placed on the fact, that the wheat in the Liverpool market is of an inferior description, but let it not be forgotten that the greater the influence of those towns, the general trade of which is in the inferior description of wheat, the more diminished will be the influence of those whose trade lies in inferior wheat, from Ireland, Scotland, or elsewhere. An hon. gentleman has produced two samples, one of Scotch and the other of English wheat. Now, if this (pointing to a parcel before him) be a fair specimen of Scotch wheat—and some indignation would, perhaps, be expressed at its being called so—I would again remind you that the more you increase the influence of the good wheat upon the average, the more you diminish that of the inferior; and the more you increase the influence of the inferior the more you diminish that of the superior. And I must say, the introduction of the new towns will have a tendency to increase the influence of the superior article. In order fully to carry out perfectly the principle of the hon. gentleman opposite, he ought to require that, in half the towns, the old inspectors should be retained for a year, in order to ascertain fairly what would be the effect of the increased vigilance of the excise-officers. I do hope that on the whole the House will concur with government, in endeavouring to make the machinery as perfect as they can, and sanction the addition of the new towns to the places from which the averages are to be collected.

Clauses to the 26th were agreed to.

Lord Worsley proposed that the word "ten" be inserted, instead of six, in Clause 27.

Sir R. Peel said, that various propositions on this point had been submitted to the government. Some desired to extend the period to eight weeks, some to ten, others to twelve, whilst certain persons would even prolong it to fifteen. After carefully considering these suggestions, the impression on his mind certainly was, that the proposed extension of time would not operate as a check on fraud; but that, on the contrary, the speculator would derive an advantage from the ability to pour in corn for a more extended period. He had also formed the opinion, that the alteration would operate injuriously to the consumer, by keeping up the duty at a time when the necessities of the country required an importation of corn; and further, he thought, that it would act injuriously to the producers, by subjecting them to a competition at lower rates for a more considerable period than at present. On the whole, therefore, he could not but think that it would be safer to adhere to the six weeks, as proposed in the bill now before them. He could mention instances where the extended period would have a very injurious operation, but as this was a question of detail, on which it was for the committee to decide, he would content himself with the statement he had made of his reason for adhering to the system now existing.

The committee divided on the question that the blank be filled up with the word "six:" Ayes 242; Noes 37; Majority 205.

The schedule as amended was agreed to. The House resumed. Report to be brought up on the next day.

COPYRIGHT.

APRIL 6, 1842.

Viscount Mahon moved the recommittal of this bill. The House having gone into Committee, clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to. On the 3rd clause being read, Mr. Macaulay moved an amendment, to the effect, "That the copyright of every book should endure for the term of forty-two years, or for the natural life of the author."

SIR ROBERT PEEL did not wish to give a vote without stating generally the opinion to which he had come upon the arguments he had heard upon the subject. He had always felt great doubts upon it. He had not hitherto given a vote upon the question, but had resolved to listen with great impartiality to the arguments on both sides, and then to form his own conclusion upon those arguments. His impression hitherto had been, that with respect to the vast majority of cases, the existing protection was sufficient. There might be cases with regard to works of authors, in which some additional protection for literature might be necessary. He had always listened with favour to that suggestion which proposed that in special cases exceptions might be made; and that in the case of great and distinguished men, where a peculiar hardship might arise if the term of the copyright were not extended, some public authority should have the power to extend it. Taking that view of the case, he had moved for a return of the cases in which the Privy Council had extended patent rights. As there appeared to be a tolerably general acquiescence as to the principle upon which the House ought to proceed, and that there ought to be some legislative measure on the subject, he should not press the views upon which he had hitherto felt inclined to act. Having heard the speeches of his noble friend and of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Macaulay), he thought the argument of the right hon. gentleman as to a preference to be given to a certain period of forty-two years, or the life of the author, was an argument which carried conviction with it. The later works of an author were usually superior to his earlier productions, as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) had established, by reference only to the two names of Dryden and Pope; it was in the latter works, that the public had most interest. At the same time he admitted the weight of the argument founded upon the necessity for an author to provide for his family after death, and on this account he should be glad, if possible, to combine the two propositions, and besides the forty-two years of the amendment, to give an author's family a right for seven years after his death. If, however, the question were only between the proposition of his noble friend and the amendment of the right hon. gentleman, he must vote for the latter.

Amendment carried. Lord Mahon then moved the insertion of the words, "and for the further term of seven years, commencing at the time of the authors death." Agreed to, as were also the clauses to 14, and the House resumed.

CORN IMPORTATION—REGULATION OF WAGES.

On the motion that this bill be read a third time, Mr. Cobden rose and moved the following amendment:—"That inasmuch as this House has repeatedly declared, by its votes and the reports of its committees, that it is beyond the power of parliament to regulate the wages of labour in this country, it is inexpedient and unjust to pass a law to regulate, with a view to raise unnaturally, the prices of food."

SIR ROBERT PEEL assured the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cobden) that he had listened to him, upon that occasion, as upon all others, with great attention, and though he differed from him in the conclusions which he drew, he could not impute to him any unfairness in the manner of advancing his views. He hoped, however, after the lengthened discussion which this question had already undergone, that the hon. gentleman would not think him guilty of disrespect if he abstained from entering at large upon a topic which would necessarily have the effect of opening the whole subject of the Corn-laws again. The hon. gentleman's argument went to this, that there ought to be no duty whatever upon the importation of foreign corn, that the whole of the duty ought to be abolished, and that corn, under all circumstances, should be admitted duty free. That was plainly the hon. gentleman's object, because the terms of his resolution applied as strongly against the principle of a fixed duty, as against the principle of a sliding-scale. No gentleman, therefore, who thought that a fixed duty was necessary for the protection of our domestic agriculture, would be at liberty to vote in favour of this amendment. It appeared to him that the proposed law would have the effect of facilitating the importation of foreign corn, and of contributing to regulate its price. At any rate, by taking away the sudden fluctuations in the amount of duty, it would diminish the chances of great gains being made by mere speculators and gamblers in corn. The hon. gentleman, therefore, could not justly charge him with showing any disposition to conciliate the interest of those—parties with whom he had no concern—whose political opinions he knew nothing of, and by the promotion of whose interests he could not gain any advantage. The question had been so fully debated on previous occasions, that he was sure the House would excuse him for not going farther into the subject on the present occasion. He had proposed a modification of the law—a modification which he believed a beneficial one, and which, he trusted, was now about to receive the sanction of the House. He hoped that the hon. gentleman would not consider it disrespectful to himself, nor the House to them, if, referring to the statements which he made when the general question was before the House, he now stated that he did not consider it necessary to enter into any lengthened discussion in regard to the particular proposal of the hon. gentleman.

The amendment was negatived, and the bill read a third time.

Mr. French then moved the following question:—"That so much of this act, as allows the importation into Ireland of flour, the produce and manufacture of any foreign country, or of any British possession out of Europe, shall not commence and take effect until from and after the expiration of six calendar months from the passing hereof."

Sir R. Peel: I propose to submit all the agricultural interests in this country to immediate competition with foreign produce, and I see no reason why there should be an exception in the case of Ireland. I will take the case of oats. Complaints have been made, that the duty I proposed is not sufficient to protect Irish oats from foreign competition, but still oats are to be open to foreign competition, and no lapse of time is to be given to the grower to secure his interests. Nay, more, —I think he should not possess any such advantage; and because it is of great importance that this law should be brought into operation at once, and in all cases, unless where some special or peculiar reason for a different course may exist, I doubt whether the application of the hon. gentleman, even if granted, would benefit Ireland, although he says that hitherto the Irish millers have enjoyed a monopoly in grinding flour for exportation. But it should be recollected that we are going to admit foreign flour at lower rates of duty, and consequently, that the Irish millers can no longer expect to possess the advantage they have heretofore had of the English markets. The hon. gentleman seems to be alarmed as to the import of flour from the United States, but those who sit near him can tell him that he has no ground for alarm, and that the increase of flour from the United States will not more than correspond with the remission of the duty. I should be subjecting myself to the imputation of partiality if I were to except one interest, when, by my bill, I am subjecting every other agricultural interest to competition with the foreigner. I must oppose the proposition of the hon. member; for, in a measure which concerns so many interests, I do not think I ought to make an exception in favour of one particular interest.

Question negatived. Mr. Wakley then moved a clause, which was brought up and read a first time. On the motion that it be read a second time,

Sir R. Peel said, the proposition required a great deal of consideration. The clause would have no effect in preventing the use of bad food. The other night, two specimens of corn had been produced, which had been sold in the London market on the same day; one, of a sample of very superior corn, had been sold at 80s., the other, a very inferior sample, had been sold at 36s. The effect of the proposition of the hon. gentleman would not be to exclude that inferior sample, and those two specimens had been each an extreme. The effect of the clause would be very considerable upon the averages. If he were to select the finest bushel of corn he could find, and sold it in the market, he would have the opportunity, under this clause, of excluding all the corn from the returns of sales, which did not amount to a third of that price. He might not sell this bonâ fide; but, if it were stated to be sold, that was to govern the market. This was really opening a wide field for speculation. If they were to attempt to lay down such a rule as that, all corn sold below 30s. or below 40s., should not enter into the averages, the effect might be calculated; but to say that it should be in the power of an individual to sell a bushel of corn, so selected and picked out, and that he should thereby exclude all the returns of corn sold that was not a third of that price, was opening a wide field for fraud. If the highest priced corn sold did not fetch more than 70s., then a very low-priced corn would be admitted; but if a fair specimen of corn were sold, which brought 90s. or 100s., such low priced corn could not be admitted. Such a clause would produce the greatest uncertainty, and with such a power as this given for influencing the averages, the most injurious effects might be produced.

This motion was also negatived, and the bill passed.

INCOME-TAX—REPORT.

APRIL 8, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL moved the order of the day for the bringing up of the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Lord John Russell, after vindicating the policy of the late government, moved a resolution, showing the amount of taxes which had been repealed since the termination of the last war, and deprecating the proposed measure, which it described as most objectionable in its inquisitorial nature, unequal in its pressure, not called for by public necessity, and therefore not advisable.

A long and animated debate ensued, and during the cheers and counter-cheers which followed an impressive and eloquent speech from Mr. Sheil, Mr. Brotherton moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir R. Peel rose, and was about to address the House when he was interrupted by cries of "adjourn," and it was intimated that the adjournment of the debate had been moved.

Sir R. Peel: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether or not any motion was made before I rose?

The Speaker said, that Mr. Brotherton had moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir R. Peel: I wish, Sir, to speak to the main question. I can, of course, speak to the question of adjournment, but I rose after the right hon. gentleman, under the impression that no motion had been made previously. I was about to address myself, therefore, to the main question.

The Speaker said, that the hon. member for Salford rose and moved the adjournment immediately after the right hon. member had concluded his speech, and he put the question as soon as possible. When the right hon. baronet rose to speak, he asked the hon. member for Salford if he persevered in his motion, and the hon. member answered in the affirmative.

Sir R. Peel: If I address myself to the main question, it may look like evasion, although I presume I could, consistently with order, enter into the merits of the main question; but I should have to allege that I did so for the purpose of showing that the House ought not to adjourn. If in doing that I could be supposed to show a bad precedent, or if it would appear that by that course I should be guilty of evasion, I will not, in the position that I stand, condescend to any such evasion. I therefore, ask you, Sir, whether I ought in strictness to confine myself to the question of adjournment?

The Speaker said, that of late years it had not been deemed necessary to adhere strictly to the question of adjournment under such circumstances.

Sir R. Peel: Sir, if I am in order, if I am not chargeable with evasion, or any bad precedent—I will then speak to the main question. With unabated confidence in the expediency and in the necessity of the proposal which I have made, I call on the House and upon the country to take an energetic and decided step, for the purpose of rescuing this country from the calamity and disgrace which a continued indifference to and connivance at our financial difficulties are calculated to produce. You rest your opposition to this measure upon double grounds. You say that I establish no sufficient necessity to warrant the proposal which I have made, but you also say, that even if the circumstances of the country were such, as to call for a decided step, some other course should be pursued than resorting to direct taxation; and you charge me with exaggerating the financial difficulties of the country for the purpose of carrying this measure. Now, I shall again repeat to you and to the country, what the real position of this country is with respect to financial difficulties. I say this, that in the year-1836 (the Melbourne government having been restored to office in 1835), you came into the administration of the finances of two great empires under the dominion of her Majesty, one of which was this United Kingdom, and the other the great empire in the East, where 100,000,000 of subjects are subjected to our sway. [Confusion; cries of "divide."] I hope, Sir, that I may be allowed to proceed in the performance of my public duty, and in vindicating myself against the charge of overrating the financial difficulties which we have to meet. In 1836, you had the administration of the affairs of two great empires, and the finances which you had to administer were then in this condition. In this country, there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of £1,376,000, and in India, there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of £1,556,000. You entered, therefore, on the performance of your duties, with a net surplus in the finance of the two empires of £3,000,000 of income above expenditure. How have you left it? Am I overrating difficulties. Well, you found in that year (1836) a surplus of revenue of £3,000,000, and you left a deficit of £5,000,000, in the year ending the 5th of April, 1842. The financial deficit of the United Kingdom in that year is £2,570,000, and the deficit revenue of India for the year ending at that period is £2,430,000. Therefore I am justified in stating that you found, when you came to administer those finances, a surplus of revenue, amounting to £3,000,000, and in the year on which you quitted office, you left a deficit, which it is my duty to attempt to supply, of no less than £5,000,000. The difference between the finances of the country, therefore, from the time you undertook the charge of those finances, until you quitted office, is against the country, and against its credit, £8,000,000. If, then, I have substantiated that difference, and the existence of that deficiency, have I overrated the necessities of the country? You do not believe, perhaps, that the financial difficulties of India will recoil upon you; but if you think so, I shall convince you that the time is approaching when you will know by experience that such a position on your part cannot be maintained. You commenced in 1836, in a time of peace, with a surplus of £3,000,000, and notwithstanding that, you have left the country with the present deficiency of £5,000,000. Sir, there was a minister of this country who, in speaking of the financial affairs of it, delivered this opinion—"To enter upon the financial year with a deficiency of £1,000,000, was what he hoped no minister of this great nation would ever consent to, and no House of Commons would ever sanction. The necessary consequence of such a proceeding would"—this minister was speaking of a deficit of only £1,000,000,—“The necessary consequence of such a proceeding would be, to make the faith of the country suspected at home, to diminish its reputation abroad, and to place us in such a situation, as would necessarily deprive us of the high and noble position which we had hitherto held among the nations of the world.”

The minister who delivered those sentiments, in speaking of the deficit of a single million, is reported to have been Lord John Russell. You began with a surplus: you acknowledge that the existence of a surplus is necessary to the maintenance of public credit. Proposals are made, which find most eloquent advocates, for the remission of taxation. You had then, I say, a surplus amounting to a million and a half. A proposal was made to reduce taxation—taxation, too, bearing injuriously on the lower classes—bearing injuriously on the industry—bearing injuriously also on the property, of the country: but the minister, sensible of the evil of having a deficiency in the revenue—of having a deficiency for a single year of a single million, in the amount of his income to meet his expenditure, told you, that no minister fit to govern this great country would commence his financial year with a deficit; for, if he did, he would diminish the security of credit at home, and the respect due to the country abroad, and would thus deprive us of that high station which we had so long enjoyed among the nations of the world. Now, when I present to you a deficit of £3,000,000, in your expenditure at home, and show you that you have a deficit of £2,500,000, in addition, in another hemisphere, you tell me that I am over-rating the difficulties of the country. And I tell you, that that is the natural consequence of conniving at such a state of things as you have for some time past been enduring. And then you tell me in turn, that after having incurred an enormous national debt to the amount of £800,000,000 there is no great harm in making to that debt the small addition of £2,000,000 more. Do not deceive yourselves—do not attempt to deceive others, by such pretences: be not deterred from making the exertions which the occasion requires; for if you are, then will the prophecy of the noble lord be fulfilled, that the credit of the country will be suspected, and you will descend with inconceivable rapidity from your present high and exalted station. “Oh, but we have met with no disaster,” say the hon. gentlemen on the other side. No disaster! When had you before, in the whole cycle of your history, any disaster like that which had befallen you in Afghanistan? A disaster, which I admit is not irreparable—a disaster, which I trust will be speedily repaired by the spirit and vigour of your counsels, and by the gallant exertions of your armies: but when did you ever read in the history of England of such a wholesale slaughter as that which has recently befallen your forces, and which a single individual has escaped to narrate. His letter has appeared in all the newspapers. Here is what that individual writes:—“My life has been saved in a most wonderful manner, and I am the only European who has escaped from the Cabul army (although we have heard of two having been taken by the enemy, it is very doubtful if they will be spared). Two natives only have reached this place, making, with myself, three persons out of an army of 13,000.”

Do you yet know the whole extent of your loss in Afghanistan? Have you not lost 10,000 men since the commencement of your operations in that country? The loss, I again say, is not irreparable; every effort ought to be made, and every effort shall be made, to restore it. And shall we not have the means of doing so? How can we judge of the moral effects of these occurrences? Recollect what efforts it may be necessary for you to make for the purpose of retaining that great empire, which depends less upon your physical force, than upon the moral power which you exercise over its numberless inhabitants. If some decisive effort must be made for the rescue of the troops who are still left in Afghanistan—if some strenuous measures must be taken for the reparation of that great disaster—if some glorious feat of arms must be achieved for the retrieval of that temporary slur which has been cast upon your commanders and your forces—if that must be done, cannot you perceive the positive necessity of your making here at home some vigorous exertions for the sake of supporting government in those efforts which you admit that it is absolutely requisite that the government should take. Have I said enough to convince you that the difficulties under which we now labour, and which we are bound speedily to remove, may require on your parts great exertions—I mean great exertions both in a military and in a financial point of view; and shall I receive as a sufficient answer to my statement, an extract from the Queen's speech at the commencement of the session, stating that we have no European war to dread? Because dangers are at a distance, may we safely disregard them? With these disasters before us, let us now proceed to consider, what is the measure to which this country will resort in order to meet them, or what is the measure which, when proposed by government, it will consent to adopt! There is now a deficit of three millions in your expenditure at home. Do you entertain any sanguine hope that in the course of the next year, in the present complexion of your affairs, you can by any reduction in your estimates or your establishments, accomplish a saving to that amount? I do not think that any man is sanguine enough to entertain such an idea. I also think that your deficiency is not a temporary deficiency. Now, if you are determined not to resort to direct taxation, are you prepared to submit to an indefinite amount of indirect taxation as a substitute for it? I have proposed to you a tax on income, from which all persons whose income is less than £150 a year are to be exempt. I propose to you a tax which has hitherto been reserved for time of war, but, as the hon. member for Coventry justly observed, it would be mere miserable political pedantry, to insist that war was the only necessity in which an Income-tax would be justifiable. The question really is, whether the political necessity is of such magnitude and urgency as justifies its imposition. Now, the noble lord proposes, as a substitute for that Income-tax, the budget of last year. Now, the noble lord never could have proposed that substitute under the notion that war was the only cause which could justify the imposition of an Income-tax. The noble lord could never have thought that there might not be a political necessity in time of peace,—and I speak not only of an European peace, but of a general peace,—when all the political horizon was undefaced by a cloud—in which an Income-tax might not be perfectly justifiable. Because, in the year 1833, when Lord Althorp was beaten upon the malt-tax, and when a proposal was made for the repeal of the house and window-tax, Lord Althorp proposed, and the noble lord supported, an abstract resolution to this effect, that if a deficit in the revenue were caused by that resolution, the only alternative to which the government could resort would be a property-tax. Yes! a property-tax. That was the expedient proposed by the government of which the noble lord was a member, for the purpose of dissuading the House of Commons from reducing the house and window-tax. The property-tax was allied with an Income-tax, and in the resolution it was stated, not that you would resort to the sugar duties—not that you would resort to the timber duties—not that you would resort to the corn duties—but that your only alternative was a property and an Income-tax. When a great party supported that resolution, is it possible either for you who were its leader, or for you who were its members, now to turn round and tell me that a property-tax is not a justifiable tax in time of peace? Could I, after reading what Sir Henry Parnell, your chairman of a finance committee, has placed upon record in his different financial works—could I, after reading the opinions of Lord Althorp and of Mr. P. Thomson, upon that occasion, believe, that as a necessary consequence of my present proposal, I should be exposed to this determined opposition from the different members of the late administration? “Oh,” said the noble lord, “you might have had recourse to other measures of taxation; you might, for instance, have placed a legacy-duty upon real property.” Suppose that I had argued with myself thus:—“Let me consider the propriety of imposing a legacy-duty on real property. If I propose it, shall I have the support of the late government?" Well, what do I find upon record in the debates of the year 1840, on that very proposition which the noble lord now suggests that I might have brought forward? I find his own Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the year 1840, using this language:—"My hon. friend (Mr. Hume) says, that instead of taking the taxes as I propose, the government ought to have moved a legacy-duty on real property. I will not go into the details or the modes in which my hon. friend proposes to put that tax on, because my objection is to the principle of the tax."

That, I repeat, was the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the year 1840. Supposing, then, that I had now brought forward this measure, and had calculated upon the imposition of a legacy-duty on real property as one of the means of meeting the deficiency for the present year, should I not have been met immediately with the suggestion that the property-tax would be a much more expedient tax to propose? Should I not have been told that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had placed on record his opposition, not only to the detail, but also to the principle of the measure? The noble lord, I repeat, suggests two measures in lieu of mine—one for the remission of the duties upon corn, another for the imposition of a legacy-duty on landed property. [An hon. member: An increase of the assessed taxes.] Ay, and an increase of the assessed taxes. I hope that my agricultural friends, who have been described by the noble lord this evening as having heads partaking of the heavy nature of the clay which they cultivate, will not forget the nature of these three proposals. And here I may be permitted to step aside for a moment, and ask, if I had spoken in such terms of any manufacturing opponents of mine—if I had used such language of any of the manufacturers who speak disparagingly of me, what would have been said of my arrogance and presumption? If I had spoken of any class of men as the noble lord spoke of the agricultural class, which has offended him, I wonder what would have been the terms of reproach heaped upon me for the use of such contumelious language? I confess that I am surprised, when I hear from the hon. gentleman opposite, that my agricultural friends feel it necessary to vindicate themselves, because they have given me their support. At one time, they are charged with having broken the pledges which they gave to their constituents; and yet the sound of that charge is scarcely extinct, when I am told, as I was in the debate last night, that in bringing forward my new Corn-law, I had considered exclusively the advantage of the agricultural interest. Did you not, when I brought this Corn-law forward, receive it with insult and derision? Why, you cannot charge me with being subservient to the agricultural interest, and at the same time charge the agricultural interest in this House with having forfeited all the pledges which they gave to their constituents on the hustings, because they were too subservient to me. These two charges are inconsistent with each other. I repeat again, that the only relief proposed for the country by the noble lord consists of a fixed duty of 8s. on corn, an increase of the assessed taxes, and an imposition of a legacy duty on real property. First of all, with regard to a fixed duty of 8s. on corn. But that tax has already been negatived by the House, and must at all times be a precarious source of revenue; for in case of a favourable harvest, no corn would be imported, and there would then be no revenue at all. I come now to consider the expediency of increasing the assessed taxes. What increase is it that you would propose? You have lately increased them 10 per cent. I much doubt whether a great deal might not be said in favour of a property-tax as against an increase in the assessed taxes. If it be objected to a property-tax, that it diminishes the comforts of the poor by reducing the fund for their employment, I think I can show that assessed taxes are liable to the same imputation; and when the noble lord proposes to resort to assessed taxes, as a means of supplying this deficiency in the revenue, I think I could show him that every addition he made to assessed taxes would be more prejudicial in its effect on the labouring and industrious classes than a property-tax. But observe, if you choose to supply your revenue by assessed taxes, how are you to exempt certain parties—professional men for instance? You charge against a property-tax that the income from professions is rated under it in the same proportion as that applied to the profits of manufacture, or the interest of capital. Increase the assessed taxes, and then parties would be liable to the same charge. You do not allow them to go free of the house-tax, the window-tax, or any other assessed tax, which it may be asserted (as in the case of the professional man) to their respectability to be rated to. And let it not be forgotten, that the higher you raise the assessed taxes, the greater you make the temptation to quit this country. Here is a great proprietor, of £50,000 or £60,000 a year. Tax his house 20 per cent., and you cannot prevent his closing it, and you thus add an additional temptation to repair to a foreign capital, where he finds himself free from assessed taxes. By the measure I propose, I reach him by means of an Income-tax. I touch his landed property through the intervention of his tenantry; and if he have no tenants, I affect him through the funds. He may go abroad, but he is subjected to the charges he ought to bear in meeting the difficulties of the country. But tax his windows, or his house, and he will dismiss his establishment, and reduce the demand for productive labour, by going to Milan, Rome, or Paris. The noble lord will not touch him there; but I shall. The noble lord, however, will visit clergymen and widows, and all those who have not the means of travelling, with his impost. And just in proportion as he creates encouragement to go abroad by an exemption from the tax, does he press more severely on those who remain at home, and cannot relieve themselves from contributing to the necessities of the state. But the noble lord would resort to his old nostrum of the timber duties, to supply the deficiency in the revenue. What does the hon. member for Coventry, who is as free from the mere trammels of party as any man in this House—what does the hon. member for Coventry state upon that subject? He has said distinctly that he approves of my proposal with respect to timber more than of the proposal of the noble lord. Now, if there be any article which enters more into the common consumption of the people than another, and which ought if possible to be exempted from taxation, it is this very article of timber. The proofs which I have had laid before me of the effects which the cheapening of timber would produce in the encouragement of local improvements, and in the promotion of the building of bridges and of piers, are so convincing and overwhelming, that it is almost impossible to resist the necessity of reducing the duties on timber. What increased sources of employment will not the measure open to the manufacturing classes? We hear of the distress of the shipping interest—of the immense importance, commercially and politically, of reviving the prosperity of that interest. How can we do so more effectually than by facilitating the purchase of timber? If we enable the ship-builder here, to compete with the ship-builder abroad, to how many men shall we not give employment? What vast sources of maritime strength may we not expect to accrue to us. Has not the high price of timber been a great impediment to the construction of houses? Has it not affected the very mode of building? What has been its influence upon the construction of cottages? Now, I desire to know from the noble lord opposite, and I beg to ask hon. members generally, whether any one who has looked at the reports laid before this House, can for a moment doubt, that the alteration in the timber duties can prove otherwise than a great boon to the people of Ireland? I take the cottages of the poor in Ireland. I ask any hon. member who has read the evidence laid before the House on that subject to say, if that evidence does not contain the strongest possible proof that no want is more severely felt in Ireland than the want of timber? The high duty also operates most injuriously upon British fishermen. Owing to the better construction of their boats, the foreign fishermen enjoy a monopoly of fishing in deep seas. Reduce the price of timber, and you at once enable our fishermen to compete with them, and thus give the means of employment to a large number of men. An hon. member opposite says, we ought to make Canada an integral part of the empire; and immediately after, he proposed that we should put an additional duty on timber, the produce of that colony. I purpose that Canadian timber shall enter into fair competition with the timber of this country, whilst I retain a duty of 30s. upon Baltic timber, which I hope will be sufficiently protective of that of Canada. By adopting my proposition with respect to timber, we shall increase the demand for productive industry, whilst, at the same time, we shall indirectly increase the revenue. I admit that the effect of my measure will be to cause an immediate loss of revenue, and that, on the contrary, an increase of revenue would probably result from the adoption of the noble lord's plan; but still I think that mine is superior to that of the noble lord. Now, with respect to sugar, the noble lord mistakes, if he supposes that, when

I referred to articles upon which a reduction of duty had not led to a corresponding increase of revenue, and that we could not hope to realise any immediate advantage from pursuing a similar course on the present occasion, I was referring to sugar. I never denied that the consequence of reducing the duty upon foreign sugar must be an increase of revenue. I said before, that that was not my objection to the proposition of the noble lord. If the proposition were made now to retain the existing duty upon British sugar, and to reduce the duty on foreign sugar to 36s., I would oppose it. If we must deal with sugar, I think the way in which we ought to deal with it is by making a considerable reduction of duty as well with respect to colonial produce as to foreign produce. Why have I dealt so liberally with respect to timber, but because I want the profit arising from the reduction of duty to be obtained by the consumer? It is infinitely better to deal on a large scale with great articles of consumption, and to make a great reduction of duty, in order that the consumer may obtain the advantage of it, than, as has been done in some cases, to reduce the duty, so that we lose the revenue, and put the profit in the pocket of the wholesale dealer. I never doubted that the noble lord might make a proposal with respect to sugar, which would have the effect of increasing the revenue. I must say, however, that we, last year, realised as much revenue from sugar, in consequence of the increased produce of our own colonies, as the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Baring) expected to obtain from the reduction of duty on foreign sugar. That, I admit, is not a decisive argument against the right hon. gentleman's proposition, because the principle of that was competition. The ground on which I opposed it was, that after the sacrifice we had made for the abolition of slavery, it would not redound to the honour or credit of the country to permit the introduction of sugar, the produce of slave colonies, without an effort, at least, to obtain some corresponding concession with respect to the slave-trade. I must say that, without closing my eyes in the slightest degree to the advantages to be derived from reducing the price of sugar, I do think, in the present state of the controversy with other countries in respect to the slave trade, and seeing the suspicion which is most unjustly thrown upon our motives, if we were now for mere pecuniary considerations, for the first time, to admit sugar the produce of Cuba and the Brazils, without having said one word with respect to any stipulation as to the slave-trade, we could not continue to maintain the character and influence which we now possess. This, I know, that men whose motives are entirely disinterested and free from any suspicion, such as Dr. Lushington, Sir Fowell Buxton, and some of those who have taken a most active part in respect to the abolition of the slave-trade, protested in the strongest terms against the admission of foreign sugar without any stipulation being made with respect to the slave-trade; and would not foreign nations refer to the testimony of those gentlemen, given against the interests of party, if we, for mere pecuniary consideration, should admit sugar the produce of slave-labour? What was the course pursued by the right hon. gentleman, the Lord Mayor of Dublin? He gave notice, that no foreign sugar should be allowed to be imported, except from colonies where slavery did not exist, and he abstained from bringing it forward only because it would have interfered with the provisions of the reciprocity treaties. Lord Brougham expressed similar opinions. It was said, that we took cotton and coffee, which were the produce of slave-labour; but there was this to be observed, that we had always taken those articles, whilst it was proposed that we should now for the first time begin to take sugar, the produce of slave-labour. These were the arguments which the right hon. gentleman opposite opposed in 1840 to the proposition of the hon. member for Wigan, for admitting slave-grown sugar. The noble lord alluded mysteriously to other taxes which might be resorted to, but he has taken care not to name them. I hope the labouring classes will observe that the noble lord threatens them with renewing some of the taxes which have been repealed during the last twenty years, for that was his object in referring to them. Looking, then, at the whole of the arrangements which I have made—looking at the taxes which I propose to lay on, and at those which I intend to remove—I do think myself warranted in saying that I have done all that could be accomplished for the working man; and most especially do I say this when I remember that I have exempted from the tax all incomes below £150 a-year. Supposing I were to attempt to raise revenue by increasing the duties on other articles of general use and consumption—supposing that such was my object, what are the articles that could be selected? They are salt, leather, beer. I entertain no doubt but that I could, by taxing these articles, raise revenue, as well as I could by the proposal of an Income-tax. But, Sir, I require more than what is necessary to meet the deficiency under which we at present labour. Look at the state of the country with reference to foreign nations. Look at the war in India and China. We have to send six regiments to India, in order to maintain the honour and power of this country. This is attended with no little expense. Again, it should be borne in mind that as yet we have not come to the House for the supplemental estimates. I say the House ought to bear in mind these facts. It is not merely the deficiency with which we have to deal. The noble lord says, correctly, that the deficiency this year is £2,500,000., and that I propose, by the proceeds of the Income-tax and by the tariff, to obtain the sum of £4,381,000. That is my proposal. In doing this it is my intention to apply a great portion of the surplus to the remission of other taxes, which press heavily upon the country, as well as to the removal of the duties upon other articles which interfere with the productive industry of the nation. Sir, I consider, in proposing the adoption of an Income-tax, that I give a great boon to the country—to the productive industry of the country—to the manufacturing, commercial, and trading interests of this nation. That is the measure which I, on the part of the government, have thought it my duty to submit to parliament. I wish this to be known, not only in the House of Commons, but I wish it to go forth to the country. I think the country ought clearly to understand my proposition. I think they ought to see through the motives of those who have raised an opposition to it. Constant references have been made to the tariff which has been proposed. By that tariff the duty upon articles of sustenance is to be greatly reduced, and I also propose to admit what had previously been totally prohibited. I really hope that hon. friends of mine, connected with the manufacturing as well as with the agricultural interest, will suspend their judgment and opinion, until I have an opportunity of stating fully, fairly, and explicitly, my case. With reference to my intention, as regards the importation of live cattle, and the reduced duty on salted and dried meats, I do not despair of being able to show to the House clear, convincing, and satisfactory reasons for that portion of my tariff. I think I can demonstrate to the House that the price of meat has, for a number of years, been progressively increasing in this country. I mean to show, that although my duties are low, I cannot dispense with the Income-tax. I ask hon. members to pause. You will not act wisely if you give way to needless alarm. If you appeal to your own consciences on the subject, I feel perfectly satisfied that you will not abandon me in consequence of the Income-tax. I again ask you to suspend your judgments until I have an opportunity of bringing before you the whole of my case. I shall show you that, in other countries in Europe, the same scarcity of meat—the same inconvenience exists. I shall show you that in France the human population has increased far beyond the proportion of the growth of cattle; and that an extraordinary rise in the price of meat has consequently occurred there. I shall show, from documents which you cannot controvert, a gradual diminution in the consumption of meat, per head, throughout France. I shall show you the high price of cattle—that France is an importing country—and that, so far from that great and powerful empire, containing a population of 33,000,000—so far from that being a country that can inundate you with cattle, if there is a country from which cattle can be drawn, she will be your rival in the purchase of cattle. I will also show, that there is no ground of apprehension from Belgium or Holland, and that the grounds of apprehension are limited to a very narrow district in Europe. I will attempt also to show that the importation of foreign cattle, should it take place, would be a benefit to the agricultural, as well as to every other class in the country—that it will prove a great public advantage. Sir, I thought it right to state to the House the view which I take of the tariff, before I call on it to pass the vote for the Income-tax. I know the alarm that has been raised throughout the country—the efforts that have been made to disturb the public mind. No wonder that some alarm should have been excited when, amongst other devices, a printed proposition is circulated throughout the city of York, offering to supply meat from Hamburgh at 3*d.* per pound, under the modified tariff, while, at the same moment, the price of meat in Hamburgh itself is 5*d.* a pound. I know, too, that the minds of the farmers have been agitated and disturbed, but I feel convinced that the apprehensions caused by the tariff are greatly overcharged. I cannot, and do not wish to deny, that great reductions are proposed by it; but though I do not now mean to enter further into detail upon the subject, I must again declare my conviction, that these reductions will be productive of great advantage to the agricultural, as well as the manufacturing and commercial classes. Well, Sir, I presume the noble lord will not quarrel with the relaxations proposed upon the import duties on coffee. These relaxations are to the amount of £100,000 yearly. That, however, will be allowed to be a fair proposition. [An hon. member: "Oh, oh!"] I try, Sir, to maintain my temper, amidst the various and conflicting attacks that are made—the embarrassing positions in which hon. gentlemen would wish to place me. But when I am met by these free-traders, who have been always clamouring for free-trade—who say, you ought to remove these prohibitions—who say, the manufacturing interest wants no protection—when, upon my proposing to make reductions, I am met by these persons with the argument, that I have selected certain unfortunate men as the victims of free-trade—this is a height of inconsistency which cannot well be surpassed. I am told by these free-traders that my reductions are needless—that I might have retained the respective duties of 10*d.* and 5*d.* And this is said after all we have heard about the great increase in the consumption. After the proofs that have been offered that the beverage is superseding all others, is it fair, after these statements, to tell me now that I may as well have retained the 10*d.* and 5*d.* duties, and prevented a loss to the revenue of £100,000? Again, with reference to the duties on timber, Mr. Deacon Hume, a gentleman whose opinions hon. gentlemen opposite profess to hold in so much reverence, said that timber was a raw material of surpassing importance to this country, and that our conduct with regard to it was like the folly of France in excluding iron. He said, you have coal, you have iron, and you want only wood, to possess all the elements for being one of the most prosperous countries on the face of the earth; and after this declaration of opinion, joined to the sentiments professed by so many gentlemen opposite, I am now to be told, that the relaxation of the timber duties is a needless sacrifice. So it is with respect to other articles included in the tariff. Allusions of this kind, of his hon. friend, had been made to them, not, I trust, merely in a factious spirit, but, perhaps, for the purpose of feigning the advantage in debating the Income-tax. But I believe that the good sense and discrimination of the people of this country will approve of the steps we have taken for the reduction of the duties on articles of subsistence and raw materials used in manufactures. These are the principles upon which I propose the present measure to the House, and on which it is my intention to submit the other measures which I have announced. The right hon. gentleman has said, that the measure is full of inequalities. But I would ask, what rigorous and comprehensive measure of taxation could be proposed, without being liable to the same charges? You must either resort to direct or indirect taxation. It is but a comparison of evils. I have never denied that a good deal of inconvenience, arising from the inquiries that must be instituted into the properties of men, is unavoidable from the imposition of an Income-tax. You may modify or mitigate the inconvenience, but you are bound to give the honest as much security as you can, that they do not have to pay more on account of the misconduct of the dishonest. A certain degree of inquisitorial scrutiny is, therefore, inseparable from an Income-tax. But the right hon. gentleman admits, that if a tax be levied on realised property it should be levied on income also. He will not consent to separate income. Those, however, who are in favour of a tax on realised property, cannot consistently vote for the noble lord's motion, and as his resolution is pointed as much against a tax upon realised property as against income, when the right hon. gentleman paints in such glowing and eloquent colours the position of the man labouring for subsistence by the exercise of his intellect, and on whom my proposition would call for a contribution proportioned to his income, I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether his sympathy would not be equally called forth on behalf of such a man by the imposition of a house or window tax? If, Sir, I possessed the eloquent imagination of the right hon. gentleman, I could point out in equally glowing terms the position of such a man, reduced to the melancholy alternative of avoiding the window-tax by closing up his windows, or of paying the law out of his scanty income—I might paint that man's misery when he saw his children sitting round him, and no alternative but either to submit to the impost, or to injure the health of those he loved by closing the windows, shutting out the light of day, and the access of air. An eloquent man might draw these pictures of hardship with respect to any tax that could be imposed. But suppose I had submitted a plan of increased assessed taxes. It would be easy to prove to the noble lord, that the consequence of that increase might lead to severe privation. But if I offer to tax the incomes of men, such as the right hon. gentleman has described, and I call upon a man for a contribution which, if that income amount to £300 will be rather more than £8, and if, in lieu of that, I can present him with the reduction in the cost of living, that I shall compensate him for the full amount of his contribution I levy upon him—if I can give him cheaper food, if I can give him cheaper furniture, if I can give him articles of comparative luxury at a cheaper rate—which is the best proposal for relief—that I should ask for him to contribute £8, and that I should restore £10 by means of the diminished cost of living, or that I should enable the rich man to escape the impost by going abroad, and leave him who must necessarily remain at home subject to increased taxation? I do not deny the disadvantages of circumstances, but feeling the necessity, not only on account of our political necessities, which I will not exaggerate, but which I say are reparable, which I am certain the spirit and energy of this country will repair, but which, in order to repair speedily, will require great exertion from you, I call upon you to make that exertion, and the first step you take towards recovery—the first demonstration of your willingness, will be half the victory. If you are afraid to submit to sacrifices—if you paint in glowing colours the miserable condition of those who are to pay taxes—if you say it is better to go on on the present system, increasing the debt a little more, funding at 91—Why are the 3 per cents at 91? Who has made them 91? Public credit is high—the funds have risen—and say you, “You can have a loan easily now.” Oh, you miserable financiers! [Laughter and cheers.] I beg pardon, if, in the heat of debate, I have used a word that may give offence. But the funds are high, because you have shown a disposition not to resort to a system of loans in a time of peace. The funds have risen; but throw out my Income-tax, and ask for a fresh loan to cover your deficiency in the revenue, and you will see the force of the argument, that because the funds are at 91, you may wait a little longer and have a loan. No, that will depress the funds—that will prove a visionary scheme—and have the effect of sinking the funds. Funds are high while you maintain public credit, and all our disasters may be repaired, while there is a conviction, that you are willing to meet your difficulties. The noble lord taunted me and others who have expressed their intention to support me, because I said, in proposing these measures, not only that I proposed them with the cordial concurrence of my colleagues, and with their united responsibility, but I said, what was superfluous perhaps, that the decision of the House, on the great outline and principle of those measures, must necessarily decide the fate of the administration. And would it not be perfectly legitimate for men who differ on various points, and entertain doubts on several questions, seeing that the fate of great interests are involved, if they have confidence in a government, to demonstrate that confidence, by waiving their private opinions, and giving their support to that government whose principles they generally approve, but from whose individual measures they may differ in some respects, thinking it better in this crisis of affairs to trust them, than men who are at least unfortunate if not incompetent? That would be a justifiable, a wise, and a patriotic course of action. I said not too much when I said, that upon the fate of these measures the existence of the government depended. I believe it will be more for the interest of the monarchy—more for the strength and stability of the executive government—more for the credit and character of public men, that being defeated on great measures like these, we should commit to others the responsibility of conducting public affairs, than that we should take another course, that of going on year after year, dragging out a miserable existence—going on adopting the measures of our opponents. [Cheers from the Opposition.] Why, what measures have you proposed? Is this Income-tax yours? Have we meddled with the savings-banks? Have we proposed 5 per cent. upon the customs, and 10 per cent. upon the assessed taxes? Have we taken your Corn-law, or your sugar duties, or your timber duties? What does the taunt mean, then? What one particular measure have you to boast of? “But you have adopted our principles," say you. When did you avow them? In the import duties? Surely, you take no credit for the import duties. The committee on the import duties was moved for by a gentleman who, as he is not now a member of the House, I may name, Mr. Hume; and when my noble friend, the member for Monmouth, asked what the object of the committee was, Mr. Hume explained, that it was to examine the effects of our Customs duties on imports, and the matter was passed over without a single word being said. Therefore, with respect to the principles of commercial policy, that the right hon. gentleman opposite should claim for themselves an exclusive monopoly in regard to free-trade, and taunt any member who dares to trespass on their manor with interfering with private property, is an assumption not at all justified by the facts. The proposals of the right hon. gentlemen were not brought forward in the meridian of their strength, but at least at a time when they had previously declared, that they had forfeited the confidence of this House. Now, as I agree in the opinions which were expressed with truth and power, that there may be various opinions on governments—that some may prefer a monarchical government and some an aristocratic government, but that, as it was truly said by Lord Melbourne, the worst government that can exist is that which has not strength to carry the great measures it proposes, but must live by the sufferance and forbearance of their opponents—cordially concurring in that opinion—I speak not of measures on which the House of Commons has a right to exercise its judgment, but the measures of men in a minority, and measures to carry which the government may think it essential to the public welfare—I feel myself justified in avowing, in reference to this particular question, that I do think it infinitely better for the public interest, that if this House is of opinion, that this measure is fraught with injustice, and that it ought not to be adopted—in that case, the House of Commons ought to repose its confidence in those who may have other measures to devise, which the House may think better suited to the exigencies of the times, and more consonant with the wishes of the country.

Debate adjourned.

INCOME-TAX—FIRST READING.

APRIL 18, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL brought in the Income-tax bill. On the question being put that it be read a first time, Lord John Russell rose, and after reiterating his objections to the measure, moved as an amendment, that the bill be read a first time that day six months.

Sir Robert Peel: The noble lord had felt it incumbent upon him, in the discharge of his public duty, to take the very unusual course of resisting the first reading of the bill which he had brought in, in conformity with the resolution of the House. The chief part of the argument upon which the noble lord justified that unusual course of proceeding had been rather general—a sort of argumentum ad hominem, addressed personally to him; and in which the noble lord very fairly and candidly said, that having had some difficulty in discovering any valid and sufficiently satisfactory arguments against this bill, he had done him the honour of referring to a speech made by him in the year 1833, in which he found the arguments against a property-tax much stronger and much better put forward than any that he had yet heard. He confessed that, up to this period, he had thought that all the arguments advanced against the present proposed Income-tax were exceedingly weak and inefficient, and he did not think, when the circumstances under which the speech of 1833 was made were considered, that the noble lord had much strengthened his case by referring to what he then said. When an authority was quoted, it was always of great importance to refer to the period and to the circumstances under which that authority spoke. When he stated his strong objection to the imposition of an Income-tax in 1833—objections the force of which he felt at the present moment—what, at that time, was the financial position of the country? According to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there was then a net surplus of £1,500,000. Lord Althorp proposed a considerable remission of taxes upon articles of consumption, amounting to a loss of revenue to the extent of about £1,000,000. The immediate loss to the revenue would be greater; but Lord Althorp calculated upon an increase of consumption which would make up a part of the deficiency, and that the total loss that he would sustain by the proposed reduction of taxes would still leave him a net surplus of about £516,000. That was the financial position of the country when he was called upon to deliver an opinion upon a projected tax upon property and income. Proposals were made to reduce the malt-tax, the house-tax, and the window-tax; and it was proposed to impose a property-tax by way of commutation for the house-tax and the window-tax. He decidedly objected to the imposition of a property-tax to effect that commutation. And even now, if the exchequer were in possession of a surplus of £500,000, and a proposition were made to reduce the malt-tax, the house-tax, and the window-tax, and to substitute in lieu of them a property-tax, he should offer to such a proposition the most strenuous opposition. He stated in 1833, that the house-tax and the window-tax partook of the nature of a property-tax, and that, having at that time a surplus of £500,000, he would not consent to the imposition of a direct property-tax—which he admitted to be open to many objections—with the view of relieving the country from a corresponding amount of charge upon houses and windows. What was the course which he took in 1833? Lord Althorp had lost the malt-tax. Lord Althorp asked, what course he thought ought to be pursued? He replied, “you may rely upon my support in the maintenance of the public credit; and if you come down to rescind the vote by which you have lost half the malt-tax, you may depend upon my support, in utter oblivion of all political considerations.” He felt it to be his duty, under any circumstances, to maintain the public credit. He accordingly voted with Lord Althorp in rescinding the resolution of the House with respect to the malt-tax, and assisted him to the utmost of his power in upholding the public credit. And he begged to tell the noble lord, that it was mainly in consequence of the assurance so derived from him that Lord Althorp took the strong and decided measure of calling upon the House to rescind the vote it had previously given upon the subject of the malt-tax. What was the vote in reference to a property-tax that Lord Althorp at that time asked him to join him upon? It was proposed to take off part of the malt-tax, and part of the house-tax and window-tax. Lord Althorp met that proposition by another proposition. If the malt-tax, the house-tax, and the window-tax, were reduced, this was the way in which Lord Althorp proposed to make up the deficiency that would be occasioned in the revenue—all this, be it observed, was in a time of profound peace, and when the only ground for the proposition was one of financial emergency—this was the way in which Lord Althorp proposed to proceed:—“that the deficiency of the revenue which would be occasioned by a reduction of the tax on malt to 10s. a quarter, and by the repeal of the taxes on houses and windows, could only be supplied by the substitution of a general tax on property, and would occasion an extensive change in our whole financial system, which would at present be inexpedient.”

Four days after Lord Althorp moved that amendment, he gave his vote in favour of Lord Althorp's proposition. When the noble lord referred to his opinion, with respect to Ireland, he had done him an injustice in quoting only a part instead of the whole of the opinion he had expressed. He was willing to admit that Ireland had no claim to an exemption from a property tax to which England and Scotland were subject; but his reason for exempting it now was, because there was no machinery in Ireland, by which such a tax could be collected. He proposed, however, to raise a corresponding sum, by an additional amount of taxation upon stamps and spirits. From those sources, the latter of which partook in some degree of the nature of a property-tax, he calculated upon obtaining an equivalent for a general property-tax in Ireland. When the noble lord charged him with having changed his opinions upon the subject of the property-tax, perhaps it would have been more fair if he had read the opinions which he expressed on the occasion. His words were these:—“He repeated, that the repeal of the half of the malt duty carried with it the repeal of the whole; and if the whole duty were repealed, and the house and window-tax were repealed, they would not be able to satisfy the public creditor; for it was a perfect delusion to suppose that the deficiency could be made up by increased consumption and by a reduction of expenditure. The only alternative, then, was a property-tax, to which he was decidedly opposed. He would not pledge himself beyond the present occasion; but he would say that, in the present circumstances of the country, and at the present period of the session, either a property or an Income-tax would be a great calamity."

Those were the opinions which he expressed in 1833, admitting the inquisitorial character of the tax, and objecting to it, by way of commutation for other taxes, at a time when there was a clear surplus of £1,500,000 in the exchequer. But he asked whether the condition and circumstances of the country were not now so different as to justify him in taking a different view? The noble lord said, that the Income-tax was one that would excite discontent, and even disgust, in the country, as soon as it should come into actual operation. He admitted that it was not likely to be popular. But if he were to encounter so much of disgust, dissatisfaction, and unpopularity—if he were to be met by all the difficulties and obstructions which the noble lord had pointed out, and some of which, perhaps, he could himself foresee—what reason could he have in proposing a measure which would bring these consequences upon his head, except a firm belief that it was absolutely necessary to maintain the public credit, and a conviction that that credit could not in any way be so well maintained, or in a way so little oppressive to the country generally as by a property-tax. The noble lord said, that there was no such pressing necessity which warranted the imposition of a property-tax. Why, at the end of the present year the deficiency upon the last six years would not be less than £10,000,000; and upon the current year, ending April, 1843, the deficiency, exclusive of any expenditure that might be rendered necessary by the course of events in India, the deficiency would be at least £3,000,000. In addition to that, he calculated upon a loss of £1,200,000, from the reductions proposed upon the tariff, so that the gross deficit for which he should have to provide would not be less than £4,200,000. After all that had been stated in the course of the long and protracted debates upon the subject, he owned he could not see how he was to raise such an amount of revenue as would enable him to meet that large deficiency, without having recourse to such a tax upon income as that which he now proposed. Considering that they might confidently expect that the revival of trade and additional consumption would enable them to relieve the country from this tax, he thought they would much less disturb the industry of the country and the application of capital, by imposing a tax on property, than by trying to revive the taxes on such articles as salt, malt, and leather, which would have to be paid by all those whose condition they were so anxious to improve. He was firmly of opinion that he was consulting the interest and security of those who owned property, by the imposition of a property-tax, far more than he would have done had he subjected the great masses of the working classes to indirect taxation. Considering the manner in which property had accumulated, and considering the emergency in which the country was placed, he felt that he was perfectly justified in the proposal which he had made, to raise a deficit of £4,200,000, from the incomes of the landed aristocracy, and from the profits—for where no profits were made there would be no taxation—of those engaged in trades and professions, and he felt firmly convinced that his proposal was not only consistent with justice, but also with the interests of those by whom property was possessed. He believed, that among the consumers there was a feeling of satisfaction with his proposals, and a conviction that by the alterations proposed in the tariff they would be compensated for the inconvenience to which the tax would subject them. Notwithstanding the opinion which he formerly expressed, and which he still retained—that, with a surplus of £1,500,000, an Income-tax would be most unjust; and not denying its inequality or its inquisitorial character—still, from the result of the debates, and from the communications which he had received from various parts of the country, he was confirmed in the strong opinion which he had previously entertained when he opened the question to the House—that his proposal at the present emergency was both called for and just. He had not, in discussing the question, travelled beyond the limits which the noble lord had prescribed. He had confined himself to answering the speech of the noble lord, particularly that part of it having a personal reference. He thought it inconvenient to enter upon any discussion at the present moment in respect to the tariff. He thought he should be able to show, when the proper time came, that they might confidently rely on a reduction of price on the articles of subsistence, and that that reduction could be made consistently with the promotion of the interests of the producer as well as of the consumer. He would, however, take the present opportunity of stating, that he should propose two modifications in the measure, for the purpose of remedying the objections made in the course of the debate. One was, in reference to the position of tenants in Scotland, which had been stated, and truly stated, to be differing from the position of tenants in England. The tenant in Scotland was not subject to any payment on account of tithes, nor was he subject to any of those payments which in England usually fell on the occupying tenant, but which, in Scotland, were borne by the landlord; and this was the reason why, in the act of 1806, a distinction was made—apparently, but not in reality—in favour of the occupying tenant in Scotland. He wished to place the tenant in Scotland on the same footing, or as nearly as it was possible on the same footing, in this respect, as the tenant in England. If the English tenant occupies land, tithe-free, he will be entitled to a deduction of one-eighth from the amount of assessment. That was clearly a deduction to which the tenant in Scotland was entitled. Again, supposing the landlord of the English tenant paid the usual charges, and this he almost universally did, the tenant in that case would be entitled to a remission. When he came to compute the amount of these deductions, he found that substantial justice would be done by charging the Scottish tenant on about one-third, instead of one-half, of his rent, making him liable for 2½*d.* instead of 3*d.* in the pound. He believed that this would place the tenantry in the two countries on nearly the same footing. He thought it better to do this than to call on the tenant in Scotland to make a return of the amount of his exemptions. In regard to the other modification which he had made, he was aware that one great objection to the tax was its inquisitorial nature. It was said, and said with great force, that it was unfair to subject the trader, or any other person liable to contribution under schedule D, to the inquisition established by the act of 1806; and it was further said, and no doubt justly enough, that the case of a trader or of a professional man differed from that of the landed proprietor or of the person possessing funded property, whose incomes were generally very well known. The arrangement which he proposed to make respecting the property in schedule D, was to leave the act of 1806, in reference to this point, as he found it—namely, to permit those who preferred it to go before a local commissioner, appointed by parties independent of the government; but in case any one objected to go before the local authority, and this might happen where the commissioner was a competitor in trade or a rival in manufactures, or where the disclosure of a person's income before a particular commissioner might be prejudicial or vexatious—if, then, any person objected going before the local commissioner, it was proposed to give the party the option of either doing so or of sending a return of his income to a sworn officer, the inspector of stamps. He proposed, also, that surcharges should be brought before that officer, with an appeal to a special commissioner, and that any person should have the option of disclosing his affairs to a special commissioner appointed by government, with the same power as the other commissioners. He had attempted to reconcile as far as possible these two objects, the impartial and just imposition of the tax, and the prevention of evasion and fraud; he sought to apply a remedy to those special evils, which were alleged to arise from an inquisitorial examination of the concerns of the trader or professional man. He hoped that he had removed at least some part of the objection by the remedy which he had proposed. His belief was, notwithstanding the predictions of the noble lord the member for London, respecting the disgust with which the tax would be hereafter viewed, and the unpopularity which would visit those who had proposed it,—notwithstanding this prediction, he must say, that there were indications throughout the country generally of a strong prevalent impression that the maintenance of public credit required the adoption by parliament of some vigorous and decisive course—his belief was, that among those parties who possessed property—and he spoke of property embarked in trade or manufactures, as well as property of a more permanent character—among such persons he believed there was a strong prevailing opinion, that if they were to raise £4,200,000 for the purpose of maintaining the public credit, it was perfectly consistent with justice, as well as policy, to impose the burden on property, rather than to curtail the comforts and enjoyments of those who constituted the great mass of the working classes. He would not enter any further into the discussion of this subject. He did not know whether the noble lord opposite would feel it his duty to take the sense of the House on the present occasion or on the second reading. If, considering the peculiar circumstances of the discussion, the season of the year, and the immense importance to the trade and manufactures of the country, that the sense of parliament should be ascertained and the question settled—if the House, considering all these things, should think it advisable to make a temporary relaxation of those rules, which confined their discussions on this subject to two days in the week, he would willingly propose to devote more than two days to the consideration of the Income-tax and the tariff.

The House divided on the question, that the word "now" stand part of the question. Ayes, 285; Noes, 188; majority, 97. Bill read a first time; to be read a second time.

INCOME-TAX.

APRIL 29, 1842.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House went into Committee on the Income-tax bill.

Upon schedule D being put, Mr. Roebuck moved the amendment of which he had given notice—that instead of the word "sevenpence," the words "threepence-halfpenny" be inserted in the clause.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I was rather surprised to find that the right hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. V. Smith) would vote in favour of the proposition of the hon. and learned member for Bath, because he says, that whenever you can do justice you must do it; but there is a clear distinction between the cases of trades and of professions, and there is a peculiar aggravation of the injustice which pervades this bill, in respect of professions, which does not apply to trades. The right hon. gentleman, therefore, should make a distinction between trades and professions, and should propose that they should be made subject to different rates of taxation. And it will be no answer, according to the view which he has taken, that there will be a difficulty in doing so; for there will be no greater difficulty than that with which the hon. and learned member for Bath has to contend; and it is clear that, according to his principles, he cannot support the motion of that hon. and learned member, but that he should rather strive to apply a rule to professions different from that which he would apply to trades. I think, however, without going any further into this point, that we should on this occasion confine ourselves to the discussion of the question, whether it would be just, according to the principles on which this House usually acts, and fitting, as regards the interests of the public, that a distinction should be made according to the source from which the tax is to be derived. And I will first observe, with regard to the right hon. gentleman the member for Taunton, that I concur with him both in the vote which he is about to give, and on the general grounds upon which that vote will rest. The right hon. gentleman assumes, for the sake of argument, that the House is right in imposing an Income-tax, and he says that if that be a just and an expedient course to take, there should be no exemption on account of any supposed difference with regard to the means of obtaining the income of the person taxed. I differ from the right hon. gentleman in this; and I retain the opinion which I originally expressed, that if you have to raise three and a half or four millions of money, under the present circumstances of the country, there is no manner in which it can be raised with less of embarrassment or inconvenience to the community than by imposing a tax upon income. I repeat that I retain the opinion which I have always expressed, and that all the discussions which I have heard upon the subject, have only confirmed my impression, that on the whole, there is no other course by which the same end could be attained, and less of injustice done. The hon. and learned member for Bath, in referring to this part of the subject, has alluded to the maxims laid down by Dr. Adam Smith, with regard to the principles of taxation. Those maxims are—"The subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of the government, as nearly as possible, according to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state. Secondly, the tax which each individual is bound to pay, ought to be certain and not arbitrary. Thirdly, every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner, in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it. Fourthly, every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out, and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible, over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state."

From these maxims a recent writer has drawn this conclusion, that there is not one of those maxims taken on the whole, or scarcely any part of any one of them taken distinctly, which a tax on income does not more fully confirm than any tax of any other description; and that writer refers to these propositions for the purpose of showing that the tax on incomes is more just to all classes of the community, and particularly to the great consuming classes, than those taxes which are derivable from any other source. And I must say, that if we had attempted to levy this amount of taxes, either on articles of consumption, by an increase of the window-tax, or of the assessed taxes, or by a house-tax, the particular class which would have been peculiarly subject to the additional burdens to be imposed, would have consisted of those persons who derive their incomes from professional employment; and I say again, that this Income-tax has this advantage over all other taxes, that the wealthy man cannot escape its operation by withdrawing himself from this country, for whether he remains here, or absents himself altogether from this country, so long as he derives his income from this country, he is still open to the operation of the tax. With regard to the particular exemption sought to be established by this motion, I agreed with the right hon. gentleman, the member for Taunton, and I cannot help thinking, that whatever course that right hon. gentleman may take—whether it be a popular or an unpopular course—it is, under all circumstances, only that line of conduct which is dictated to him by purely conscientious motives. I will now address myself to the arguments of the hon. and learned member for Bath. He spoke very warmly on the great responsibility which devolves on me, individually, on account of the decision to which I have come on this subject. I can assure the hon. and learned member, that—when I have arrived at a conclusion that a particular course is the just course for me to take—with regard to amount of responsibility which devolves on me, I am prepared to undertake it all, for I think that it is a responsibility which I ought to bear. Now the hon. and learned member agrees with me that the Income-tax, subject to those modifications which he has stated, is, on the whole, the most just impost which could be adopted. I make the proposition as it now stands before the House, and he does not propose to remedy any one of the evils alleged against the tax on account of its inquisitorial nature. [Mr. Roebuck: We have not come to that yet.] Speaking of the hon. and learned member's proposition, the inquisition into the incomes derived from trades and professions must equally take place, whether the amount to be levied be $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ or $7d.$ in the pound; and the inquisition so much complained of, would be only aggravated under this new proposition, because the same objectionable mode of ascertaining the income of a person must be put into operation for the purpose of levying a smaller sum than would be raised under my proposition. His motion, therefore, has not for any part of its object the application of a remedy for this alleged defect, but his proposal is simply this, that other incomes being subject to taxation to a certain amount, the income derived from trades and professions shall only pay one-half. I object to that proposition, because I think that an adherence to the plan brought forward by the government would work less injustice than would be produced by such a system being adopted. We proposed to levy a tax on the income of the country to enable us to supply the deficiency in the revenue, but at the same time we seek to make an abatement in the cost of articles of consumption, in the hope to benefit all classes, but more especially those classes of which the hon. and learned member is the advocate. The other night the hon. and learned member appeared to view the justice of my proposal in a different light, and he argued that if you could make any distinction whatever, it should be on account of the permanency of the tenure of property; for when I went on to show the difference in respect of real property, as to the permanency of tenure, he said, that in every case he would make a proportionate abatement. That is not his proposal now; I understand the justice of what he said then. I can understand your saying that in respect of all income, from whatever source derived, we should look to the duration of the interest of the holder of it, and subject all persons to a proportionate tax. The hon. member says now, "I will leave the income arising from real property subject to the Income-tax, but I will take one particular species of income which shall be exempt from it." But what has the hon. member done? He has agreed to schedule A being passed; he has agreed that "for all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or heritages, in Great Britain, there shall be charged yearly, in respect of the property thereof, for every 20s. of the value thereof, the sum of sevenpence." He has not proposed any distinction to be drawn according to the duration of such income; but he says, "I will take the case of the fee-simple of an estate being vested in a particular person, and I will compare the value of the income arising from such estate, with an income derived from the professional exertions of a man;" but I say the hon. member is not at liberty to do so. He has not proposed to say to the owners of an estate in fee-simple, "You can sell your estate for twice the value for which you would sell it if you possessed only a life-interest in it, and therefore a distinction shall be made in your case, and the person enjoying only a life-interest shall pay less tax than you; but the hon. member says, "No matter what your interest may be in landed property, all owners of such property shall be subject to an equal rate of taxation." The hon. and learned member, then, has subjected the owner of an estate in fee-simple, and he who has only a life-interest in an estate, in like manner, to an Income-tax of 7d. in the pound, without making any distinction as to the difference of the tenure of their respective properties—he has subjected the occupying tenant to the Income-tax, without any reference to the nature of his tenure—nay, he has taken the man who holds his property at the will of his landlord, who is subject to be turned out of possession by a six months' notice—whose income depends upon his landlord's will, and upon the vicissitudes of the season—who has no permanent holding of his property, and whose tenure is not half so good as that which the surgeon, or physician, or the lawyer, possesses, in respect of his income—he has said to the occupying tenant, "You shall pay according to an assumed rate of profit; your profits shall be assumed to be equal to one-half your rent;" but then, without reference to the uncertainty of that profit, or of the tenure, the hon. member has said to him, "You shall contribute to this tax at the rate of 3½d. in the pound"—he has said that the holder of a terminable annuity should pay 7d. in the pound—he has determined, without raising any question at all, that in the case of a man who has sunk £10,000 in the purchase of an annuity for life, he shall be subject to a tax of 7d. in the pound; and yet he now seeks to draw this distinction in favour of persons whose position I may say, without hesitation, is far more fortunate than that of many of those to whose taxation upon the full scale he has offered no objection. If the test of the hon. and learned gentleman is a good one, let him go into the market and ask what is the value of the various incomes to which I have alluded, and let him apply his test in reference to the answer which he will receive. Then, by a future schedule, I am about to subject the holders of office, without any exemption, to the payment of a tax of sevenpence in the pound. All clerks in public offices, all those holding office during pleasure, are to be required to pay a tax of 7d. in the pound on their incomes. If the uncertainty of the tenure of incomes were to prevail at all in the consideration of the question, I should think, from the experience of late years, that holders of high political offices were entitled to some favour. But it is proposed that all those who are in this position, who have devoted all their abilities to the public service in the various civil departments of the State, shall be called upon to contribute 7d. in the pound on their income, equally with the holders of property in fee-simple. I will take the case of all military officers receiving half-pay, or receiving full-pay and engaged in the performance of their duties: it is proposed to subject them to this payment of 7d. in the pound on the amount of the income which they may derive from their exertions in the public service; and then I say, if you do subject incomes of this kind, so different in their tenure from those arising from fixed property—if you do subject the clergyman of £300 a year, who holds property which is, no doubt, of a permanent character, namely, his tithes, and his living, but whose tenure of it is most precarious—if you do subject him who receives an income, with important professional duties attached to it, to a tax of 7*d.* in the pound—reviewing all these cases, I contend that there is more of justice in subjecting the professional man and the person whose income is derived from trade to this tax, than if I continued all these classes subject to the Income-tax, but said that with respect to trades and professions there should be an exemption. [Viscount Howick: An exemption is not asked for.] No; but an abatement of one-half is asked for, resting on an entirely arbitrary rule. If you ask me what would be the public impression, if I gave way to the proposition of the hon. and learned member, I must say that I think, that if I subjected the widow, with a jointure only enduring for her life, the holder of a terminable annuity, the clergyman, the admiral, the general, and all those other classes to which I have referred, to an equal amount of duty with the holder of property in fee-simple,—but should now take the wealthy physician, the lawyer making a large professional income, and the great banker of London, and relieve them from their liability, my opinion is, that the public impression would be, that this House would be guilty of great injustice in sanctioning such a course to be adopted. If trade has been unproductive, we do not seek to tax it upon any assumption of profit. If, on the average of the last three years, the employment of capital in trade has been accompanied by no return, an exemption from payment will be the consequence. The levy is to be taken, in most cases, where the trade has continued for more than three years, upon the rate of profit derived from the income of the trader during the preceding three years. Allowances and deductions are made in these instances, where I must say, none are made with respect to the landed interests. In the cases of professional men deriving an income of from £2000 to £4000 per annum from their exertions, whether they be physicians or lawyers, I apprehend that they have as great an interest in the maintenance of the tranquillity of the public credit, as many of those classes who would be supposed, by their immediate connections with the country, to be more particularly desirous for the stability of our institutions. So, also, in case of persons engaged in trade, who are as deeply interested in the due support of the credit of the country, at least, as naval or military officers. Therefore it is that I contend that the hon. and learned member is not carrying out those great principles for which he contends, but which I admit to be incapable of execution; because, in order to effect such an object, you must have an inquisition ten times more rigorous than that which is proposed. As I have already said, I do not consider the proposal of the hon. and learned member a just one; if I am to have the Income-tax—and I will not now stop to consider whether it is a proper tax or not, because the principle has already been adopted by the House—it does appear to me, that it is both just and manifestly expedient that all descriptions of incomes should be subjected to it; whether it be a time of war or peace makes no difference whatever; there is no distinction in this case with regard to the period at which the tax is to be imposed. My right hon. friend, (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) said truly, that there was no clamour raised against the application of this tax to professional incomes during the war; and I say, there was none, because it was felt, that to raise such a question would have been to attempt to introduce an unjust distinction. If the distinction is unjust in the time of peace, it is clearly equally so in the time of war. If the income derivable from trade, on account of the fluctuations of trade, ought to contribute less to the State than the income derived from land, what reason is there why that rule should not hold in time of war, as well as in time of peace? If you admit this principle, you will establish a principle which you must admit in time of war, and you will admit that the taxation which existed in 1803 and 1806 was unjust. And whatever may be the emergency or necessities of the country in time of war, you have nothing to do but to tax landed property at 12 per cent., and professional incomes at 6 per cent.; and if that is not sufficient, you must tax landed property at 20 per cent. in time of war; and incomes derivable from professions at 8 or 10 per cent. Nay, I can show good reasons why such a distinction should be drawn in time of war rather than in time of peace. The tendency of war is to increase the value of landed property. That effect was certainly produced during the last war; and war also has a tendency to depress commercial enterprise, and to interfere with the profits of trade. If it be just to make this distinction, then, in time of peace, it is equally so in time of war. It is quite clear that, if the justice of the principle now urged be admitted, upon some future occasion it will be said, "True, you want twenty millions, and you must raise it by an Income-tax; but if it be unjust to subject us to the burden, raise three-fourths on land and one-fourth on us." And, therefore, I think that the establishment of such a principle as that which is contended for by the hon. and learned member, is open to more objections than that which is based upon the maintenance of the nominal equality of taxation. The amount of duty now proposed by the hon. and learned member is 3½d. in the pound, but he leaves the question open to the consideration, whether that contribution be just or not. He claims for his proposition that it will do "rough justice," but there may be parties in the time of war who will think it desirable to smooth down his injustice, by still further removing the liabilities to the imposition of which he consents. When I consider the whole of the circumstances of this case—that if I call on any particular interest to part with its protection—if I abolish the prohibitions on the introduction of the produce of foreign countries competing with England, it is in the belief that I am in the course of passing financial and commercial measures to benefit the trading classes of the community of England, whose decline must be accompanied with that of other classes, and that I still believe that the first effect of that commercial tariff will be to benefit those who, in the first instance, derive their property from trade. I believe there will be no persons who will derive more benefit from these measures than those who are necessarily resident in this country; and I hope, and trust, and believe, that they will, in the diminished cost of living—not merely in the articles of produce of this country, but from the general effect of the tariff in respect of the manufactured articles of other countries, derive advantages which will afford an ample compensation, even to members of professions and trades, for a great part of the reduction which I shall make in their incomes, in asking them to pay out of any of their incomes amounting to £300 per annum, as little as £8 in three years. And it is on these grounds that I must adhere to the proposal which I originally made, which I believe to be more in accordance with justice than the principle involved in the amendment of the hon. and learned member for Bath, and I am not to be deterred, from any fear of the responsibility, from a firm adherence to that which I believe to be most consonant with justice, and most for the public benefit.

The committee divided on the question that the blank be filled with "threepence halfpenny;" Ayes, 112; Noes, 258; majority, 146.

Schedule D agreed to. Schedule E was then put, and Sir C. Napier moved the insertion of the following words:—"And except the pay-officers under the rank of general and flag officers, whose incomes are derived solely from their services, and not receiving pensions, either for wounds or good service, and are not paid as Queen's aides-de-camp, which shall be exempted."

Sir Robert Peel: Sir, no person can have a higher respect for the army and navy than I have, nor can any one entertain a deeper sense of gratitude for the services which they have performed towards this country, nor have a stronger confidence that when called upon, upon future occasions, they will emulate the fame which they have already gained on all past occasions. No one can more deeply regret the necessity of the imposition of this tax; but, inasmuch as there is to be a tax of this description to be generally imposed upon all incomes above £150 a-year, I do not think it would be just to take a particular class and exempt them from the operation of it. I must say, that the gallant officer behind me (Captain Carnegie) has given the proposition a support worthy of his profession—and I cannot help thinking that the officers of the army and navy would not wish to be exempted from the operation of a tax which all other classes must suffer under. I think, then, that my gallant friend has correctly stated the feelings of the officers of his service upon this subject. The question is not now what the hon. and gallant officer the member for Brighton has stated, as to whether or not a sufficient emergency has arisen to warrant the imposition of this tax, the House being in committee now upon the subject, we must assume that that emergency has arisen, and that the imposition must be applied. Assuming that to be the fact, I do not think a particular class ought to be exempted from the operation of the Income-tax.

The committee divided on the question that the words be added: Ayes, 32; Noes, 195; majority, 163. Schedule agreed to. House resumed. Committee to sit again.

INCOME-TAX COMMITTEE.

MAY 2, 1842.

House in committee on the Income-tax bill. On clause 4 being proposed, Mr. Hume stated that he objected to the clause as it stood, but he knew it would be needless to bring forward any amendment, for government had determined that the bill should pass, and he admitted that it was of the utmost importance to the commercial interests that it should do so with as little delay as possible.

SIR R. PEEL said, that he had heard with the greatest satisfaction the opinion of the hon. member for Montrose, in respect to the advantage of their being enabled, at as early a period as they could, consistently with their performance of their public duty, to apply themselves to the consideration of the tariff. He thought it right that measures of such importance should undergo the serious consideration of the House. In regard to those motions for adjournment, he had never complained that they offered any unfair obstacle to the progress of the present measure. At the same time, he must say, that during those discussions, he entertained the strongest opinion, formed on the representations made to him, that it was of the utmost importance, to settle, as soon as they could, the commercial state of the country. That uncertainty removed, he thought there was every prospect of increased trade, and a greater demand for labour. Since the hon. member had admitted that the House had marked its sense of the principle of the present measure, he trusted that hon. gentlemen opposite would agree with him in thinking, that as little delay as possible should take place, in regard to the details and machinery of the bill. In regard to the objection urged by the hon. member against the present clause, he thought it would be liable to great exception, if government had proposed to supersede the local authorities, and to appoint officers of their own. If the principle recommended by the hon. member for Montrose was a good one for the present tax, it would also be a good one for the assessed taxes. Now, the government proposed to take the land-tax commissioners as they found them. The bill contained two principles in regard to the collection of the tax. In the first place, the tax would be collected, and the scrutiny made, by local authorities, but inasmuch as it was said, that many parties would object to the scrutiny being made by local authorities, the bill gave them the power of going before the local authorities, if they thought fit to do so, but if they objected to this, they had the option of going before the special commissioners, appointed by government. There would, therefore, be a local and a government tribunal, and the party aggrieved could go before either of them. It was more consistent to leave the local tribunals in the hands of the local authorities, and those of the government in the hands of the government. If the hon. member for Montrose was of opinion that the land-tax commissioners should be abolished, that was a subject for general consideration, but not one to be effected under a temporary act. He very much doubted whether they could constitutionally abolish altogether, those privileges which the counties had of assessing themselves, and of collecting the tax by means of local authorities. He would, however, reserve his opinion on that point, but he could not acquiesce in the suggestion of the hon. member for Montrose, and he hoped he had said enough to convince him that it was not desirable.

In reply to Mr. Labouchere,—

Sir R. Peel said, he was sure the right hon. gentleman opposite would not, on consideration, charge him with the intention to impose upon the House, any such dresse, as that to which he had referred. He should not even have alluded to the delay that had taken place, but that the hon. member for Montrose, had, under the influence of a sense of public duty, stated the necessity of discussing the proposed alterations in the tariff, with as little delay as possible. He said, at once, that he had heard that declaration of the hon. member with satisfaction, and admitted, that it was of the highest importance to the commercial interests of the country, that they should be enabled to take time for the full consideration of the tariff; and that, at as early a period as possible, consistent with their due consideration, the question should be settled. He did not by that imply that any hon. member had interposed, or wished to interpose, any unnecessary delay, and to relieve the mind of the hon. gentleman, he was prepared to declare that the interval that had elapsed since the introduction of the tariff, had had this advantage: that it had enabled the government to hold intercourse with, and receive communications from, persons connected with commerce, who would be affected by the proposed alterations, and the information so obtained had been found most valuable in completing the tariff. There were three or four calculations which were not yet concluded; but he might say, that the measure was so far completed, that they should be prepared to enter into the discussion of it, as soon as the report of the committee upon the Income-tax should have passed.

Mr. B. Wood wished to know, whether the government had taken his proposition into consideration—that a party should be allowed to set off his losses under one schedule, against his gains under another?

Sir R. Peel said, the time for bringing up the clause of the hon. gentleman had not yet arrived. The proper occasion for bringing the subject under the consideration of the House would be after the bill had gone through committee. For his own part, he had only to say, that he adhered to his promise, and had given it his fullest consideration, and he was bound to say, that he had found such objections to the proposal of the hon. gentleman, that it would be exceedingly difficult for him to give to it his sanction. The government were of opinion, after maturely considering the matter, that the proposal would give opportunities for the commission of the most extensive frauds, and it was for the purpose of guarding against that inconvenience, that they had introduced the bill in its present shape.

A great number of clauses were agreed to. After rule 3, in schedule C, had been disposed of, Mr. Baring moved, as an addition, the insertion of words to the effect, that property in the funds, &c., belonging to foreigners, should be exempted from the tax.

Sir R. Peel was quite ready to take the advice of the hon. member, and consider maturely whether it would not be better for his own character, as well as for the character of the House and country, to exempt foreigners, not subjects of Great Britain, from the tax which was now proposed. He was quite ready to consider that question. Let the House consider what the amount was, which they expected to gain from this source. It was calculated that the sum would be between £10,000 and £20,000. Really, that sum was so trifling that if they should be induced to commit an act of the slightest injustice towards any body of men, it would hardly have been worth while to do so for so small an amount. The principal arguments which had been advanced by the two hon. members who had addressed the House in favour of the motion, had been based on the former practice of parliament, and the dicta of Mr. Fox. Now, what were the dicta of Mr. Fox? He (Mr. Fox) said, it would be inconsistent with the principles upon which parliamentary representation subsisted, to give to the Crown the property of foreigners, in addition to that derived from those whom we represent; and how could her Majesty thank her good and loyal subjects for their benevolence, when the grant would not be wholly from themselves, but partly from foreigners? Mr. Fox said, that we could not tax foreigners who were not subjects of Great Britain. What did the bill say on this subject? He would refer to schedule D. It says—"Upon the annual profits or gains, arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain, for any kind of property whatever, whether situated in Great Britain or elsewhere, upon any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere, there shall be charged yearly, for every 20s. of the amount of such profits or gains, the sum of 7d."

He thought it would appear clear, from what he had just read to the House, that they had acted upon the constitutional doctrines of Mr. Fox. Foreigners were not exempt from this tax imposed on all mortgaged property. If they had property invested in railroad speculations, the profits were deducted from the expenses; but if they held property in the British funds, then it was said they ought to be exempted from the payment of any deduction, and to tax their property under these circumstances was declared to be a great and flagrant act of injustice. This was to be the only exception, it was only to be viewed as unjust when applied to money invested by foreigners in the English funds. On what account, he would ask, was it so unjust? Did the public records or acts of parliament make any distinction between British subjects and foreigners? There was no clause in any act of parliament to exempt foreigners from any of the responsibilities, or privileges, which result from loans granted to the State. The British funds were as open to the foreigner as to the subjects of this country; they were, in fact, open to the whole world, and every individual, without any distinction of country, may derive all the protection which the British funds offered. It was well known that the English funds had lately been advancing, and although he had no doubt that several circumstances had contributed to that event, still it was a fact, that since the Income-tax had been proposed for the adoption of parliament, the funds had risen 4 per cent. Now, what was the fact with reference to the English funds? The foreigner had the advantage of relieving himself, if he thought proper, by removing his money from the British funds, under certainly very favourable circumstances. He had the option of doing so at this time, if he wished to escape the Income-tax. The foreigner saw a disposition on the part of government, to increase the value of funded property, not by having recourse to fresh loans, but by making a great sacrifice to meet the financial embarrassments of the State. It did appear unjust to him, that the foreigner should derive the sole advantage which resulted from this national sacrifice, and should not contribute his share towards the exigencies of the country. He thought the natural consequences of not incurring any additional public debt, would be considerably to enhance the public credit. The right hon. gentleman, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, (Mr. F. Baring) would exempt all foreigners, not being resident in any part of her Majesty's dominions, from this tax. He would like to know whether foreigners resident in any of our colonial possessions, in the Cape of Good Hope, or in Canada, were to be exempted? What constituted residence, according to the opinion of the right hon. member, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer? He said,—“The annuities, dividends, and shares, bona fide belonging to any person not being a subject of her Majesty, and not being resident in Great Britain, or elsewhere, within the dominions of her Majesty, during such time as the same shall continue the property of such person, and such person shall not be resident in Great Britain, or elsewhere, within the dominions of her Majesty, as aforesaid; provided that such annuities, dividends, or shares, shall have been bona fide the property of such person, on the 22nd of April, 1842, and shall be duly claimed and ascertained in the manner hereinafter mentioned.”

Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox exempted foreigners from the tax during the war, upon political and prudential reasons, and totally without relation to any abstract considerations of justice. He was quite aware that the sum to be derived from the taxation of stock held by foreigners would be very inconsiderable, but he also felt that there was no valid claim for exemption. A full consideration of justice to all had led him to impose a tax upon all. The foreigner had purchased into our funds, because of the security which it offered him—that property was now more valuable in consequence of the sacrifices which the people of England was about to make, and it would be very unfair that he should go wholly free from taxation while the Englishman bore it patiently.

The committee divided on the question that the words proposed by Mr. Baring be added:—Ayes, 40; Noes, 203; majority, 163. House resumed; committee to sit again.

THE NATIONAL PETITION—THE CHARTER.

MAY 3, 1842.

In the debate arising upon the presentation of the National Petition, coupled with Mr. T. Duncombe's motion, “That the petitioners be heard by themselves or their counsel at the bar of the House”—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Sir, I hope I should have been exposed to no misconstruction if I had remained silent, yet, from the course which this debate has taken, I am unwilling to expose myself to the hazard of a misconstruction, or to shrink from the duty of declaring boldly and decidedly my opinions on the subject of this petition. Until I heard the construction put upon its prayer by the hon. gentleman (Mr. T. Duncombe), I thought there had been two propositions to be considered by the House,—not quite consistent or compatible it is true,—but still, on the face of the document there appeared to be two proposals. The one that I should admit the petitioners to be heard, in order that they might state their grievances by their counsel or agents, while the other appeared to be an imperative demand that I should immediately, and without consideration, pass into a law every demand that is contained in the charter. Sir, I do not want to take any advantage of the charter for the purpose of vindicating my vote. If the question of the charter be not before us, I am ready to give my vote against hearing the petitioners at the bar of the House of Commons in support of their allegations. I shall give this vote on various grounds. First, I am satisfied that I cannot be convinced of the policy of acceding to the prayer of this petition. I come to the conclusion to which the hon. member for Leicester has already come—the foregone conclusion, that those demands, if complied with, would be mischievous to the petitioners themselves; and having come to that conclusion, I think it more just and more respectful to tell them that I do not intend to accede to their petition, than to give them a delusive hearing, which I know can have no useful result. Why, Sir, what does the hon. member for Finsbury, the colleague of the hon. gentleman, tell me? That on the result of my decision with respect to the hearing of the petitioners will depend either awakened hope or fearful despondency. Well, I will not awaken hope by countenancing expectations which I know must end in disappointment. The hon. gentleman says he wishes to pledge me to nothing, he only wishes me to hear the grievances detailed. But he asks me to hear the allegations of the petitioners, and those allegations are neither more nor less than an impeachment of the whole constitution of this country, and the whole frame of society. The petition tells me that it is wrong to maintain an Established Church—it says that £9,000,000 of money are annually abstracted from the people for the purpose of maintaining the church. The petition tells me that the people of Ireland are entitled to the repeal of the union. The petition draws a most invidious comparison between the expenses of the Sovereign and those of a labourer. I say the petition is altogether an impeachment of the constitution of this country, and of the whole frame of society. And how am I to gratify the demands of the petitioners? Hear them at the bar! Why, if I hear them, let me hear them effectually. But is it an effectual hearing to permit four or five persons on their behalf to make speeches at the bar of the House? Are those speeches to be relied upon? Suppose the speeches at the bar failed of producing an effect, and a demand were then made for an inquiry, should I refuse it, or suspend the whole public business of the country, in order that the bulk of these allegations might be ascertained as to the policy of an Established Church, and a repeal of the union? Is not that the only effectual way in which the petitioners would have an opportunity of explaining their grievances? and is it for the advantage of the petitioners themselves that I should suspend the public business of the country for the purpose of inquiring into this subject? What is the petition? If I had a doubt, which I have not, upon this subject, strange as it should seem, the speech of the hon. and learned member for Bath would have convinced me that the greatest absurdity ever committed would be to enter into an inquiry with respect to the allegations in this petition—a petition which does not represent the sentiments of those who signed it—a petition that is utterly at variance with the judgment and good sense of the 3,000,000 of petitioners, but which has been imposed upon them by a cowardly demagogue whom the hon. gentleman knows, and whose personal knowledge of his character entitles him to speak of him with disrespect and contempt. I take the description of the petition from the hon. and learned gentleman himself, and could I admit the framer of this petition, a person so described by the hon. and learned gentleman—a man who has perverted to his own evil purposes the minds of the respectable, intelligent, industrious, honest, labouring classes of this country, to the bar of this House, for he no doubt will be the person selected to defend the allegations of this trashy petition which he has drawn up, without being a party to the continuance of that delusion under which they labour? It is into the allegations of the petition that the hon. member for Finsbury asked me to go; and the allegations of the petition have been described by the hon. and learned gentleman the member for Bath. When I refer to the prayer of the petition, when I refer to the character of him who is said to be its author, when I refer to the certain consequences of raising expectations which I know I must disappoint, I must say I think I am acting more respectfully and more justly towards the petitioners in refusing at once to accede to their demands, than by giving them a delusive hearing at the bar and afterwards telling them they have made no impression whatever on my mind. The hon. and learned member for Bath has described the character of the people of England. He said, that in other countries of Europe the appeal was to force, while in this country the appeal was to law. He said, the labouring classes possessed the physical force, which if they were inclined to enforce it would overpower every opposition; but they were controlled by their good sense and by their willing obedience to the law, for which they entertained respect. The hon. and learned gentleman pointed to the decrepit constable going into the midst of a crowd and seizing a powerful man; the officer of the law was unresisted: and although his prisoner was a person of much superior strength, he evinced a willing submission to authority, and the people by whom he was surrounded offered no opposition; but what nerved the arms of the constable? why it was the tacit influence of the law, that stood behind him. And what had given that influence to the law? What, but the conviction that it is just? Do you believe that if the people of this country were in the condition described in this memorial, which declares that "This House has by unconstitutional means created an unbearable despotism on the one hand, and a degrading slavery on the other,"—if that was a just representation of the people and the constitution of England, would that law which backs the decrepit constable possess the authority and influence it now exercises? Do you think the people, of whom the hon. and learned member has given such a description, would have that respect for the law they now entertain, if they did not feel that that law which guarantees property, which secures liberty, is a law equally for the poor and the rich? What description was given of the people of England by the other hon. member for Finsbury? He said, "I have travelled through various parts of Europe; I have had opportunities of observing the condition of the labouring classes abroad, and comparing it with our home population, and I defy you to find a more intelligent, a more prudent, a more independent, or a more high-spirited race than the people of England."

I grant it; but I ask him what has formed their character? Is it to the bricks and stones of their houses that we must attribute their character? No, it is to the laws and institutions of a free country. The high-minded, independent character of which the hon. and learned gentleman spoke, has been formed under those laws and institutions of which this petition contains the impeachment. And if it were true that we lived in a state of despotism on the one hand, or degrading slavery on the other, the people of this country would never have that respect for authority, nor would they deserve the character which the hon. and learned gentleman has given them. I did not understand the right hon. member for Edinburgh to state, that the people of this country were of a sanguinary disposition; and that if we admitted them to power, spoliation of property would be the result, but that there would be great danger if they consented to the prayer of this petition, so prepared by a designing and cowardly demagogue—adopting the description of the hon. and learned gentleman; or, if this be a libel upon the petitioners, how can the hon. and learned gentleman maintain that those who have been parties to a petition so full of trash and delusion, might not in other instances fall victims to other designing demagogues, who may say to them, "Now you are possessed of power, now you have the means of exercising it, and you are a degraded and cowardly race if you do not enforce your own terms?" I do not believe they would at once yield to such delusions; but what security can the hon. and learned gentleman give, that having been deluded once, the petitioners would not be deluded again? I understood the right hon. member for Edinburgh to argue, that, if you make an alteration in your constitution upon principles like those laid down in this petition—which states that public faith ought not to be maintained, and that the public creditor should not be paid, because debts were incurred by parliament without due authority, for the support of wars which were unjust—which affirms that the possession of the land is a monopoly—that machinery is a monopoly—if you allow the petitioners to come to your bar, to advocate an alteration of the constitution on those principles, you will be exciting hopes and expectations which you cannot realize without leading to confusion, and which you cannot disappoint without danger. I understood the right hon. gentleman to argue that anarchy and confusion must arise from that state of things, because there would be no security for property: and that, in fact, uncertainty and spoliation of property must necessarily arise. But I did not understand him to affirm of the people of England that they were of a sanguinary and barbarous disposition, and inclined to possess themselves of the property of others. On account, then, of the delusion which must arise from granting the prayer of the petition, I cannot accede to this motion. If I am told that the charter is involved—if I am now deciding the question of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and vote by ballot, I am content to rest the issue upon that ground also. [I believe that universal suffrage will be incompatible with the maintenance of the mixed monarchy under which we live—I believe that mixed monarchy is important in respect to the end which is to be achieved rather than in respect to the means by which it is gained—that end I understand, to be the promotion of the happiness of the people; but in a country circumstanced like this, I will not consent to substitute mere democracy for that mixed form of government under which we live, and which, imperfect as it may be, has secured for us during 150 years more of practical happiness and of true liberty than has been enjoyed in any other country that ever existed, not excepting the United States of America, not excepting any other country whatever. We may be suffering severe privation. I deeply regret it, I sympathise with the sufferers, I admire their fortitude, I respect their patience, but I will not consent to make these momentous changes in the constitution, with the certainty that I shall afford no relief to the present privation and suffering, with the certainty only that I shall incur the risk of destroying that constitution, which, I believe, if you will permit it to remain untouched, will secure to your descendants as it has secured to you and your ancestors, those blessings which you will never find in any rash or precipitate changes, however plausible in speculation they may appear to be.]

The motion was negatived by a majority of 236.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—THE TARIFF.

MAY 10, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in introducing the above measure to the House, spoke to the following effect:—I was in hopes that I should have been enabled to make any statement I have to offer on the subject of the proposed commercial tariff, after the House had resolved itself into a committee on the Customs' Duties' Act. It is quite clear that it will be for general convenience that my statement should precede any extended discussion of the subject; and as the noble lord and other hon. members have given notice of motions which I apprehend they intend to bring on before the House resolves itself into the committee, I have no option but to make my statement on the motion for reading the order of the day. At the same time it is not my wish to anticipate, in what I have to say, the debates which will probably take place upon the motions which individual members have inserted in the votes. It seems to me that it will be better, as far as I can do so consistently with my duty, to avoid entering into the consideration of particular points. I rejoice that we have now arrived at that period when we can enter, as I trust we shall, seriously and continuously upon the discussion of the tariff. I am aware that much public inconvenience has necessarily resulted from the delay that has unavoidably occurred. At whatever period this subject was introduced, it was absolutely necessary that there should be a considerable interval between the first proposition of the plan submitted by government, and the consideration of it by the House in its perfected form. At the same time, it will not be understood that I am complaining of delay, or that impediments have been thrown in the way of discussion; such a delay, I say, was inevitable from the nature of the question, and I am sure all who hear me will feel that it was the duty of government to avoid communications beforehand with parties personally interested. It would have been impossible in those communications to have avoided indicating something of the intentions of ministers, and thus private parties with whom the communications had been held would have had an advantage over their competitors. We had, therefore, no alternative but to make our proposition, in the first instance, without the advantage of private information; and after it was made, parties had a fair right to be heard in respect of the contemplated important changes in our commercial system affecting their pecuniary interests. I trust, therefore, that there has been some compensation for the evil of delay necessarily belonging to a proposal of this nature, and that an opportunity has been afforded to those whose partial and individual interests are affected, maturely to consider the whole scope of the plan of her Majesty's government, and fairly to consider whether they will not find ample compensation for the loss they may sustain in their special occupations and private interests, in the general advantages which we may hope will arise out of the measure in contemplation. The House has before it, in the papers recently printed, the existing rates of duty on the import of foreign articles; it has also before it the amount collected under those existing rates; it has before it the original proposition submitted by her Majesty's government for the amendment of the commercial tariff of the empire; and lastly, it has before it the corrected proposal, and consequently an opportunity of comparing the one with the other. A judgment may thus be formed of the intended modifications, and a satisfactory conclusion may be arrived at as to the temper and spirit in which this great arrangement has been undertaken by her Majesty's servants. I think it will and must be evident to all who have compared our first proposal with our last, that no undue influences have been allowed to operate upon the minds of ministers. In the course of the discussions I was repeatedly assured that I should not be able to resist the influence of interested parties. I appeal to the first proposal of government and to the last, and I leave it to any impartial man to determine whether any changes have been introduced from unworthy and improper motives. I think it will be seen that, whether the parties were powerful or weak, if they had reason on their side in favour of a modification, that modification has been made. If powerful parties have suggested alterations without reason, it will be manifest that these alterations have been resisted; if weak and unprotected parties submitted their claims to a farther consideration of some portion of the original proposition, those parties, though weak and unprotected, have had a fair hearing, and if favour has been shown to any one it is to those who are weak and unprotected. I shall avoid as far as I can any reference to specific subjects to be separately brought under the consideration of the House, and I will state what is the general scope and purport of the commercial arrangement ministers have found themselves called upon to recommend. The general object of it is to simplify the existing law. It cannot be denied that the existing law is in many respects obscure and inconsistent, and that there are duties applicable to particular articles which are not reconcilable with principle. In the year 1787 Mr. Pitt consolidated the custom laws, and during the war, according to the degree of financial pressure, it was the practice occasionally to raise the customs' duties indiscriminately, with a view to revenue merely, and without considering the general results it might produce. I think that a great part of the anomalies and inconsistencies of our present tariff arises from that practice of an indiscriminate per centage being applied to various articles. In 1825 the customs' laws again came under the consideration of parliament, and, at the instance of Mr. Huskisson, many important changes were made. I may here remark that I wish to claim for the present government no undue share of credit for the proposal they have made, and I am bound to admit, that the last occasion on which the attention of the House was called to the subject was, when the committee on importations was appointed, in the year 1839. I do not say that if time had permitted the investigation might not have been more general and the result more complete, but I never did at the time, and I do not now, wish to depreciate the labours of that committee, or to deny that, in directing the attention of the public to the state of the tariff and importation duties, it established a claim to public gratitude. We have, therefore, applied ourselves to the imperfections in the tariff, in order to make it clear and intelligible, and as far as possible consistent, which, of itself, without reference to the amount of duty, is certainly a great public object. Speaking generally, we have also sought to remove all prohibitions—all absolute prohibitions—upon the import of foreign articles, and we have endeavoured to reduce duties which are so high as to be prohibitory to such a scale as may admit of fair competition with domestic produce. In cases where that principle has been departed from, and prohibitory duties maintained, there we justify our departure from the rule by the special circumstances of the case; but the general rule has been to abolish prohibitions and to reduce prohibitory duties within the range of fair competition. With respect to raw materials which constitute the elements of our manufactures, our object, speaking generally, has been to reduce the duties on them to almost a nominal amount. In half-manufactured articles, which enter almost as much as the raw material into our domestic manufacture, we have reduced the duty to a moderate amount; and with regard to completely manufactured articles, our design has been to remove prohibition, and to reduce prohibitory duties, so that the manufactures of foreign countries may enter into a fair competition with our own. I still entertain that confident belief and expectation which I expressed on first intimating the intentions of government as to this tariff, that the general result of it will be, if adopted by the House, materially to diminish the charge of living in this country. If you say to me that we do not make sufficient reductions on particular commodities, which are material items in the expenditure of a private family, I am quite ready to admit it, as far as relates to individual articles; but I speak of the general effect of the tariff as proposed by her Majesty's government. If there be any truth in the principles either of trade or of arithmetic, I contend that its inevitable effect must be to give great advantages to all classes of consumers, and to make a considerable reduction in the present cost of living in this country, as compared with the cost of living in other countries. Taking the reductions on raw materials, on half-manufactured goods, and on manufactured goods, I am persuaded that the general result will be to make a considerable saving in the expenses of every family in the kingdom. I am quite aware that in this case, and in all such cases, it is impossible to make any great reduction on articles of general demand without affecting some special and particular trade. If I am told that we have dealt with too many articles, and that it would have been better to have taken only a few, my answer is, that there is this important advantage in dealing generally with the whole, that while we do in some quarters a partial injury, even there by our other reductions we make a corresponding compensation. I will now take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to some of the reductions proposed by her Majesty's government, and I will first advert to an article regarding which a great benefit will, I apprehend, be conferred upon agriculture, I allude to clover-seed. In the breeding and feeding of cattle, upon the improved system of agriculture, this is a most important item; and at the present duty of 20s. per cwt., such has been the demand for foreign clover-seed, that the amount of revenue produced by it in 1840 was no less than £141,000. Clover-seed is produced in some of the southern counties of England; but Scotland and some of our northern counties, are entirely dependent upon an extrinsic, if not a foreign supply. We propose to reduce the duty from 20s. to 10s. per cwt.—that is to say 100 per cent.; and I deeply regret that in making this reduction, some injury will be inflicted on those districts which have hitherto partially supplied the demand for clover-seed, and, indeed, in consequence of the high duty, have had a comparative monopoly. Our regret has been overruled by the necessity of the case, which is proved by the large importation of clover-seed in 1840, yielding £141,000, and by lowering the duty we propose to facilitate the importation of the article which will be a great advantage to the agriculturists of the north. The same reasoning will apply to grass-seeds; there may be in some parts of the kingdom a partial failure, and we may be able to procure a supply of a better article from the continent, and is it not to the manifest advantage of agriculture to promote the introduction of what is in some sort to be looked upon in the light of a raw material? We have, therefore, reduced the duty from 20s. per cwt. to 5s. per cwt. on grass-seeds. Take, again, onions. [Laughter]. Gentlemen may laugh; but let me tell them that the onion is a vegetable of the greatest importance to the vast body of the community; and if there should be a partial failure of this seed, it is most desirable that we should have the means of procuring it from the continent. The duty at present is 1s. 6d. per lb., an amount that encourages smuggling; and we recommend so considerable a reduction, that no doubt particular and interested parties have been greatly but unnecessarily alarmed. We propose to reduce the duty of 1s. 6d. per lb. to £1 per cwt. Then as to linseed, hempseed, and other oil seeds, the change of duty will, of course, be of advantage to the crushers in this country, and enable them to compete with the foreigner. On these seeds, we reduce the duty from one shilling to one penny per quarter. The article is one of great importance; and the same character may be given to that to which I shall next advert: I mean foreign woods for furniture and for dyeing. The duty on foreign woods has ranged from 50 to 100 per cent. on the value of the article, and to the high amount is, I believe, to be attributed the recent great and injurious change in this kingdom in respect to cabinet-making. There is no country in the world where greater skill might be shown in the manufacture of furniture than in this. I cannot conceive a country possessing greater advantages of consummate skill and industry for supplying other countries; but what has been the consequence of the high duty? I know that there have been cases where mahogany has been imported into England, exported to the continent, and reimported into England in the shape of furniture on the payment of 20 per cent. duty. This may seem extraordinary, but the fact is so, and great advantages must be the result of lowering the duty on woods, and I do not in the least despair by the reduction of that duty, and the encouragement of competition among the skilful mechanics of this country, to bring about such improvements in the manufacture of furniture, that, instead of importing it as at present from France and Germany, we shall manufacture largely for export, and that by our own excellent mechanics, will outstrip all their foreign competitors. It is impossible to deny that of late years, whether from this cause alone or others, conjointly, the manufacture of furniture has been very much transferred from this country to France and Germany. So much, then, for the reduction of duty on wood for the purpose of ornamental furniture. By the by, I must not overlook another very important consideration with reference to this point—I mean the great advantage that will arise generally from the reduction of the duty on mahogany. It has of late years been discovered that this article, which hitherto has been exclusively devoted to furniture and ornamental purposes, might most advantageously be applied to purposes of ship-building. It has peculiar properties for resisting the dry rot, and if the price were reduced, it might most extensively be employed in some parts of ships. If I did not wish to avoid entering too much into detail, I could give examples of the effects that will be produced by the very material reductions proposed in the duties upon dyewoods; but that must be obvious to every man at all conversant with the trade of the country. There is no part of the tariff in which we make more important alterations than in that which relates to the reduction of the duty on ores. Whether I speak of iron, lead, or copper, in my opinion great advantage to the commerce and manufactures of this country will result from permitting the entry of these important articles at much more diminished rates of duty than at present. Let me take the case of copper. At present you cannot import and smelt foreign copper for internal use. You have greater advantages than any other country possesses with respect to coal—you have it at a cheaper rate; and you can apply that coal with great advantage to the smelting of foreign copper; but when it is smelted you cannot make use of it for the purpose of home manufacture, and you send it to France and Belgium to be rolled and manufactured. What is the consequence? Why, that those foreign countries can come into the markets of Europe, undersell you in copper smelted by your coal, in bolts for the fastening and copper for the sheathing of ships, and in a variety of other articles made of brass and copper, giving in many instances to the foreign manufacturer the advantage of £10 per ton in respect to copper smelted with your coal. In France and Belgium, I believe I state the fact, the price of smelted copper has been less by £10 per ton than in this country; and, as I said before, ships can be fastened and coppered on the continent at a much cheaper rate than in this country. As a decisive proof of the benefit to be derived from reducing the duty on manufactured copper, I may mention that the effect of the tariff has already been, in France and Belgium, to reduce the price of copper. In confirmation, I may refer to something that passed in this country last winter. A foreign power was desirous of entering into a contract for building several steam-ships, an application was made to parties in this country; the only objection to entering into the contract was the expense of copper fastening, and coppering the vessels, as well as of the copper boilers. A drawback on the amount of copper so to be employed was asked for, or that it should be imported duty free. Of course it was impossible to concede this point, and it was stated that the contract must on this account be transferred to Rotterdam, or to some port of Belgium. I believe that that course was not taken, and that the acceptance and fulfilment of the contract is suspended until the decision of this House is known. There is every ground for thinking that the expected reduction in the price of copper will enable the parties in this contract, to execute the contract which otherwise must be transferred to some ports of the continent. From copper, I proceed to another important element of our manufactures—I mean oils and extracts. The domestic manufacture of this country has of late years been exposed to comparative disadvantage, in consequence of the price of oils, and of these no one is more valuable for the purpose than spermaceti oil. The present duty on spermaceti oil, train oil, and blubber, is £26 12s. per ton, and we propose to reduce the duty on train oil and blubber to £6 per ton, and upon spermaceti oil to £15 per ton. Thus we shall introduce the produce of the American fisheries into competition with the produce of our own fisheries, and prevent the price of oil in this country from reaching an extraordinary or extravagant amount. I hope, Sir, that in stating these details, I am not needlessly detaining the House; I want to establish by proof a position, of the truth of which I feel confident, that the general result of this tariff, if adopted by the House, will be to give new life, and activity to commerce, and to make a reduction to those charges which are now incurred by residence in this country. A very short time since the price of spermaceti oil in this country was from £60 to £70 per ton; but lately, I think in 1839 or 1840, it had risen to £95, and even to £111, per ton, and the effect was a great diminution of the consumption. The manufacturer who required that oil had no alternative but to consume olive or other vegetable oils, which did not answer his purpose so well, or to pay an extravagant price for spermaceti oil, I mean extravagant as compared to the price of that oil in the United States. There are no oils that can be substituted for it without disadvantage; vegetable oils have not the quality that is valuable in spermaceti oil, and yet we have had to carry on a formidable rivalry with the United States in some branches of manufacture with the disadvantage of having to pay 8s. or 8s. 6d. per gallon for oil which in America is sold for 3s. 9d. or 4s. per gallon—a difference of about 100 per cent. The reduction of duty we propose, under this head, while it will prove highly beneficial to manufactures, will not injuriously affect the capital employed in that important branch of our commerce, the sperm fishery. At the same time, it is important to take a security, that when sperm oil bears the price it has reached of late years, there should be some competition with the produce of other countries, which will reduce the price within moderate limits; and I do not believe it possible, when the price is reasonable in this country, that the Americans can inflict any injury on the British fisheries. From oils I pass to dye-stuffs and drugs, and this point is materially connected with the adulteration of medicines. In respect to dye-stuffs, without entering into minute details, I may state generally that the present amount of duty on those articles imported is so great as to lead to extensive smuggling. Very recently, a person who had smuggled a quantity of nux vomica compounded with the custom-house, and paid £1,000, to escape the rigour of the law. The effect of imposing an excessive duty has been in this, as in other cases, to lead to an illicit importation of the article. On the proposed change in the duty on timber, I believe, we are to have a separate discussion—a difference of opinion, I know, has been expressed on the subject of the proposed reduction of the duty on that article. For my part, I must say, that the more I consider the subject, the more firmly I hold the opinion that we are about to confer an important benefit on the consumer by the relinquishment of a certain amount—a very great amount, I admit, of revenue. Here I may be allowed to support my views by a dictum of Mr. Deacon Hume, who observed, “we have abundance of untaxed coal; abundance of untaxed iron; we only want abundance of untaxed wood, in order to be provided cheaply with the three great primary raw materials of employment and industry.”

That was the opinion, shortly expressed, of Mr. Deacon Hume, with respect to the great advantages of a reduction of duty on this article. I am afraid we cannot confer on the consumer the benefit of untaxed wood; I wish we could; but a total reduction of duty would be, I think, unwise. To admit an unlimited competition with the colonies in an article of so much importance to them, would I think be a course open to grave objection. But the arrangement ultimately to import colonial timber free from duty, will keep in check any demand which might be made upon you, in the event of your being disposed to afford additional facilities for the importation of Baltic timber. I am aware that it is objected to my plan—that it will occasion a loss to the revenue of £600,000; but I do not know any article in which a reduction of price will be more useful. These are the principal raw materials or elements of manufactures in respect to which great reductions have been made; and I have stated some instances of the benefit which will, I think, arise to trade from the plan I have brought forward. I now approach the consideration of a reduction of duty on articles of foreign manufacture. We propose, speaking generally, to apply an amount of duty not exceeding 20 per cent. to such articles. There may be particular exceptions in cases where it has been shown that such a duty would be productive of injury, as I have before stated, the exceptions will be found to be in favour, where favour is shown at all, of the weak and unprotected interests. But the general rule is to establish a maximum duty of 20 per cent. At the present moment, the duties imposed on articles of foreign manufacture are as high in amount as they were during the war. There does not appear to have been any consistent and uniform consideration of the amount of those duties, and they have remained as they stood at the time when they were originally laid on. An objection has, I know, been taken by some gentlemen to the proposed reduction on articles of this class. It is said, that in making that reduction, and inviting the competition of foreign manufacturers, we have begun at the wrong end; that we ought to have dealt more largely with the Corn-laws—that we ought to have reduced to a greater degree the duties on articles of provisions; and that it is not just or wise to reduce the duties on foreign manufactures until such alterations have been made. It is said, that we are subjecting the manufacturers of this country to competition with labour which can be had on the continent on more favourable terms, and that we are bearing with undue hardness on that interest. Now, I wish to consider fairly the force of that objection. My answer to that is, in the first place, that we have reduced in a very material degree the price of the necessaries of life. I will take the article of corn. The duty on the import of foreign wheat during the present week is, I think, 13s. per quarter. If the old law had been still in force, it would have been about 27s. [Interruption.] I shall be much obliged to hon. gentlemen if they will allow me to proceed without interruption in the statement which it is my duty to make. I say, there has been a very material reduction in the duties on the import of foreign corn, and that any man who will compare the duties payable this day on foreign oats, barley, and wheat, with those which would have been payable if the old law had been in force, must admit that there has been a very great diminution. I will now take the article of meat. What do we find to be the existing law in respect to the importation of meat? Why, with the exception of the duty on course salt beef, we find foreign fresh meat, or slightly salted, subject to absolute prohibition. It cannot be imported at all. We find also that fresh pork is equally subject to absolute prohibition. Now, the proposal which, after full consideration, her Majesty's government have come to is, that foreign meat shall be admitted into this country subject to a duty of 8s. per cwt. We find lard, an important article in the consumption by the poor, and also important to manufactures, now subject to a duty of 8s. per cwt. We propose to subject it to a duty of 2s. We find at present salted meat subject to a duty of 12s. the cwt., we propose to reduce it to 8s. the cwt. We find ham subject to a duty of £1 8s., we propose to reduce it to a 100 per cent.; that is to 14s. With respect to live animals—namely, oxen, cows, calves, and sheep, we find them now subject to a duty amounting to an absolute prohibition. We propose to admit them at rates of duty which are supposed by some to be considerably too low, but which, I trust, I shall be able to show are not so; for although the rates we have affixed will give a security against an extravagant increase of price of meat, at seasons when cattle are scarce, yet I feel confident, that by the removal of absolute prohibition, and by the substitution of a reasonable duty on live animals, as well as on fresh meat, the general interests of the country will be benefited, at the same time that the agricultural interest will have no reason whatever to complain. On the contrary, I feel confident that that great interest will, together with all the other interests of the country, derive benefit from the proposed alteration. I think I have now established the proposition I laid down—namely, that with respect to the great leading articles of consumption, wheat, living animals and fresh meat, but particularly with respect to the two latter, her Majesty's government have proposed a measure that will effect a very important reduction in the price to the consumer. I will now take the article of fish. We find the importation of foreign salmon prohibited altogether. We propose a duty of 10*s.* per cwt. on foreign salmon, thus getting rid of the prohibition. Indeed, in every case, we have removed prohibition, and substituted a duty. I am aware that this proposal, with respect to salmon, has excited alarm among persons having important interests in the salmon fisheries. An invidious distinction has hitherto been made in respect to duties imposed on foreign fish: those fish which formed an article of consumption with the rich were admitted free of duty; but fish consumed by the poor have been prohibited, or only admitted at a high rate of duty. I will take a fish in which the poor are most interested—I mean herrings. A particularly important change has been proposed in respect to foreign herrings. ["Hear."] I am almost doubtful, considering the importance which the hon. gentleman attaches to this part of the tariff, whether I am to construe that "hear" into a sign of approbation or of dissent, because I have certainly received the strongest remonstrances against this proposed reduction in respect to herrings, from that part of the country with which the hon. gentleman is connected. At present, all foreign-cured fish are prohibited. We propose, that foreign-cured fish shall be imported at a duty of 2*s.* the cwt. I will read a statement which has been made to me, in a letter from Scotland, with respect to herrings:—"Norway (the writer says) prepares about as many herrings as we do. They go to the Baltic, and the herrings cost them there about 7*s.* 6*d.* to 8*s.* per barrel: ours cost us from 18*s.* to 20*s.* per barrel. I presume, the Norwegian herrings may be landed in Ireland at 11*s.* to 12*s.* per barrel; while ours cannot be taken there for less than from 20*s.* to 22*s.* a barrel. I am a free trader in every other respect; but, with respect to herrings, I caution you against applying the general rule to them."

I give you that as a sample of the general postscript which is attached to every communication her Majesty's government have received respecting every other article in the tariff. Now, I do not share in the apprehension entertained by this doubting correspondent; and I cannot help appealing to him that unless he can convince me that I shall be doing injury to the working classes in the north of Ireland, by enabling them to obtain herrings for 10*s.* a barrel, for which they are at present paying 20*s.*, I do not quite agree that I am absolutely wrong in the change I now propose. But my wish is to encourage the native fishermen, and enable them to compete with foreign fishermen. Why should not the inhabitants of the north of Scotland be enabled to cope with the Norwegian fishermen, in supplying Ireland with herrings? I say, reduce the duty on timber,—enable them to build boats in which they may navigate rougher waters, and traverse more distant seas; and then they will be quite capable of competing with foreign fishermen. Their bravery is as great, and their skill is as great. Let them have the means of obtaining as strong vessels as other fishermen, then new scenes will be open to them, and fresh stimulus will be given for exertion. But to effect this, you must reduce the cost price of the materials with which they work; but, above all, you must reduce the duty on timber. This will enable the British fishermen to compete successfully with the Norwegian in supplying the north of Ireland with fish. With respect then to the article of fish, I think, after what I have stated, it cannot be denied that her Majesty's government have made some important alterations. Now I come to vegetables, and to those which chiefly come into the consumption of the working classes. I find the duty on onions is now 3*s.* per bushel; we propose to reduce it to 6*d.* We find potatoes subject to a duty of 2*s.* per cwt., amounting almost to a prohibition. During the last winter, I received from the north of England and from Scotland many representations upon the subject of the supply of this article. Great alarm was felt respecting it during the prevalence of the wet weather. The price of potatoes appeared to be very low and reasonable, but it was said that the cause of that reduced price was the apprehensions that were felt that the potatoes would not keep, and they were therefore forced into the market. Considerable apprehensions were at that time entertained in Lancashire, and throughout the north of England and Scotland, in respect to the supply of the potatoes failing, and urgent representations were made to the government upon the subject, some parties even suggesting that an order in council should be issued to permit the importation of sound foreign potatoes, to prevent the possibility of a deficient supply. I believe that those apprehensions were not altogether well founded, but, considering the importance of the article, I think a duty of 2s. a cwt. amounts to a prohibition. It is at all events, considerably too high, and a very material reduction ought to be made. I now pass from vegetables to the article of rice. Rice is an article which may be made a most material element in the subsistence of the people of this country. It is a most wholesome and useful article of food. The duty at present on foreign rice is £1 per quarter; we propose to reduce it to 7s. per quarter. I now come to a vegetable, in respect to which some notice has been taken in this House, and questions have been put upon it—I allude to hops. It appears in the printed tariff that no alteration in the duty is to be proposed. I stated on a former occasion that the consideration of this question was encompassed with many difficulties, on account, first, of the mode in which the duty was assessed, and the peculiar nature of the cultivation of the plant; and next, on account of the time when the arrangement for making alteration occurred. I wished to have an opportunity of communicating further with the parties who possessed the requisite local knowledge with respect to these points; and I, therefore, was anxious to suspend legislation upon this important article until I had the opportunity of having a full communication with them. That full communication has taken place, and her Majesty's government have formed their decision with respect to the course it was fitting for them to pursue. Considering the great vicissitudes of the seasons, particularly in their application to the production of this article—considering the great variations in the amount of the supply, and the high price it bears, as compared to the price of other productions—considering also the great importance of this article as entering into that which constitutes the beverage of the people—I mean beer and ale—considering all these things, I do think that the present great duty upon hops is extravagantly high. And although I should be most unwilling in this, as in any other interest, rudely to derange the existing application of capital, or bring about distress which would react upon other parts of the community, still her Majesty's government, after considering the peculiar nature of this article, and the alterations in its price, think that some security ought to be taken against those exorbitant prices which have obtained in some years by reason of the high prohibitory duty now imposed. The present duty on hops is £8 11s. per cwt. After having given the subject full consideration, we are of opinion, contrary, I fear, to the impressions of many, and contrary, certainly, to the remonstrances which her Majesty's government have received on the subject—but still, acting upon one uniform principle with respect to this tariff—we are of opinion that we ought to propose to parliament a considerable reduction of the present duty upon this important article. We therefore propose to reduce the duty of £8 11s. now levied, to £4 10s. per cwt. The effect of this alteration will be, not to injure or check the cultivation of hops, but to afford a security against the extravagant price which that article sometimes reaches in this country when the supply is deficient. Having enumerated these various articles on which alterations are proposed to be made, I maintain that it cannot be justly alleged that her Majesty's government have not made very material reductions, with respect to the price of articles which constitute the subsistence of the people of this country. Take the whole tariff, and not any one individual article, like the Corn-laws, and then can you deny that a material reduction has been made in the cost of sustenance, and that we are justified on that account in calling on the manufacturer to submit to a reduction of those duties which are supposed to constitute his protection? Now, in my opinion, there are very material errors in the general opinion with respect to the comparative cost of living in this country and foreign countries; and you will find, if you institute a comparison, particularly with respect to the inhabitants of large towns on the continent, that the cost of living of skilled manufacturers in those towns is very nearly as great as in this country. I will take the case of Brussels as an instance. A letter has been addressed to her Majesty's government, by a most intelligent and respected individual, and who is at the present moment the representative of her Majesty at the court of Brussels. That gentleman was not invited to express any opinion on the subject, but, no doubt considering the great interest that is now taken in this country respecting these matters, he was induced to make some observations upon the subject. He says:—

“BRUSSELS, May 3, 1842.

“My Lord,—In the attempt so frequently made to establish a comparison between conditions essentially dissimilar, that, namely, of the working man in England and of a man of the same class on the continent, it very commonly happens that no allowance is made for the municipal or ‘octroi’ duties, which in the greater number of cases press heavily upon the latter. The paper which I have the honour of enclosing will show your lordship what the town dues amount to at Brussels upon some of the great articles of consumption, and will prove, at the same time, that these heavy charges have all but doubled during the ten years intervening between 1830 and 1840. Upon cattle the duties leviable on entering the town are in some cases quite as high or higher than those paid upon crossing the frontier. Thus a beast imported from Holland would be subject to a duty of 20*f.* on arriving at Belgium, and to a fresh duty of 24*f.* on passing the gates of Brussels.

This is the communication furnished by a gentleman well qualified to speak upon the subject; and, therefore, in instituting a comparison between the price of articles in England and upon the continent, you must be guided in your conclusions not only by the customs’ duties, but also by the municipal duties of the several towns. But supposing that the answer which I have given upon the question of reduced prices of the articles of consumption should not be entirely satisfactory, yet there is another and an exclusive ground on which, independently of that question, I vindicate a reduction of the duties on articles of foreign manufacture. I say that these high duties are a mere delusion; that they do not constitute a protection to the British manufacturer, and that in looking at those duties for protection he rests entirely upon a fragile and faithless support. The check to their operation is the smuggler. It is a mere delusion to tell the home manufacturer that you levy a duty of 35 and 40 per cent. upon the importation of foreign manufactured articles, if he is robbed of that apparent protection by the importation of the same articles in an illicit way, consequently I think I could conclusively show that there is no reduction proposed with respect to foreign manufactures, which I cannot vindicate on this single and exclusive ground, that the duty remains at last as high as you can possibly levy it without calling in the interference of the smuggler. In order to remove all uneasy feeling from the mind of the British manufacturer, with the permission of the House I will read an important and bonâ fide letter, written by a very extensive smuggler. I will read it because I wish to give the House a conclusive proof of the delusiveness of maintaining high protecting duties upon foreign manufactures. This letter is, of course, not addressed to me, but I can guarantee it to be a bonâ fide letter, addressed by a man of large means and large capital, in a regular way of business as a smuggler, who, I believe, has daily intercourse with persons in this great city:—It is dated at the end of December, 1841, and after offering his services in supplying goods to certain persons, he adds,—

“I am also able to forward to you, every week, blondes and laces (I mean articles manufactured at Lille, Arras, Caen, Chantilly, &c.) at a very low premium, by the indirect channel. The goods would be delivered in London the same week of the reception here, by a sure and discreet individual. My means are always free of losses and damages, or I would not use them. Here follow the prices at which I might at present undertake the passage:—

	Per Cent.
Blondes, by pieces, according to value	9
Blonde veils, according to value	8 or 8½
Laces (Lille ditto)	8 or 8½
Silk gloves	11 to 12
Kid gloves	12 to 13

And generally all silk goods, as gros de Naples, satins, gros des Indes, gros de Paris, jewellery, &c., for which articles prices would be to be determined, but certainly a great deal under your custom-house duties."

Can there be, I ask, a more irresistible, a more tangible, or a more positive proof that you are not conferring a benefit upon the manufacturer by imposing a duty on articles of foreign manufacture so high as to afford a premium to the smuggler, who sets systematically your laws at defiance? Is it not clear that it is a positive advantage to the domestic manufacturer that he should know the extent of foreign competition he has to meet? Is it not to his interest that he should be fully and openly aware of it, and not be subject to an illicit, unseen competition, against which he can adopt no protection? There are no parties with whom I have had more intercourse, or whose case has called for more serious attention on my part, and on the part of my colleagues, than the case of a class of persons unsupported by any great interest, but which has been brought under our notice in a way which quite entitled them to consideration—I mean those parties who are concerned in the manufacture of straw plat. They are mostly women and children; and live in certain confined districts of the country. The present duty on straw plat is 17s. a cwt. We propose a reduction of the duty to 5s., but we have been induced, in consequence of their representation, to increase the duty upon the import of the foreign manufactured article to 7s. 6d. a cwt., in the hope that these parties will be enabled still, by the exercise of their ingenuity and skill, to compete with the foreign manufacturer. But I wish to convince them of the delusiveness of the security which they ask for. The present duty on the raw material, that is, foreign straw, not platted, is one penny per cwt. The duty on the same article, if platted before it is imported, is 17s. per cwt. Now this platted straw is so light an article that it affords great facilities for smuggling it into this country. I will give the House a proof of this. This small bundle which I hold in my hand is straw (the right hon. baronet exhibited it), the raw material which is used for the purpose of manufacturing the plat, and is subject only to a duty of 1d. the cwt. on its introduction into this country. The foreign platted straw, as I have already said, is subject to a duty of 17s. 6d. per cwt. But this is apparently a bundle of the unplatted straw. Now, observe (said the right hon. baronet, and he then began very deliberately to remove from one end of the small roll of straw, such as may be seen in the straw-bonnet shops of this metropolis, short pieces of the same material, and having done so, he drew forth a parcel of foreign manufactured platted straw), that it is upon this (continued the right hon. baronet) that a duty of 17s. 6d. per cwt. is imposed in order to give protection to the home manufacturer! Now, this is important, in order to show how delusive is the protection which this duty really affords against the importation of the manufactured article. This is a bonâ fide illustration of the delusiveness of these high protecting duties, and a conclusive proof how little benefit is derived to our domestic manufactures from imposts which can be so easily evaded. Now, these are the general grounds upon which I vindicate the reduction of duties upon foreign manufactures. I do so upon a double ground; first, by showing that we have made such a reduction in the cost of the means of subsistence as to justify us in reducing those duties; and, secondly, by showing, that the existing rate of duty is so high, that it affords no protection whatever. I dare say, by stating the amount of the reduction which I propose in some of the articles of foreign produce, hoping thereby to reduce the rate of living in this country, I have caused some alarm on the part of the producers of similar commodities in England. I speak chiefly now of those who are concerned in the production of cattle, and in the supply of meat. I wish to address myself more particularly to that class, for I never felt more confidence than I do now, that I shall be enabled to show, that the removal of prohibition in the case of cattle, and the reduction of duty on the importation of foreign meat, are not only perfectly justifiable, but demanded by a true consideration not only of the general interests of the country, but of the agricultural interest itself. It is quite an error to suppose that any class derives advantage by a high rate of living in this country. In the first place, there is no man, whatever article he may produce, but must derive a great advantage from a general reduction of prices. The particular article which he himself consumes may abide at the same price, and not fall under the general rule of reduction, and in respect to that particular article, he may be exposed to some suffering and loss; but he must in regard to the general articles of consumption, share in the benefit of the reduction which the prices of those articles undergo. I will take, as an illustration of my argument, the case of the poor-rates. Within the last four years the cost of the articles of subsistence has been high. It is said, and I believe justly said, that the poor-rates fall with peculiar severity upon the landed interest. The profits of tradesmen in the towns which were originally contemplated to be subject to that impost, have of late years been free from it, by the effect of a temporary law, and those rates now fall with peculiar severity upon the owners and occupiers of land. Let us see how the cost of the articles of subsistence affects those rates. It appears, that the "amount of moneys levied under the denomination of poor's-rate in England and Wales, in 1837, was £5,294,000; 1838, £5,186,000; 1839, £5,613,000; 1840, £6,014,000." This shows that the increase of the amount of money levied on account of poor's-rate is in proportion to the increase of the price of provisions. I am quite aware that in some cases these prices have lately been reduced. I know that there has been a general apprehension, and, indeed, a general panic, on the subject of the importation of live cattle. It has been constantly represented to me that the panic existed, that it was in vain to argue against it, whether well or ill-founded—and to so prevailing a feeling, great deference ought to be shown. I venture to differ from that statement; I do not think it a part of the duty of any government to defer to a panic which they consider unfounded; much less do I consider it consistent on the part of the real friend of the agricultural interest of this country to show a deference to unjustifiable apprehensions. To defer to sound argument—to defer to justifiable apprehensions—is the duty of every government; but to concede to a panic which you believe to be ill-founded, would be inconsistent with a wise and statesmanlike course, and would be inviting persons who were the subjects of those unfounded fears to rest their hopes upon high prohibitory duties, which would indeed be resting upon an unstable foundation. But no steps which I could take could guard against the panic which has existed. I admit it has existed. But let me observe that some portion of the reduction which has taken place in the price of cattle must not be attributed to the panic. There must be, at this time of the year, a reduction of price. It is inevitable, because there is a large supply of, and a reduction in the price of fodder. The whole extent of the reduction, therefore, must not be connected with the panic. But if persons will insert advertisements in newspapers, offering to supply the best meat from Hamburg and other places at 3d. per lb., and if parties will not inquire into the truth of it, but will take it for granted, and will sell their cattle in consequence, I cannot help it. A little inquiry would have shown at once how impossible the thing must be. A house with a fine German name, at Hamburg, is represented as offering to supply meat at 3d. per lb. Now, the slightest exertion would have discovered that no such house exists at all. If it does exist there, all I can say is, that the house which so offers to supply the manufacturing districts of the country with meat at 3d. a lb., is at present paying 6d. a lb. for it in Hamburg. My belief is, that interested parties, pretending to sympathise with the poor manufacturing classes, have inserted these advertisements, having a knowledge of the prevailing panic, for the purpose of taking advantage of those who, by their fears, are bringing their cattle into the market. But I trust that the delay which has taken place in bringing forward this measure has tended to produce a calmer and soberer judgment on the subject, and that this cattle-panic is of itself fast dying away. I have read an account of some recent occurrences, particularly in the northern parts of the country, which leads me to think that those who expected to purchase cattle at a very reduced price will be disappointed: and that sounder notions are entertained, with respect to the price of cattle. But, in arguing this question of cattle, I am not about to say there will be no reduction of price—I am not going to contend, that by admitting foreign cattle, and foreign meat, that at no period there will be any competition or reduction of price. But what I maintain, and what I am about to establish, is this, that the price of cattle and meat in this country has been unduly high—extravagantly high—and that if we can effect a reduction of price, we ought to effect that reduction. I shall show you, that your apprehensions are unfounded—that there will be no such material fall (I cannot effect that) in the price of cattle, as will affect the price of land, or in any way disturb the relations which now exist between landlord and tenant. But I am able to establish, by conclusive proof, that you ought to seek security, if you can, against the extra-

gant price of meat in this country, and which may arise from a defective supply, caused by applications of capital to other agricultural productions, and still more by the disorders which have prevailed among the cattle, and which have much diminished stock. Supposing any man, some twenty years since, any grazier, for instance, had been told what was to happen with respect to Ireland and Scotland. Supposing I had told him, fifteen years ago, what was then the produce of those two parts of the empire, and had foretold to him the wonderful discovery of steam, the facility with which, from Aberdeen, and other parts, enormous quantities of cattle could be brought to London; and what would be the increase of the produce in Ireland within the last twenty or thirty years. I apprehend that the English grazier would have felt a panic twice as great as the panic which has now been felt, and he would have said that it was utterly impossible for him to contend against the competition of Ireland and Scotland. I am quite ready to admit, that with respect to Ireland and Scotland, there was this difference, that they, being parts of the United Kingdom, are entitled to import cattle. ["Hear, hear!"] But the hon. gentleman who cheers me, will not deny that the 10,000 head of cattle, brought from Aberdeen and from Ireland, would have just the same effect in depressing the English market as if the same quantity of cattle had been imported from a foreign country. That is my argument. I am not saying that foreign countries have an equal right with Scotland and Ireland to import cattle, and on the same favourable terms. My argument is, that this great and unexpected increase of importation from Ireland and Scotland would produce the same depressing effect upon the British market as if the increase had come from Hamburg. I say, therefore, that if twenty years since we had told the English grazier what would be the extent of importation at the present moment, from improvements in agriculture and navigation and other causes, he would have imagined that the price of cattle in the home market would be so reduced that he would have no chance of success against such competition. Yet, notwithstanding this competition, the price of cattle and meat has increased, and the price of meat is still increasing to an extent which deserves our most serious attention. As a proof and illustration of this, I will take the navy contracts for fresh meat that have been made within the last four or five years. I find that in 1835 the navy contracts for fresh meat were taken at 35s. and a fraction per cwt.; the price rose, in 1838, to 41s. per cwt., in 1840 to 46s., and in 1841 it had increased, from 35s. in 1835, to 49s. per cwt. This, be it remembered, has occurred, notwithstanding the increased imports of cattle from Ireland and Scotland. I will now refer to the contract prices of meat for Greenwich Hospital. In 1835 the contracts were taken at 40s. a cwt.; and I must observe that the probability is that that institution is supplied with a superior description of meat. I find that the price rose from 40s. in 1835, to 66s. in 1841. Again, I find that contracts for supplies of meat for shipping were made in Leadenhall market in 1835 at 36s. per cwt., and contracts of the same kind were taken there in 1841 at 48s. per cwt. I will now take pork—I mean salt pork for the navy—and I beg the House to recollect that this increased price of provisions tends materially to swell the navy estimates. I find, in 1835, that the contract price of salt pork for the navy was £4 : 14 : 8 per tierce, and in 1841 the price had risen to £7 : 3 : 5. This had not been a sudden rise, but it gradually took place during the intermediate years. In 1835, the price was £4 14s. the tierce; in 1838, it had risen to £5 14s.: in 1839, to £6 11s.: in 1840, to £6 14s.: and in 1841, to £7 : 3 : 5. To show how this affects the public I will refer to Greenwich Hospital. The meat alone for Greenwich Hospital for the consumption of the inmates of that institution, though there was no increase in the number of its inmates, cost £4,420 more in 1841 than it did in 1835. It appears also that the total increase of the household expenses of that institution was £12,000 in 1841 over that in 1835. If such an advance continued to take place in the price of meat, the authorities of the hospital stated that they should find some difficulty in making their present revenue sufficient. I have surely now said enough to show that notwithstanding the great importation from Ireland and Scotland there has been a continuous increase in the price of meat, and that it is desirable to open the ports of the kingdom to a foreign supply. Is not the fact of such a continuous increase in price conclusive proof that something shall be done; and does it not suggest the apprehension that the population is increasing more rapidly than the supply? I am aware that it has been said that the price of cattle has much increased of late years, and has been occasioned by another circumstance; it has been asserted that it has arisen because a disorder has prevailed among cattle. Now, I would ask, is not this very circumstance a conclusive proof of the necessity of doing something to meet such a case, and that there should be not an absolute prohibition, but a moderate duty which will enable you to go to the places where wholesome cattle are to be met with, that you may have the means of increasing your supply when the home supply is deficient. The amount of duty which I propose in the resolutions before the House is a penny a pound on fresh meat, or on meat slightly salted, and £1 a head on oxen. I apprehend that the chief objection which is entertained against this part of the resolution is directed against the new duty of £1 a head on cattle in the place of the present prohibition. There is an apprehension of danger to the domestic producer of cattle. Now, before I can assent to any apprehension of danger of this kind, I should ask the House to look to the extent of that portion of the continent of Europe from which a supply of cattle can be obtained. Corn, it must be admitted, can be obtained from almost every place where it is produced; it suffers no decrease in substance, and no deterioration in quality, how great soever may be the distance of transport, and it can be as well imported from Odessa or North America as from the Baltic or the opposite coasts of the continent. In the importation of corn, we are subject to competition in the home market from the supply obtained from all Europe, and even America. But is there the same chance of competition with respect to a supply of foreign cattle. Let me, in the first instance, separate the case of lean cattle from that of fat cattle. I think that I can prove satisfactorily to every sensible grazier that there can be nothing but advantage to him from the importation of lean cattle. I think I can show, too, that in no occupation have the profits been reduced in so great a degree of late years as in the fattening of lean cattle. I admit that this trade in cattle has been carried on with great advantage from certain parts of Ireland and Scotland, but I could show that there has been such an increase in the price of lean cattle in this country as to make it impossible for the feeder to realise any profit from fattening them, and that the importation of lean cattle from the continent would be of the greatest benefit to him. I have made inquiries on this point, and have ascertained from several of the most experienced and eminent graziers in the country, that of late years the profit is reduced to nothing, and the feeding would cease altogether were it not for the benefit of the manure. Therefore, by admitting the importation of lean cattle, I shall be conferring a benefit not only on the community, but on that body of agriculturists who are engaged in providing cattle for the supply of the market. But then I may be asked, why not apply the duty according to the weight of the cattle imported? My reply is, that the application of any such principle would defeat the object which I have just alluded to. It must be recollected that the weight of that description of cattle, which I think will be most largely imported—namely, the large lean cattle—is very great. The large lean ox, which would afford a profit to the grazier to fatten, would weigh much more than the small fat cattle which are likely to be imported. By adopting this principle, then, of imposing the duty by weight, you would be discouraging the importation of large lean cattle, the fattening of which might become such a large source of profit to the grazier; and I say, therefore, that the advantages will be very great in applying the duty in the manner I propose. Now, let me refer to the danger which is likely to arise from the importation of fat cattle. I think that I can show in an equally satisfactory manner as I have done in the former case that the apprehensions which are entertained on this point are entirely without foundation. From what countries is the danger from competition in the importation of fat cattle likely to arise? Now it must be recollected that the increase in the cost of foreign cattle would be enhanced, not so much by the amount of duty on the importation as the distance and expense of carriage from the countries from which the cattle would be brought. No one, I suppose, will argue that there is much danger to be apprehended from the competition that would arise from the importation of cattle from Spain and Portugal. I do not suppose that a single ox, fat or lean, will cross the Bay of Biscay for our markets. Let us next take France, and see whether there is any danger likely to arise from the importation of foreign cattle from that country. If any hon. gentleman would take the trouble to inquire, he would find that the supply of cattle has for some time in France been rapidly falling short of the demand of the population. With respect to France, I can refer to documents which, I think, will prove my case most satisfactorily. I shall refer the House to the accurate statistical information which is prepared on this and other subjects in that country. I say, then, that I can show that there is no danger to be apprehended from France. Supposing, that the rich pastures of France could pour in a supply of fat cattle to an unlimited amount, there would, I admit, be some ground for apprehension; but what are the facts of the case? During late years, France has been an importing country of cattle, and not an exporting country. I find that in 1840—and I have similar returns for several years back, and they vary little as to the general result, there were 12,519 cattle exported from France, and 39,000 cattle imported into it. I will now take sheep—and many of these animals are exported by being sent across the frontier into countries where prices are dearer—and I find that 92,000 were exported in 1840, but during the same year 135,000 were imported into France. The result is, that for the last twelve or fifteen years the importation of cattle and other animals into France has greatly exceeded the amount of exports. In respect to cattle, then, France is an importing country; and yet even with this, I think I can show that the supply of meat there has not been equal to the demand, nor to the wants of the increasing population of the country. I will now take the prices in France, and show that there has been a great rise in prices of late years in that country. We will begin as so far back as 1822. In that year the average price of beef in the eighty-six chief towns of France was $7\frac{1}{2}d.$ per kilogramme, and in 1839 it had risen to $9\frac{1}{2}d.$; and in the same period the average price of mutton in those eighty-six towns rose from $7\frac{1}{2}d.$ in 1822, to $9\frac{1}{2}d.$ in 1839. In Paris there had been a much greater increase. In 1822 the price of all sorts of meat there was $8\frac{1}{2}d.$ per kilogramme, and in the chief market on the 10th of March, 1841, the price had risen to $14d.$, being an increase of 62 per cent. from 1822 to 1841. I will give the prices in Paris of oxen in different years. In 1822 the price of an ox was 296 francs, or about £12; in 1839, 392 francs, or £15 15s.; and in 1841, 459 francs, or £19. Is any danger to be apprehended of a supply of foreign cattle from France, in which the price of oxen has risen within a few years from £12 to £19? In France too as in England, notwithstanding the number of foreign cattle that has been imported, the price has risen, so that it is clear that the supply is not sufficient for the consumption of France. I find that the average consumption of meat in that country, between 1812 and 1816, was in the ratio of 70.51 for each individual; but during the years 1837 and 1840 the ratio was represented by 48.12. I think then that I have shown that there is no danger to be apprehended from competition with France, for here is a rise in the price of meat, and yet a diminution in the consumption, while the country is, I hope, in a state of prosperity, and that being the state of things, there is consequently no danger to be apprehended from a great importation from France. With respect to Belgium our minister there when he noticed the alarm that was felt in this country on the subject, thought it his duty to write to the government, and his words were:—"I observe some allusions in the English papers with respect to the price of meat, and I see it stated that it can be imported from foreign countries into England, and sold at the rate of 3d. per lb. It is, however, clear this supply cannot come from Belgium, since the price here is just twice as high."

There is then a great delusion in supposing that meat can be imported from Belgium and sold in England at any such low prices. I apprehend that Holland is not a country from which we need fear any great importation. There is no fresh land there for cultivation. Spain is out of the question. The Prussian League is, with respect to cattle, an importing and not an exporting country. The only danger, then, is from Holstein and Jutland. But the cost of the conveyance of an ox by sea from either of those countries is greater than from Aberdeen. Remember, also, the enormous increase of supply of cattle from Ireland, and that it has not lowered the prices, and then compare Holstein and Jutland with Yorkshire, and ask yourselves, Is there any prospect of a competition which is likely to interfere with the interests of English agriculturists? If you can make some reduction in price—if you can take any security against the exorbitant price of meat, you will be conferring a great advantage on all classes of the community, and even on the agriculturists themselves. But the extent of the area of the countries which can come in competition with them is so comparatively small, and the expense and difficulty of bringing cattle here from over the sea are so great, that they need fear no foreign competition. Next compare the quality of the meat. Your meat is far superior to the meat of the continent. When you hear that meat is 4*d.* per lb. on the continent and 7*d.* in London, you can draw no safe inference, unless you also compare the quality of both. I do not despair of seeing this country yet exporting fatted cattle. I believe that improvements in science, and the application of chemical processes to agriculture, may produce such results that you may be an exporting country. In confirmation of the opinion which I have just expressed, I can refer to the authority of a document drawn up by a minister of France, in which he names this country amongst others as one from which France could derive a supply of cattle. Again, your mutton is so much superior to that to be obtained on the continent, that I have every reason to believe that instead of this country importing any mutton, we shall export it largely to the continent. Indeed, at this moment, I believe legs of mutton are continually taken from Hull to Hamburg for consumption in the latter. The great advantage that I look to as being likely to arise from the importation of cattle, is that it may establish a check against inordinate prices, and on this principle I vindicate the course proposed to be taken by her Majesty's government in the reduction of the duty. It has been said, why not impose your duty according to the weight or value of the animal imported? But I say, it cannot be done with advantage to the farmer and the consumer? I have already shown, that no such extent of import will take place under the mode proposed by the government, as will prove injurious to the agriculturist, and I have also shown the advantages that will arise to the English grazier from the importation of lean cattle. I have also shown other reasons that operate to prove, that the course that we propose to take is the most convenient one that can be adopted. In addition, I may observe, that every foreign country which imports cattle, and imposes a duty on it, follows the plan which we recommend, and lays the tax on each head of cattle. Throughout the states, forming the Prussian League, foreign cattle are not admitted by the payment of an ad valorem duty, or on their weight, but the duty is levied on each animal. In France, there is an import duty of 20*s.* on each head of cattle; in Belgium also I find a duty of 20*s.* applied to all cattle. I do not mean to say that no reduction of price will result from my proposition, I should be sorry if that to a small degree were not to be the case; but looking at the state of this metropolis—looking at the great importance of a fair and reasonable supply of meat—and looking at the improvements which have taken place in steam navigation, I cannot think it has derived as much benefit, in the reduction of the price of meat, from them as it ought, and I should be sorry to see it derive no benefit from the proposed reduction. For my own part, I have no hesitation in saying that if, by the operation of this part of the measure, the price of meat be reduced in London, I should consider such result a public benefit. I have laid on a duty of £1 per head on cattle, because I consider the limited area of the countries that can compete with us, and the cost of conveying cattle by steam, and various other circumstances, throw so many difficulties in the way of the importation of foreign cattle, that no danger is to be apprehended to our home supply, and that sufficient protection remains for the grazier. Is the House aware that in London alone there were slaughtered every year not less than between 170,000 and 180,000 cattle, and this is independent of all the slaughtered meat sent up to the London market. What an immense quantity of cattle must come in, then, to make any perceptible reduction in the prices! But is it likely that 10,000 fat cattle will come in? I do not apprehend that any one believes that 10,000 additional cattle will be taken to Smithfield from abroad in the course of the year; and if that number were to be taken, would it make any very material difference in the price? I believe, that the general annual consumption of cattle in England is between 13,000,000 and 15,000,000. Is there, then, any just ground for their apprehension. In my mind the reasons are decisive for applying to this question the principles on which we have proceeded in framing the other parts of the tariff. I beg the House to recollect the extraordinary increase that has taken place in the amount of cattle, sheep, and swine imported into this country from Ireland within the last few years. In 1826, the number of cattle imported from Ireland was 63,000, and in 1840 the number was 120,000. The number of sheep imported from Ireland in 1825 was 72,000, and the number increased to 193,000 in 1840. The number of swine imported from Ireland in 1825 was 65,000, and in 1840 the number was 384,000. Now, notwithstanding this enormous increase in the imports from Ireland, it has not produced the slightest effect in the reduction of the price of meat; on the contrary, the prices of all kinds of meat have gone on rising for the last few years. Taking this circumstance into consideration, and supposing that there were no extensive importation of meat or cattle, and looking also to the constant and continued increase of our population, is there any cause for alarm or consternation on the part of the graziers? In adopting the step which I now recommend to the House on the part of the government, I have no hesitation in declaring that by adopting it we are taking a security against an exorbitant price of meat in times of scarcity. I can illustrate the view by what takes place with respect to horses. There is at present a duty of £1 a head, on the importation of horses, and at that rate the smallest pony and the most valuable charger may be imported. Now look at the price of horses in some parts of the continent. Compare the Norman horse—a beautiful animal—compare the price in France with the price of a horse of the same quality in this country. Why has there not been an importation of them into this country? You only levy a duty of £1 upon all horses, and yet the amount of duty paid on the importation of horses has not been more than £400 per annum for several years past. But what are the facts of the case? Why, that during this time we have been an exporting country for horses. I take the year 1839, I find that 389 horses were imported into this country, which paid a duty of £1 a head; but during the same year, 1,330 horses were exported. In 1840 the number of horses imported, was 505, the number exported was 2,275, and in 1841, the number imported was 339, and the number exported was 4,538. I should rejoice were the same circumstances to take place with respect to cattle, and that we became an exporting country. My hopes are strong on this point, and I do not despair of seeing the day when, by the employment of capital, and the application of chemical science to agriculture, we shall have so far improved the breed of our cattle as to be enabled to export them as well as horses. The cost of a horse is great in this country compared with the price in foreign countries, and yet we have been able to compete with other countries by the superiority of our horses; and I know no natural or unnecessary reason why we should not be able to supply cattle as well as horses. These, then, are the grounds on which the measure of her Majesty's government has been framed. I hope that in the observations which I have addressed to the House, that I have so far satisfied the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Miles) as to induce him to drop the amendment of which he has given notice. At any rate, if he persists in pressing it, I am prepared to meet it, and shall offer it a respectful but decided resistance. And I shall certainly be curious to know the arguments upon which, considering the gradual but rapid rise of price in this country, and the limited alteration proposed in the tariff—I shall listen with interest to the arguments by which he supports the necessity for an increased duty on the importation of foreign cattle. I deeply regret that the tariff proposed by her Majesty's government should have had undue advantage taken of it by pretended sympathisers with the supposed sufferers to raise a panic relating to it. I have a sincere and cordial respect for the interests which apprehended that they would be affected by it, and I have therefore felt it my duty to enter into these details. Subsequent consideration and free communication with all parties have confirmed the government in the opinion that these measures will be attended with great public advantage—that they will produce general advantage to all classes, including the agricultural class, by the reduction which we propose to make in foreign meat and cattle, and, above all, the removal of that complete prohibition which we found when we approached the subject. Not wishing to enter upon a question which has been adopted by Parliament—I mean the question of the Corn-laws—wishing to postpone the question of sugar, till the alteration of which the noble lord has given notice comes under discussion—not wishing to prejudice that question by an imperfect reference to it, I have fulfilled the purpose for which I rose—namely, to state the general scope and object of the commercial arrangements proposed by her Majesty's government, and to vindicate those points which have been most subjected to animadversion. I know that many gentlemen who are strong advocates for free-trade, may consider that I have not gone far enough. I believe that on the general principle of free-trade, there is now no great difference of opinion, and that all agree in the general rule that we should purchase in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest. [Cheers.] I know the meaning of that cheer. I do not now wish to raise a discussion on the Corn-laws, or the sugar duties, which I contend, however, are exceptions to the general rule. I have stated the grounds, on more than one occasion, why I consider these exceptions to the general rule, and I will not go into the question now. I know that I may be met with the complaints of gentlemen opposite, of the limited extent to which I have applied the general principle to which I have adverted to these important articles. I have felt satisfied that it was inexpedient to apply such important changes as I have heard suggested to these important interests. I thought, after the best consideration that I could give to the subject, that if I proposed a greater change in the Corn-laws than that which I submitted to the consideration of the House, I should only aggravate the distresses of the country, and only increase the alarm which prevailed amongst important interests. I think that I have proposed, and the legislature has sanctioned, as great a change in the Corn-laws as was just or prudent, considering the engagements existing between landlord and tenant, and also the large amount of capital which has been applied to the cultivation of the soil. Under these circumstances, I think that we have made as great a change as was consistent with the nature of the subject. I shall postpone what I have to say on the subject of the sugar duties until the noble lord regularly comes forward with the motion of which he has given notice, and I shall then be ready to state the reasons which have induced her Majesty's government to adopt the course which they have. It is impossible, in dealing in general with such immense and extensive interests, to proceed always by a strict application of the general principle, for in such cases it is of the utmost importance to proceed with caution. I believe that the true friend to general principle will argue, that it is not expedient or proper to propose such a change as would produce so much individual injury as to cause general complaint, and excite a strong sympathy. I contemplate the matter in the same point of view, as this question was contemplated by a distinguished statesman, now no more, with whom it was my good fortune to act in 1825. That eminent man then proposed to make some changes in the commercial and colonial policy of the country, but the proposition which he brought forward in 1825, was not so extensive as that which I have had the honour of submitting to the House. Those measures had my cordial support and concurrence. Mr. Huskisson, when he brought them forward, prefaced his speech with these observations:—"I am not anxious to give effect to new principles, where circumstances do not call for their application; feeling as I do, from no small experience in public business—and every day confirms that feeling—how much, in the vast and complex interests of this country, all general theories, however incontrovertible in the abstract, require to be weighed with a calm circumspection, to be directed by a temperate discretion, and to be adapted to all the existing relations of society with a careful hand, and a due regard to the establishments and institutions which have grown up under those relations."

These I think are just and profound and wise opinions, and in the temper in which Mr. Huskisson acted, I and my colleagues have attempted to remodel and simplify the tariff, by removing the prohibition on some articles, and by the reduction of duty on others, and we have proceeded with such care and caution as to produce as small an amount of individual suffering as was compatible with the end in view. I regret any suffering that may be inflicted on any parties, but if we admitted the principle of putting off the question on that account, I fear that we should have to postpone the consideration of all such questions to an indefinite period. I sincerely hope that the general result of this and the other measures will be ample compensation for any individual suffering that may be inflicted, and that the general result of the whole will be to increase the demand for the employment of industry, and which would also increase the means of the people to command the comforts and necessaries of life. We have made this proposal at a time of very considerable financial embarrassment, but in doing so, we have set an example in Europe, we have declared that we will not seek to improve our finances by increasing the duties on imports. Amidst all our financial difficulties, we have trusted to other means for replenishing

the exchequer. In the face of all these difficulties, we have come forward with a proposal greatly reducing the restrictions, and imposts on foreign articles. I deeply regret to have it to say, that other enlightened communities have not acted upon this principle. We have reserved many articles from immediate reduction, in the hope that ere long, we may attain that which we consider just and beneficial to all,—namely, increased facilities for our exports in return. At the same time I am bound to say, that it is for the interest of this country to buy cheap, whether other countries will buy cheap from us or no. We have a right to exhaust all means to induce them to do justice, but if they persevere in refusing, the penalty is on us, if we do not buy in the cheapest market. But I believe firmly, that the example which England is now setting, will ultimately prevail. The countries I speak of may hope to retrieve their financial difficulties by the adoption of a different course from that which we pursue; they may think to increase the revenue by increasing the imposts on foreign manufactures, but they may rely on it they will here be met by that very influential corrective of high duties—the smuggler. They can rest only on one of two measures to correct the evils arising from high duties—they must either resort to such an extensive establishment, that it will eat up all the profits, or if they neglect this, and merely impose exorbitant duties, without keeping up an exorbitant establishment, they will find that almost the entire demand for the various articles will be supplied by smugglers, and those things will be introduced by an illicit trade, which their imposts prevent the introduction of legally, and with advantage to themselves. If you look at the countries in which high protection, prohibitory protection is kept up, you will gradually find the people of those countries more and more comparing our example and the results of it, with the principle acted upon amongst themselves and the results of it. Take Spain, for instance, where, as Mr. Huskisson, among others, had pointed out, protective prohibitory duties existed in their most extensive form; what had been the effect of this system there? Eternal conflicts on the frontier, and no revenue. I regret, I say, that in other enlightened countries there is not as yet evinced a disposition to follow the example which we are now setting: and I very much regret to see any thing of this illiberal spirit in the United States, but I at the same time feel that the people of those states are too enlightened not to see that our example ought to be followed, and that they will, ere long, take care that it is followed. In Russia, attempts have been made, at most enormous and unprofitable expense, to introduce manufactures; but I am sure that before long the great pecuniary loss sustained in that country, by these attempts to force manufactures, will bring conviction to the minds of the people of their futility. I feel certain that the example of England adopted at this time of commercial and financial difficulty—our determination to pursue one path in the right course, will operate on foreign nations; but if we find, that our example is not followed—if we find that, instead of reducing the duties on our manufactures, they resort to the impolicy of increasing them, still this ought not, in my opinion, to operate as a discouragement to us to act on the principles which we believe to be sound,—those principles which will not only be immediately profitable to us, but the example of which will ultimately ensure that general application of them, which will confer reciprocal benefit both on ourselves and on all those who are wise enough to follow it.

After a short discussion, the order of the day was read for the House resolving itself into committee on the Customs' Duties Acts.

On the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair—Major Vivian rose to move “for any additional details which may have been supplied by Mr. Meek to the government, relative to the importation of agricultural produce, salt provisions, &c., or any passage or passages which may have been suppressed.”

Lord Worsley seconded the motion.

Sir Robert Peel said, as the House is now somewhat more full than when I made my statement at an earlier part of the evening, I will refer to what I then stated. I stated what was the fact, that for several recent years a gradual advance had taken place in the price of provisions. I took the year 1835, when I said distinctly that the price of meat and pork was at its lowest point, and I showed that from 1835 to 1840, a progressive increase of price had taken place—I stated that at the same time a considerable increase had taken place in the price of cattle imported from Ireland. I stated, that taking the prices at Greenwich Hospital in 1840, as compared with 1835, the difference of price in meat alone made a difference in the cost of that establishment for that year of not less than £4000. I then took the price of provisions in France and Belgium and this country, and I argued, from the gradual and progressive advance in the price of provisions in those countries that there were no grounds for the apprehensions that were entertained in some part of the country, that the price of cattle would be materially lessened by importation from those countries. With respect to Holstein and Jutland, I admitted that there might be some supply, but that there was no probability of such an increase as would have any serious effect on the price of provisions in this country—seeing that within the last six years, notwithstanding the facilities afforded by steam navigation, the prices of meat in most of the public establishments had progressively increased during each of these years. Seeing that this had taken place, I stated that I thought the time was come when competition with respect to live animals and meat might be safely permitted. This was the statement which I made to the House with respect to this part of the subject. Now, with respect to the particular motion before the House, I must say, that there must have been somewhere or other a gross breach of trust. These papers were printed solely for the use of the government. The whole of the material information was extracted from them, and given to the House. So much was this the case that it might be remarked that Mr. Meek was never alluded to, and the measures proposed by the government were at variance with the information furnished by Mr. Meek. But supposing that those papers, containing information procured by a servant of the government for the service of the government, contained information given by an individual who said, that he would communicate all the information in his power, but he did not wish to have his name made public. Supposing this to be the case, does the House think that it would have a right to compel the government to disclose the name of that individual. The government gave the House all the information they possessed; they gave the House all the facts; and as to the suppression of particular passages, the charge is altogether without foundation. We gave you the prices of meat at Hamburg—we gave you the prices taken for the navy contracts—we gave you every thing material—but a gentleman officially connected with the Victualling office makes an observation with respect to the expediency of taking the contracts for the navy from other countries; and does the House think that we ought to give this communication, intended for the government alone? Well, then, take the case of an individual supplying information for the use of the government, requesting that his name might not be disclosed. Would it not, I ask, be a breach of all confidence to disclose the name of that individual? We have given you all the information with reference to the tenor of the measures we have proposed. We have given you the price of the contracts, and you may have the navy contracts if you think it necessary; but I think it would be going too far, when a gentleman connected with the Victualling office makes a suggestion to the government, that the government should be called upon to communicate that information to the House. There is the other case of an individual communicating information to the government, under the assurance that his name will not be disclosed, and I say that if the House compels us to give this information there is an end to all confidence. We have withheld nothing in the shape of information contained in the report of Mr. Meek. We have given you all the facts. In the exercise of our discretion we have withheld particular passages, which I maintain we were justified in doing, I say, then, considering that there has been a gross breach of confidence on the part of somebody in giving to the hon. member information intended for the government, I trust that the House will not compel the government to give information that has been so presented to them.

The House divided on the question that the Speaker do now leave the chair. Ayes, 219; Noes, 152; majority, 67.

The House went into committee, pro forma, and resumed, committee to sit again.

MAY 13, 1842.

The Order of the Day was read for going into Committee on the Customs' Acts. On the question being put that the Speaker do now leave the Chair—

Viscount Howick moved the following resolution, "That in making a new arrangement of the customs' duties, it is not expedient to impose different rates of duty upon the same articles when imported from foreign countries or from British possessions, in any case where no such difference now exists; and that in those cases in which such a difference already exists, it is not expedient that it should be increased."

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—I was in hopes, until I heard the speech of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring) that the object of the noble lord was to save us the trouble and delay of a discussion on details, and that we were to get rid of further discussion by the motion of the noble lord on the general principle of the tariff, as far as the differential duties between articles the production of the colonies to those produced in foreign countries were concerned; but I am afraid, from the speech of the right hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that the object of the noble lord will not be accomplished, for the right hon. gentleman tells us that when we enter into the details of the tariff, then we must go into the consideration of these minute articles. Now, I confess I thought, from the indignation to which the right hon. gentleman gave vent with respect to medlars, that it was his intention to promote discussion on details on the present occasion. I thought that the noble lord had given notice of this motion for the purpose of rescuing the right hon. gentleman from a difficulty, for if the noble lord had not given notice of his motion, the division must have been taken on some individual article of the tariff. That article, the first in the list, would have been colonial asses, which so greatly excited the right hon. gentleman's indignation the other night—and he would have had no alternative but to try this great question on the subject of imposing a duty of 1s. 3d. a-head on colonial asses. I certainly thought that the noble lord had brought forward his motion by way of a pons asinorum for the right hon. gentleman. I think we shall do better by following the example of the noble lord, and discussing the question of principle rather than by entering into these details, which I should have been disposed, nevertheless, to treat in a better temper than the right hon. gentleman has exhibited with regard to the subject of medlars, but which, in my opinion, would be, with better judgment, reserved for an earlier period of the evening, if we are to enter upon them at all. The right hon. gentleman explained to those hon. members who did not hear the early part of the discussion, the nature of the motion made by the noble lord (Lord Howick), but I protest against the correctness of the exposition given by the right hon. gentleman. And I beg those hon. gentlemen who were not present and did not hear the early part of the debate, to hear my version of the noble lord's motion. It is neither more nor less than this:—"That in making a new arrangement of the customs' duties it is not expedient to impose different rates of duty upon the same articles when imported from foreign countries or from British possessions in any case where no such difference now exists; and that in those cases in which such a difference already exists, it is not expedient that it should be increased."

That is the question. We are required to lay down an abstract proposition that it is not desirable to raise in any case the duty on a commodity, the produce of foreign countries, above the duty on the same article produced in a colony. We are to lay down that as a principle. We are not merely to correct an error committed with respect to an individual article, but we are to lay this down as a principle of legislation, that the difference is not to be increased. But what is the principle for which the noble lord contends? The principle is this: that you shall treat your colonies, without discrimination, as foreign countries in this respect. The noble lord will not deny that such is the proposition for which he contends. But the right hon. gentleman and his friends, when in office, did not adhere to this rule. "True," replies the right hon. gentleman, "there were slight exceptions. There was rough rice and bees'-wax from the western coast of Africa." And what account does the right hon. gentlemen give of the motive which induced them to take this course? He says, "If you can confer a benefit on the natives of Africa, it would be by encouraging their trade. Give them the benefit of differential duties, and you will encourage their attention to domestic industry; and you cannot confer a greater benefit on a country like Africa than by encouraging the natives to devote themselves to industry." But what becomes of the argument of the noble lord about inflicting injury on our colonies? The noble lord says, "You only disturb the application of capital; and, under a notion of conferring a benefit, you are inflicting future injury." What humanity was it, then, to encourage the growth of rough rice on the coast of Africa?

If the noble lord's principle were correct, there was no humanity in giving peculiar encouragement and facilities to African produce. Humanity ought to have dictated the establishment of the same rate of duty on the productions of Africa and those of foreign countries. But the great principle of the noble lord, on which the House is to decide to-night, is, whether it be just, with respect to all articles the produce of your colonies, that the same rate of duty should apply as applies to articles the produce of foreign countries? If that principle be correct there is an end of your colonial system. The noble lord's argument strikes at the foundation of our colonial connection. Is it just to say to the colonies, "You shall import British articles on a more favourable footing than those of foreign nations?" You are at the present moment passing an act through the House giving to British manufacturers advantages in the colonial markets—you restrict commercial intercourse with the colonies by preventing them from choosing their markets. Would it then, I ask, be just to say to the colonies, "You shall admit the manufactures of Great Britain on more favourable terms than the produce of foreign countries, but Great Britain shall give your produce no preference whatever?" Yet that is the principle for which the noble lord contends. Then, would the noble lord do away with the privileges which British manufactures enjoy in the colonies? If he would, let me ask him, why would he maintain the colonies at all? The colonies are, according to the noble lord, to have the unlimited right to buy in the cheapest market. This country ought to show no preference to colonial produce. If you think fit, for purposes of revenue, to lay a duty of 30 per cent. on any articles coming from Russia or France, in that case, according to the noble lord's principle, you ought indiscriminately to lay the same rate on articles the produce of a colony. Be it so; but let me ask the noble lord, why we should be at the expense of defending these colonies? The noble lord says, "See what results followed in the United States by abolishing these distinctions since the independence of the United States was established—since the system of privilege and protection has been abolished?" Be it so; but why retain the colonies if we are to derive no advantage whatever in respect to commercial intercourse—no advantages to navigation—no exclusive privileges for British shipping? Why abandon these advantages, whether real or supposed, and then garrison Canada with 15,000 men? The noble lord's principle is to let the colonies govern themselves, and declare their separation from this country; for it is quite clear that our connection with the colonies can be of no possible advantage if we incur all the obligations of defence, but in every other respect place them on the footing of foreign countries. It appears to me that the colonies can be nothing but an onerous obligation to this country, if the principle of the noble lord be true. The noble lord says that Mr. Huskisson's principles were adverse to the course now pursued. What! Mr. Huskisson, who proposed that Canada should be allowed to sell her corn in the British market at a fixed duty of 5*s*. With the noble lord's resolution in force it would have been impossible for Mr. Huskisson to have applied, as he did, his principle to the sugar of the Mauritius, lowering the duty on it to 10*s*. the cwt. It would have been impossible for Mr. Huskisson, in 1826 or 1827, to have equalised the duty on the sugar of the Mauritius and that produced in the West Indies, if the House of Commons had determined to act on the principle laid down by the noble lord. What did Mr. Huskisson say with respect to the East Indies? Mr. Huskisson complained of the conduct of the United States in refusing to our manufactures the privileges which had been given to other manufactures. Mr. Huskisson intimated that there were two articles, the produce of the United States, of which we might derive an abundant supply from our own colonies. Mr. Huskisson said, "We could, he was satisfied, soon be abundantly supplied with tobacco from the East Indies, by wise and prudent inducements held out to induce its improved cultivation." The rice of India would soon (indeed it was already doing so) usurp the place in our list of imports which that of Carolina had held. In other articles the same change would soon be observed. With reference to cotton, that raw article so essential in our great staple trade, it was only necessary to give its culture in India the same encouragement and protection which the indigo-trade had obtained to ensure its cultivation with equal success, and the growth of as good, as durable, and as fine an article. The result would soon be, that the cotton of India would rival and supplant the cotton of the western world, as the indigo of India already excelled that of Guatemala, to which it was formerly so much inferior, and would still have continued so but for the judicial encouragement afforded to it.

Therefore, for the noble lord to contend that Mr. Huskisson was the patron of the principle that colonial articles in all cases should be subjected to the duty to which foreign articles were exposed, is entirely inconsistent with the fact. Take the case in India. You have ruined the cotton manufactures of India by the importation of your own. You insist upon India receiving it upon most favourable terms to yourself. If India attempted to get a revenue by subjecting your cotton manufactures to a duty you would take means to prevent it. But you contend that your cotton manufactures shall be introduced into India with great advantage, as compared with the manufactures of other states; and that the produce of India shall be subject to all the duties to which the produce of foreign states is subject. Is there any justice in that arrangement? Will the noble lord be prepared in contending for this principle to subvert altogether the colonial interests? Are you prepared, for the purpose of increasing your manufactures in the colonies, to insist upon your manufactures being introduced at lower rates than the manufactures of other countries? I put it to any rational man who is actuated by equitable principles, whether it could be justly concurrent with the maintenance of the advantages which you derive from those colonies to contend that colonial produce shall have no advantage? It would be altogether inconsistent. You have told your colonies that you will maintain your connexion with them; you have pledged yourself to the Canadas to maintain your connexion with them; and I should deeply regret if the House of Commons should propose either one or the other of these alternatives—either to tell the Canadas that "There must be no distinction in favour of British manufactures; you are at liberty to introduce French goods and the manufactures of other countries on terms equally advantageous with those on which British articles are imported;" or to take this other and still more impolitic course, and say, "We insist upon your introducing British goods, and upon depriving you of the discretion of carrying on intercourse with other countries in the cheapest manner—namely, by the ships of other countries; but, with respect to the introduction of your goods, they must be introduced upon the same footing as French and other foreign articles." Why, sir, to use such language as this, and to adopt such a course as this now suggested, would place us in that situation with our colonies that nothing but physical force could enable us satisfactorily to maintain any longer the connection. Sir, again I must repeat that I cannot answer for the justice with which every subject is treated, with respect to those 600 or 700 articles set forth in the tariff. I think it is impossible to answer for the justice of all those discriminating duties. If the course you mean to pursue be this—namely, to put us to the proof with respect to every article here described—if you take one article with the sum of 6*d.* attached to it, and say "here I put it to you to defend this article at 6*d.*, and this other which is marked at 9*d.*" I say, Sir, that by adopting such a course of proceeding towards us, we should find it utterly impossible to give any satisfaction. Hon. members must consider the complicated relationship of this country. They must consider the immense extent of capital which is involved—they must consider the enormous extent of our colonial empire, and the extensive field of our commerce. With these considerations they must be aware of the danger that would naturally arise by any attempt at legislation which would rashly shake the foundations of the empire. You must decide on the whole of those financial and commercial measures. And you must look to the practical results which were likely to follow. We have done all that a wise and prudent government could do for the purpose of adopting this question. We have made an effort to restore the finances of the country and relieve the spirit of industry. I appeal to your justice to decide upon these measures as a whole, rather than to sacrifice the grand object we have in view by descanting upon its minute parts, in respect to which I confess it would be most difficult to give satisfactory and conclusive proofs in favour of. If this House should assent to this, I shall still hold that, as the course we have pursued has been hitherto approved of, and as the House has already decided upon the general principles involved in the noble lord's amendment, we shall be still allowed to carry out our objects without being called upon to account for every item of the tariff. The amendment of the noble lord cannot be entertained, for we are not yet prepared to create that alarm throughout India, the Canadas and the whole of our colonial empire, which such a proposition was so well calculated to do; for, by adopting it, you would be only proclaiming the principle that they should be treated, in respect to colonial intercourse, in the same manner, and upon no more advantageous terms, than we should treat the foreigner. This was but a unilateral course, which, in justice to our own interests, as well as those of our colonies, we cannot think of pursuing. [Viscount Howick: I urged it against any great alterations being made.] Why, I would ask, is not the whole of the noble lord's principle this—that it must be desirable to maintain the duties with respect to the produce of the colonies and that of other countries on the same footing. The noble lord stated that you were doing an injury to the colonies by supporting their permanent interest—his principle was this, that colonial produce ought not to be introduced on a more favoured footing than that of foreign countries. The noble lord said, the system we pursued on this subject was vicious. I am now protesting against that unqualified and exceptionless doctrine—namely, that you ought to treat Canada in respect to colonial and commercial intercourse on the same footing as other countries. If such a proposition be entertained, there is an end at once to our colonial empire, and to maintain it will only be to place a useless burden on ourselves. If you sanction this proposition, then you ought also to say, let the colonies assert their own independence, and provide for their own maintenance.

The House divided on the question that the Chairman do leave the chair: Ayes, 281; Noes, 108; majority 173.

The House went into Committee, and resumed; the chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

CUSTOMS ACTS—THE TARIFF—CATTLE.

The House in Committee. On the first resolution being proposed,—Mr. Miles moved as an amendment—"That the duties to be levied on all live stock imported from foreign countries for the purposes of food, be taken by weight."

SIR R. PEEL: I was very desirous to be able to confine my observations to the particular subject now under discussion—whether it be wise to remove the prohibition which now exists on the importation of foreign cattle and meat—substituting a moderate duty. But the noble lord has invited a discussion on other points—the Corn-laws, and the sugar duty. With regard to the sugar duty, there will be an opportunity of discussing that question; and I shall then state why we think that there are reasons which except sugar from the application of the general principles of the tariff. As to the Corn-laws, any one would have inferred from the speech of the noble lord, that he was of opinion that, under all circumstances, and without any qualification, the people of this country should have a command of the cheapest food; but I take it that the noble lord, the author of an 8s. duty, must himself impose some restriction on that principle for which to-night he seems inclined to contend. He must admit that, under all circumstances, it is not expedient without reference to other considerations that the people should have the cheapest food; because otherwise his principle will be entirely at variance with his own proposal of an 8s. duty on wheat. The noble lord must admit either that there are special burdens in agriculture which justify that duty, or that it is desirable to give some protection to domestic agriculture; and the question then between me and the noble lord, is not a question of principle—it is a question of degree. I propose a graduated duty. The noble lord proposes a fixed duty; but in vindication of his 8s. fixed duty, the noble lord must contend against the principle which he has put forward to-night, taken without qualification or exception; and I therefore appeal to the noble lord's assistance in support of my graduated scale. I do not, however, now wish to revive the discussion on the Corn-law; but I thought that the noble lord had charged me with deluding the farmers; and had said, that if I had put forward any such proposition before the last election, the agricultural constituencies would not have implied an opinion so strongly in my favour; but now the noble lord contends that I have shown undue favour to the farmer, and have proposed a Corn-law at variance with the principles of the tariff. Surely, it is impossible for the noble lord to contend, that I have deceived the farmer by holding out false expectations of protection, and, on the other hand, that I have shown him undue favour. I come now to this particular proposition; I am afraid that unless I am able to apply myself to the particular proposals as they are made, there can be no prospect of bringing these discussions to a close; and I will, therefore, limit myself to the single point, whether it be expedient to continue the existing prohibition, or to impose the duty proposed by the government; and I discuss the question with my hon. friend with perfect freedom and candour; I entirely differ from him in opinion upon this subject; but I am not, on that account, insensible to or ungrateful for the support which I have received in respect to my proposal of an Income-tax. Yes! I have received from the agricultural body, this session, most valuable and generous support of the proposals which I have made; and the differences which may exist between us cannot disturb my grateful sense of their assistance; and, no doubt, greatly to the disappointment of some who now express dissent. I have not the least fear that the differences of to-night will continue beyond to-night. I, however, now maintain my own opinion; it seems to me that the interests of the country do require that the prohibition on the importation of foreign cattle should be removed, and I think that the proposal which I have made will benefit all classes of the community. When I spoke last, there was a prevalent apprehension and alarm at the proposal which I had made. I then said, that it was not consistent with the part of a true friend of the agriculturists to assume, that that panic was well-founded; the reason which I gave for not acting on those apprehensions, was my belief that it would be found, before we got to the end of the tariff, that those apprehensions were at an end; and the communications which I have received from the country prove the correctness of that impression. I think I may say that the panic has already passed away. I said at that time that the then diminution in the price of cattle was attributable to other concurrent causes, as the price of fodder; and I felt, besides, very confident that when the sober judgment of the country was applied to the consideration of this subject, those apprehensions would give way to the natural consequences of that sober judgment. Now, I have looked into a country paper, and the country papers afford a very good indication of the feeling of the country, and I take this account which is a report from Liverpool:—"The price of cattle is still rising; there was a large supply in the market; but the prices were very high; we stated a fortnight ago, that the diminution in price was the consequence of a mere panic, and would not continue."

If, then, I had acted on the panic, I should have been left in the lurch by the panic. I will now read another extract:—

"LIVERPOOL, Monday, May 16.

"We have had rather a large supply of cattle; but the prices are very high; beef 6½d. to 7d.; mutton 7d. to 7¾d."

Now the price of beef and mutton being 7d. and 7¾d. at Liverpool, I put it to every intelligent gentleman in this House, whether it is right to continue the present prohibition? Why do I take Liverpool? Because Liverpool is the port into which the Irish supplies enter. Now, supposing twenty years since any one had said to a Liverpool man, "Look at the present supply of Irish cattle, I will tell you what it will be twenty years hence," wouldn't his natural answer have been, "Why, the English graziers will be ruined." In 1820, the number of cows and oxen brought from Ireland—I am not sure whether into England or Liverpool only—was 16,966; and on an average of the last five years, there have been brought from Ireland into the port of Liverpool alone 472,200 cows and oxen, or upon an average about 94,400 in each year. What has been the effect of that enormous increase on the prices? So far from the English grazier being injured, the prices have risen, notwithstanding that large increase. Under these circumstances, is it wise to continue the present prohibition? Are we not bound to look for a wider area whence to draw our supply? Take the average of the five years preceding the last five, and the importation into Liverpool from Ireland was 54,800; compare that with the average of the five following years, which was 94,400; and do not these facts suggest important considerations? Is it not a just and almost necessary inference, that the population is increasing more rapidly than the supply? Whence, then, is our supply to come? Look at France, Holland, Belgium, and the States of the German Confederation—their population is sixty-five millions of inhabitants; they require cattle for their own supply of food; they are all, I believe, importing countries, and in each of them I am afraid the price of cattle and meat is rising, and the consumption increasing in proportion to the population. The noble lord says,—“At one time you contend you ought to remove the prohibition, and at another time you say it will not materially affect the price of meat in this country.”

I must say that I wish it would reduce the prices, for I consider the price of meat too high. I take this proof of it:—Take Liverpool. I see that, by the great improvements in steam navigation, there are forwarded large supplies of cattle from Aberdeen, and other parts of Scotland into Liverpool, and yet I see no benefit in that great community from such extensive importation. On the contrary, I see a progressive rise in the price of food. I say, then, that that is a conclusive proof of the necessity of removing the prohibition, and conclusive of the policy of widening the supply. If you tell me there is great alarm—a great panic in the markets, I am bound to say that I think that alarm unfounded. But what I admit to be the chief benefit from this alteration is this, that we are taking a new security against the constant progressive rise of the price of food in consequence of the diminution of the supply in this country, and the consequent rise of price of foreign cattle, I think that the foreigner will be ready to part with his cattle at a diminution of price of 25 per cent. At the same time, I am obliged to say, that when I consider the countries of Europe from which cattle can be introduced, I find them so few that I cannot think there will be any great diminution in the price of meat. Three things are always put out of consideration, and those are—the quantity of cattle, the quality of the meat, and the inevitable consequence of the removal of the prohibition in increasing the price of meat upon the continent. Depend upon it, you cannot open the markets of this country without, in some degree, raising the price of meat in other countries; and when my hon. friend refers me to the prices of 4*d.* and 5*d.* per pound, he must recollect that those are the prices with this prohibition and with the English markets closed to the foreigner; but if you open the English market the necessary consequence will be some rise in the price abroad. But always bear in mind the quality of the meat, and don't think that meat at 4*d.* per pound in Hamburg or Holstein, if such be the price, is such meat as that at 8*d.* per pound in Liverpool or London. The things are perfectly different. Meat of an equal quality with that which we consume in London, I very much doubt whether any place on the continent could supply at a less price than 6*d.* instead of 4*d.* I cannot, however, but think that there will be advantage from this free intercourse, by the improvements in our breed of cattle in this country. I was very much struck with an account of a meeting at which the hon. member for Berkshire was present, I believe last year, of that most useful institution, founded mainly by Lord Spencer, and with which I have the honour to be connected—I mean the Royal Agricultural Society of England. I read this morning, the account of what passed at that meeting, which I will quote to the House:—“Sir Francis A. Mackenzie, Bart., informed the council that he had at length succeeded, through the agency of his friend, the celebrated geologist and writer on fossil fishes, Professor Agassiz, in obtaining possession of a breeding stock, which, for the last twenty-three years, since his first visit to Switzerland, he had been most desirous to secure for this country; and that four of the finest bulls that Switzerland could produce were on their way to England, and would arrive to the consignment of Mr. Hanbury, banker, in Lombard-street, in the course of a few days. Sir Francis, in describing this stock, remarks, ‘I certainly never saw more beautiful cattle than the Swiss, not even in Yorkshire, and they combine both milking and fattening qualities, which is an immense advantage; the proof of the first is their being the cows which in Lombardy are only bought for making Parmesan cheese; and I hope that the shapes of the animals now sent will, to the best judges, prove that they possess the latter quality by their perfect shapes.’ Professor Agassiz not being limited in price, procured for Sir Francis Mackenzie four of the finest and handsomest young bulls that Switzerland could produce; and although the Professor considers the outlay already too large in effecting this object, Sir Francis expressed the conviction he felt that he should be rewarded if the blood was found to do good to our English breeds, by crossing them."

It is a great advantage, then, to the breeding of cattle in this country, to have an unlimited access to the cattle of the continent; and with our skill and application of chemical science to agriculture, it cannot be denied that if this intercourse with the continent be admitted, there will be great benefit resulting from it. I look back and find that scarcely a year has passed without many applications having been made to the treasury, to permit bulls and other animals of various breeds to be imported from parts of the continent. In one or two cases, permission was given; but it is, I need hardly say, a very different thing to do this by a mere exercise of favour against the law in a few isolated cases, and to provide for regular access, on the part of our agriculturists, to the best continental breeds. But, with the spirit, the industry, and the enterprise of the British farmer, I believe we should speedily find ourselves thoroughly able to compete with any country as to the supply of cattle. The only question then remaining is, whether the duty shall be fixed, or according to weight? Surely a strong proof of the propriety of imposing a fixed duty is, that it is adopted in all foreign countries, admitting importation of live stock. In Austria, the duty on an ox is 8*s.*; in Belgium, it is 10*s.*; in France, £2; in Germany 15*s.*; in Holland, £1 3*s.* 4*d.*; the same reason applying in those countries as in this, if any valid reason there be, for preferring a duty levied according to weight. And let the House mark this. My hon. friend will avoid saying what duty by weight he would wish. Would he desire one of 2*s.* 6*d.* per cwt? No; he of course does not deny that he wishes a higher degree of protection than I propose; and he would doubtless desire a duty of 6*s.* or 8*s.* per cwt.; but he abstains from naming any duty; he will not venture to specify the amount per cwt. he wishes. But, then, I say that this ought to be fully explained, before you proceed to vote for any abstract proposition. My hon. friend should really tell us what is the practical purport of his proposal, otherwise it would be a mere delusion voting upon his motion. Of course he thinks that £1 per head is not a sufficient protection, and he desires a higher one; but, then, I think that unless we clearly comprehend his practical intention, many members may be entrapped into a vote; for there are those, I can well understand, who would rather have 2*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. as the duty than £1 per head. In that case, observe that an ox weighing 4 cwt. would only pay 10*s.* duty—a result which might not entirely tend to diminish the "panic" of the farmers, nor to answer the object of my hon. friend. My hon. friend wishes really for an increase of protection, which would involve the interposing of greater difficulties to the admission of food for the people, for he should not forget that the levying of the duty by weight would create such an unavoidable delay and trouble at landing, as would materially retard and obstruct the importation of stock on any terms arranged. On that ground I oppose it. My belief is, that the duty of £1 per head will be sufficient. I stated that to a deputation of agriculturists, who waited upon me to press their arguments in favour of higher protection. To their demand I could not, I cannot accede; for I believe that the interests of the community require that there shall be a diminution of the protective duty. I have a deep impression, a firm conviction, that population is increasing more rapidly than the supply of provision in this country, and that no advantage can be derived by the agriculturists from keeping up higher duties than I propose. My hon. friend indeed said, fattening of cattle produced in this country no profit. Why not? Is it not because in certain districts, producing lean cattle, the most enormous prices are charged for them, so that the profit of fattening is done away with? What then we want is, to bring in a competition, which may give you the benefit of the lean cattle. As to fat cattle fetching £25 or £30 a head, consider the difficulties of bringing them from foreign ports: reflect that the freight cannot be inconsiderable, could hardly be below £2 a head, and would probably be augmented. Consider, too, the inevitable risk of a sea-passage, and remember that there can be no insurance against the damage, though there may be against the entire loss of cattle thus transported across the sea; all these things gave a real practical protection, over and above the duty. My interests are connected with the welfare of agriculture, but I should be ready, I trust, to sacrifice all personal interest, even if I imagined injury to myself would be the consequence of the measure I propose; but I really can assume to myself no such credit, for I believe that agriculture will derive, not injury, but advantage, from that measure, persuaded as I am that the effect will be, that while on the one hand all the unnecessary odium attaching to agricultural protection will be avoided, the establishment of a regular but moderate supply from the continent will keep prices at a more equal rate here and abroad, and on a level in this country, more consistent with the general welfare of the community. I am therefore, Sir, compelled, though with regret, to differ entirely from my hon. friend; I am so firmly persuaded that justice to consumers requires the establishment of increased facilities for the admission of food, and that the measure is by no means adverse to the best interests of the agriculturists themselves, that I can make no concession. I must adhere to my original proposition, which I trust the House will, by a large majority, support, thus putting an end to uncertainty and alarm, and passing a measure which I do believe will be as beneficial to the agriculturists as to the rest of the community.

Mr. Miles's proposition was negatived by a majority of 267.

House in Committee. On the question that the duty on oxen and bulls be 20s. per head from foreign countries, and 10s. per head from British possessions: Mr. Miles proposed that, in lieu of a duty of 20s. per head for oxen and bulls, there be levied a duty of 5s. 6d. per cwt. He was of opinion that if the right hon. baronet would accede to this alteration, all the alarm of the agricultural body would be at an end.

SIR ROBERT PEEL derived great consolation from the declaration of the hon. gentleman, that if he would adopt a 9s. 4d. duty, instead of an 8s., he would remove all the apprehensions of the agricultural body, as far as meat was concerned. He could not have been far from the mark, therefore, as to meat. If live cattle only weighed four cwt., after deducting the two-fifths, the hon. gentleman's proposal would only raise the duty 2s., and although of course the duty would be higher for heavier cattle, he would tell the hon. gentleman why he could not consent to his proposal. He thought that the duty he proposed upon meat and cattle was ample and sufficient. He thought that if lean cattle had a free admission, the agricultural body would derive a great advantage. As far as lean cattle was concerned, the duty of £1 was sufficient, and the agriculturists would have a right to complain if he flung upon them only fat instead of lean beasts. The hon. gentleman's duty would discountenance the importation of the heavier sorts of lean beasts, which afforded the least profit to the farmers. With respect to fat beasts it was not the amount of duty but the distance, the small area from which a supply could be obtained, and the difficulty of transport to this country that was the real protection. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. friend would not think it disrespectful to his opinion if he adhered to his own proposal.

In reply to Mr. Pusey, who suggested the appointment of a select committee.—

Sir Robert Peel said, that it was admitted by his hon. friend the member for Somersetshire that it was very difficult to determine the exact amount of protection which should be given between live and dead cattle, he therefore fixed upon one sum of 5s. 6d. for pigs, sheep, oxen, and cows; and if so great a judge found it difficult to say what the amount of protection should be, he did not believe that a committee of the most consummate graziers could come to any definite conclusion on the subject. It appeared to him that it was for the House to decide for itself upon the matter of its general judgment. If he yielded to the suggestion of his hon. friend, he should be equally obliged to give way to parties interested in other articles. Why not, for instance, have a select committee upon the subject of the proposed reduction of duty on spermacei oil? or upon the subject of the proposed reduction of duty on seed, to see that the duty on one seed was just equivalent to that on another? The House ought to consider first whether it was fit that prohibition should be removed, and if they were satisfied, then, from their general information and judgment, they should impose such a duty as would do justice to the producer and to the consumer; if they attempted a more definite plan they would fail. By consenting to the present motion he would be involved in endless difficulty and delay, and his hopes of a speedy progress with the tariff would be disappointed, because he must consent to committees on many other of the 1,100 articles in the tariff.

Mr. Villiers followed, and moved that the blank in the resolution, which it was proposed should be filled up with twenty shillings, be filled up with one shilling.

Sir R. Peel: The course the noble lord intends to pursue, almost induces me to refrain from making any statement with regard to the particular province of Russia to which the noble lord has alluded. The noble lord charges us with having increased the apprehensions, and added to the alarm which already prevailed in the country, by stating the immense amount of corn that would be imported from a province of Russia into our markets. Just let me remind the noble lord and the committee of the real facts of the case. The noble lord, or the late government, appoints as a commercial agent at St. Petersburg a gentleman well able to afford commercial information to this country. The late government volunteered to get correct information as to the extent of the supply of corn that could be derived from foreign countries. Their consul, appointed on account of his commercial qualifications, informs the government that 38,000,000 of quarters of wheat—he begged pardon—of corn, could be brought from a certain province of Russia. Her Majesty's late government were then intent upon an alteration of the Corn-laws; and though, of course, they had read that information, still they had never thought it worth their while to inquire of their informant—this commercial agent—upon what basis this piece of information was founded. They never put that question, but they had printed for the information and instruction of parliament and the country the statements they had derived from such a high authority on the subject of the capabilities of Russia as their commercial agent or consul. This information was in their possession for several months, and yet he was the first person to say, that it was a most astounding statement; and accordingly he asked if there was not an error on the very face of it. On reference to the original despatch, it was founded, that the 38,000,000 quarters of corn appeared, not in figures, but at length, in the handwriting of the consul himself. And there it remained, without any attempt on the late government to clear up the manifestly apparent mistake; and then the noble lord charges us with continuing this mistake, which originated with, and was derived from their information. Now, he must be permitted to say, that the noble lord was more responsible for those exaggerated apprehensions of which the noble lord spoke, for the printing and circulating this information at the expense of the country, until he and the government with which the noble lord was connected found out the mistake, and then, when it was pointed out, they wrote to their consul to ask if his information was correct.

The committee divided, on the question that the blank be filled up with the words "One Shilling."—Ayes, 44; Noes, 209; majority, 166.

On the main question being again put,—Major Vivian moved, "That the duty on cattle, meat, and other provisions mentioned in the tariff, imported from the Canadas, be equal to the import duties from other foreign countries."

Sir R. Peel doubted whether the hon. gentleman had been happy in the article on which he had thought fit to bring forward this question; for it was on the question of the duty on oxen that the committee were then deliberating, and he did not conceive that there could possibly be any danger of importation of oxen from the banks of the Mississippi. The same, of course, with respect to fresh meat. To be sure, he had seen a haunch of venison brought from that country, but it was not quite in a state in which he should have liked to venture upon it. He did not think that it was necessary to go into the principle of the hon. gentleman's proposed alteration. The House had discussed the principle very fully a short time ago; they had allowed this boon to Guernsey and Jersey, and he did not see why they should not allow it to the Canadas; for he did not see any great ground of apprehension that there would be any such influx of meat from that country as the hon. gentleman seemed to apprehend. The hon. gentleman, however, said there would be no boon to the Canadas, because, he said, they had no cattle there at present; but if cattle could be fed there so as to be converted into salt meat for exportation to this country, then, he thought, that would be a benefit to Canada. It would be a benefit to the colonist, and to a certain extent to the consumer also; but he did not think that the effect with respect to the quantity likely to be imported would be such as need give rise to any apprehensions. Therefore he trusted that the House would feel, that it was not wise to accede to the proposition of the hon. gentleman, whose object, as he apprehended, was, to raise the amount of duty on all these articles of stock imported from the colonies to the same height as if they came from foreign countries.

In reply to some remarks by Mr. C. Buller and Viscount Howick—

Sir R. Peel remarked, that where there existed such differences of opinion, it was extremely difficult to form an opinion of what would be the real operation of the tariff. He believed the noble lord would admit, that spring corn, and not wheat, was chiefly used in the feeding of cattle. He had been in the first instance told, that the protection given to spring corn was disproportioned to that which was given to wheat; but the argument of the noble lord went to show, that it would be more beneficial to the agricultural interest if less protection were given to spring corn. It now appeared that he had been wise in giving that less amount of protection to spring corn, and he hoped that this would be treasured up by those agriculturists who dealt in spring corn. According to the argument made by his hon. friend, the member for East Somerset, the other night, he ought to say to the members for Norfolk and Suffolk, "Don't be at all afraid of the importation of barley and oats, for the hon. member for Somerset says, they will only come in in the shape of fat cattle and pigs." But how did the trade with Ireland confirm that argument of the hon. member for Somerset? Not at all; for it appeared, on the contrary, that this economical mode of importing barley and oats in the shape of fat cattle had not taken effect. Simultaneously with the importation of the largest quantity of fat cattle from that country there had been the importation of the largest quantity of oats.

Major Vivian ultimately withdrew his motion; the blank for the duty on colonial cattle was ordered to be filled up with "ten shillings," and the remaining items were agreed to.

The House then proceeded to consider the articles of fish, fruit, &c., a number of items were agreed to, and the House resumed, Committee to sit again.

INCOME-TAX—THIRD READING.

MAY 30, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL moved the third reading of the Property-tax bill, when Mr. Sharman Crawford moved as an amendment a resolution, having for its object a more full and fair representation of the people.

Sir Robert Peel trusted, that the hon. member would not charge him with any want of respect if he declined to enter into the discussion of this motion, which the hon. member's speech, however, held out every inducement to do. He thought that much more favourable occasions could have been adopted for proceeding with a proposition for a change in our representative system. The hon. gentleman, on his former motion on this subject, stated very strong opinions that that House did not represent the feelings of the people, and that the whole system of representation was defective. The hon. gentleman's motion, which involved the main principle of his resolution of that night, had already been fully discussed. The proposition which was now made was even of a more extensive character than that made on a former occasion, for the hon. member now declared that the House of Commons, as at present constituted, was incapable of performing its functions, and that the only step they ought to take was immediately to resolve upon an extensive reform in the representation. If the House was not at liberty to impose an Income-tax, they were hardly competent to reform the tariff, and were not capable of performing any of the constitutional functions which had been assigned to it. If the House was unfit to impose this measure, there was no other act which they could justly perform. He was very much afraid that the hon. gentleman's motion would go to the extent of declaring, that the House could not even reform itself. In short, all the functions of legislation must be stopped until this reform took place. He thought that this would be most unwise in the present state of the country. He had already stated the substantive objections he entertained to the proposition on a previous occasion, and he would not then repeat them. He thought also, that it would be most inexpedient to discuss the question of parliamentary reform on a motion for the third reading of the Income-tax bill. He trusted that the hon. member would not think that his abstaining to say any more on the present occasion arose from any want of respect.

Amendment negatived. Question again put that the bill be read a third time, Mr. F. T. Baring rose, and was proceeding to bring forward an amendment, when Sir R. Peel, who had just previously been called out of the House by Sir J. Graham, rose, amidst loud cries of "hear," and addressed the House in the following words, at least as nearly as we could collect them, for the right hon. baronet's excitement well nigh overpowered his utterance:—Whatever may be the inconvenience to the public service resulting from delay, yet still I think it would be inconsistent with my duty, with my position, and I feel certain that it would be unsatisfactory to the House, were I not, after what I have just heard, to propose that the consideration of the question now before us be postponed. I ought to premise, that the information I have received is so imperfect that I must repeat it with great distrust as to the entire accuracy of it; but, since I came into the House, information has reached me that an attempt has been made on her majesty's life—an attempt which a merciful Providence has rendered abortive; and I have reason to believe, that the assassin is now in custody; and he will, consequently, at as early a period as possible, be subjected to an examination. Under these circumstances—[Mr. O. Wood: Is the Queen quite safe?] Perfectly so. I would, under these circumstances, suggest that we do now adjourn, and if this proposal be agreed to, the debate can be renewed to-morrow. My noble friend the member for Dorsetshire, has received a pledge of precedence for his motion to-morrow at five o'clock, but immediately after that is disposed of, the right hon. gentleman's amendments can be taken. At present I do not think that, our feelings being naturally all so excited, we could pay proper attention to the subject; and I therefore would suggest that, not only out of respect to our Sovereign, but from our inability, under the circumstances, to pay the requisite attention to the question before us, it will be better to postpone the debate, and I therefore move, that the House do now adjourn.

Lord John Russell briefly seconded the motion, and the House adjourned.

On the next day the bill was read a third time and passed.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, "That towards raising the supply granted to her Majesty, the several duties on sugar and molasses now payable shall be further continued."

Mr. Labouchere moved as an amendment, "That the duty on foreign sugar be reduced to 30s. per cwt., and on colonial sugar to 20s. per cwt."

In the course of the long discussion which ensued—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said it was quite evident that, if this debate were permitted to proceed, there would be, on the other side of the House, a considerable degree of heat and asperity, quite inconsistent with the calmness of deliberation. He thought it was his duty to prevent that by rising to counsel moderation in the combined phalanx of his opponents, and pour oil on the troubled waters. He hoped the House would come to this practical conclusion, that by far the safest course they could pursue would be to vote for the proposition of her Majesty's government, and leave the question in the hands in which it ought to be. It was perfectly evident, that to adopt any rival proposition would produce no satisfaction whatever. He did not speak against, but he voted against the motion of the hon. member for Bath, for he felt that calm reason was scarcely necessary to discuss the principles it embodied. The hon. member for Montrose announced his wish to maintain our colonial dependencies, but said, that his object was to see each colony paying for itself. He apprehended that the proposal of the hon. and learned member for Bath to admit these colonies to an unlimited competition with slave possessing colonies, was not the way to ensure that object. The hon. member said, that if the weavers of Lancashire were asked what benefit they derived from the duty on foreign sugar, they would assuredly say, "None." But he put it to the hon. member, whether that was the test by which any great question affecting the country was to be decided? If he asked a Lancashire weaver what benefit he derived from Jamaica, and that his reply was "None," ought that to induce him to abandon Jamaica? Was the hon. gentleman prepared to test the advantages derived from our connection with India in the same manner? Or, should we abandon our colonial dependencies altogether upon the assurance of a distressed weaver of Lancashire, that he was not aware that any benefit was conferred upon this country by those dependencies? If that were the principle of the hon. and learned gentleman, it was quite clear, that in order to conform to it, we must resolve our power into the narrow limits of our own resources, and try what England could do against the world, after having abandoned all those dependencies which she had established to her glory. It was not merely a material or pecuniary benefit that was to be regarded in the loss of our colonies. England was governed by higher considerations, and could never be guilty of such ingratitude, such a breach of faith, as to forsake those dependencies that she had fostered and protected. He asked whether the government was not entitled to demand the confidence of the House upon the subject. The proposal was, that the existing duties should continue for one year longer. He was referring to the annual vote upon the sugar duties, which did not prevent, but compelled the consideration of the question in another year. The question, then, upon which the sense of the House would be taken was, whether or not the sugar duties should continue for another year? He asked, whether the government had taken a course respecting the commercial tariff of the country which disintituled it to the support and confidence of the House. It was said, that all minor interests were sacrificed, but that where any great political interest intervened, there was deference and submission. He did not think that the government was fairly chargeable with such partiality. Much had been said about the West-India interest, and it was said that the government supported a monopoly out of deference to it, but certainly nothing could equal the folly of a government that could act improperly and unjustly for the purpose of conciliating the support of the West-Indian interest. In the unreformed parliament the West-Indian interest may have been powerful, but the Reform bill struck a great blow at that interest; and he believed that, in point of political influence, no interest at the present moment was weaker than that of the West Indies. The noble lord had spoken of the tariff as if the consumer in this country would derive no advantage from it. The noble lord said, that it did nothing material with respect to meat. He would only remind the noble lord, that he had been ten years in office, and had never proposed any alteration in the tariff. The noble lord did bring forward a sort of 8s. duty on corn; but during the whole ten years that he remained in office, did he ever intimate his intention of reducing the duty on foreign cattle or provisions? In reference to the measure which he had introduced, he knew that the apprehensions entertained regarding it were greatly exaggerated; but he had held no equivocal language on the subject. The price of meat was high; but he had always said that there were physical difficulties which constituted a protection to the meat of this country, and which would prevent any great reduction in its price. When he heard that the apprehensions were so great, that the price of cattle had fallen 25 per cent., he thought it was time to interfere. He adverted to this, because the noble lord had talked of his fearing to offend a powerful interest, and he wished to contrast the course which he had pursued with that of the late government—a course in which he ran greater risk than any minister ever ran, and he saw that nearly a hundred of those members who had given him their confidence were on this particular point prepared to vote against him, and he thought that in adhering to his resolution he had given sufficient proof that he was prepared to incur the risk for the purpose of benefiting the people. He contrasted that course with the one pursued by the noble lord. The noble lord might say, that he had great reforms in contemplation. But when the noble lord brought forward his proposal for a fixed duty in corn, there was not a whisper of any reduction of the duties on the other articles of provisions. The noble lord now produced a proposition in reference to the sugar duties different from that produced last year, and the noble lord surely would not blame those who attacked and negated that proposition which now appeared not to be a perfect Minerva, sprung at once from the brain of Jupiter. The present proposition of the noble lord would cause a loss to the revenue of from £500,000 to £600,000. The hon. member for Weymouth seemed to think that a reduction of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the price of sugar, would be a small matter; but if they argued against a reduction because it was small, they would never have any reduction in the tariff. But viewing the matter abstractedly, these small savings constituted great savings on the whole. Each small saving would tell upon another small saving, and therefore they would propagate themselves. The right hon. gentleman said, that they ought to take off this tax, because it was a burden on the people. If they took that as a principle, he would venture to say that there would be a deficit even with the Income-tax, of £2,000,000. He had no doubt, if he were asked the question, whether he would think it right to reduce the duty on wool, if he looked at the question abstractedly, he would say that he did. If he were asked the same question as to the duty on cotton wool, he would probably give the same answer. If they raised a duty of £600,000 from sugar, which they ought to sacrifice, they would lose £800,000 on wool and cotton wool. If he took the excise duty on glass, he would venture to say, that there was not one article the reduction of duty on which would confer such great benefit on the people. So of every duty, if he looked at it simply and abstractedly, he must give way to the arguments for a reduction. But in the present instance, and with the uncertainty as to the produce of the Income-tax, he could not agree to the loss of £600,000 in the revenue, to reduce the price of sugar $\frac{1}{2}d.$ a pound, although he admitted that the benefit of the reduction would be considerable. With respect to the West Indies, particularly, he thought, that no steps ought to be taken without considering attentively the state of the interests of the West Indies, and seeing how far they were affected by our fiscal regulations. He had grave doubts whether our West India colonies, in which we had suppressed slavery altogether, could compete with colonies in which slavery did exist. That was the opinion of Mr. Deacon Hume, who was for carrying the principles of free-trade as far as any man. Mr. Hume was of opinion that the principle of free-trade did not apply to this case. "I cannot conceive," said Mr. Hume, "that having thirty years ago abolished the slave-trade, and having now abolished slavery itself, that any question of free-trade can arise between Jamaica and Cuba. Cuba, with an abundance of fresh and rich soil, not only having the advantage of employing slaves—whatever it may be—but notoriously importing the enormous amount of 40,000 or 50,000 slaves every year, having, in fact, the slave-trade and slavery; and as the laws of this country deprive the planter of Jamaica of that means of raising his produce, I consider the question as one taken out of the category of free-trade."

Such was the evidence of Mr. D. Hume, given before the Import Duties' committee. What, however, was the present state of the trade? In the year 1840, the average price of sugar was 49s. 1d. per cwt. In 1841, the average price was 39s. 7d.; and in 1842, the average price was 38s. 2d. And what had been the price during the last month? 37s. 3d. Observe, there had been a continued reduction in the price of sugar. Then as to the consumption. Last year, notwithstanding the distress of the country, there had been the greatest consumption that had been ever known, not greater in reference to the population, but greater altogether. There were more than 4,000,000 cwt. of sugar consumed in this country last year. But the main ground on which he opposed the motion of the right hon. gentleman was the same on which he opposed the motion of last year. He did not believe that the honour and character of this country would be maintained if they were to make a reduction in the duty on foreign sugar, without making any attempt to obtain an equivalent concession from the growers of that sugar. They were in a peculiar situation at the present moment as to slavery and the slave-trade. Their efforts on the coast of Africa had unfortunately failed, so far, at least, as the expedition of the two vessels sent out last year was concerned. They had been told last year, "You may relax the duties on foreign sugar, in the expectation of other and more efficient means of putting an end to slavery." What were their hopes now? What was the state of our relations with that great country, France, which had recently refused to ratify a treaty signed with its own consent? Imputations had been thrown out against France upon this point, and we ought not lightly to take any step to abate the confidence of the world in our disinterested motives. If, then, there were proof that last year the consumption of sugar was greater than in any preceding years, if for the purpose of mere pecuniary benefit, and after the sacrifices they had made, they now permitted the negroes of the Brazils and of Cuba to come into this country without making an attempt to put down the slave-trade and slavery, their motives would not be attributed to that high principle which was now ascribed to them. He would say, make the attempt with those countries from which the supply was to be obtained. The sugar-growing countries were themselves in a peculiar situation at the present moment. There was a growing feeling that the continuance of slavery was attended with great danger. In Cuba, in the American States, and in the Brazils, there was a great ferment in the public mind, not merely as to the slavery, but also as to the slave trade; some from benevolent motives, but some from interested fears. Let them look at the great example they had set, and let them see what must be the inference which would be drawn from their conduct. The example we had set as to the slavery trade had produced its effects. It was impossible that there should be this feeling existing in the North and South American States without seeing that slavery itself stood in a very precarious position. The same feeling had grown up in the Brazils, and the same feeling was now spreading in Cuba. He held in his hand a letter from a naval officer of Cuba, dated 6th April, 1842, in which he said that he could not hear of any vessels fitting out at the Havannah for the slave-trade; he understood that there was great anxiety as to the probability of a general emancipation, in which case it was evident that the greater the number of slaves imported, the more embarrassment there would be when the time came for the emancipation. That was the feeling in Cuba, and if the inhabitants of Cuba entertained such a feeling, was it not likely to prevail in the Brazils; and if it prevailed in the Brazils, was it not likely to prevail among the intelligent community of the United States? He said then that they ought to be doubly cautious how they acted. The right hon. gentleman said that if we made this relaxation, we should be able to speak to other countries with greater authority: that is, if they admitted Brazilian sugar at a duty of 30s. instead of 63s., we should be able to speak with greater authority to other countries. What? after encouraging the embarking of great capital, did the right hon. gentleman—as was well put by his right hon. friend the vice-president of the board of trade in his very able speech,—did the right hon. gentleman think that in three years from the change we should be able to speak with greater authority to the sugar-growing or slave-holding countries? Did the right hon. gentleman himself pursue that course with respect to taxes? Was it not his boast that they would not enter into a treaty without a stipulation as to the suppression of the slave-trade, and the legalization of a right of search? Texas wished to have a treaty of commerce, and we said, “We will not enter into treaty with you unless you will abolish the slave-trade,” and as a guarantee of their sincerity they assented to the right of search. The right hon. gentleman did not establish his commercial relations by treaty in the first instance, and then ask them to assent to the right of search; no,—he said, “We are ready to enter into the treaty, but we exact as a condition that you should assent to the right of search.” [Mr. Labouchere: That was a new country.] No doubt it was a new country; but the principle was the same, and if the principle were good let it be generally applied. The right hon. gentleman said, “let this country take the advantages of our commercial relations, and you will be able to prove to Texas, that unless she gives the right of search these advantages will be lost. Now with respect to France, did the right hon. gentleman conduct his negotiations with that country upon the principles which he now advocated? Did he say to France, “We will reduce the duties on wine and brandy, and then we shall feel ourselves entitled to reductions of duties on our manufactures?” He had not taken that course, but he had said, “You have concessions to make which are of great importance to our manufactures; we have concessions to make of great importance to you in respect of your cultivation of the vine; we insist upon it that these reciprocal concessions shall be simultaneously made.” And if the right hon. gentleman took that course with regard to Texas and France, did not the right hon. gentleman think that he should be better able to negotiate with slave-holding parties, and attach conditions favourable to abolition of the slave-trade, to concessions of duty on foreign sugar? The noble lord had repeated the argument which had been used last year; that if tobacco and cotton were allowed to come in, sugar also ought to be permitted to be imported. Sugar was a new concession; but surely the noble lord would not deny that there was something in the cultivation of sugar which took it entirely out of the same category with those other articles to which he had referred. He had been very much struck with the opinion expressed by Sir Lionel Smith in reference to the introduction of labour into the Mauritius. Sir Lionel Smith said, that he was charged with a want of sympathy for those engaged in the cultivation of the sugar cane; but he declared that he had seen too much of the consequences entailed upon those engaged in that labour to view its cultivation with any thing but horror. There was something, therefore, in the cultivation of the sugar-plant peculiarly destructive to human life, and he thought that to open the market of this country at the present time, to allow the introduction of the produce of the sugar-growers of Cuba and Brazils, without any stipulation for the advantage of the negro, would be to detract from the character of this country, and to lower it in the estimation of foreign nations. There were parties in all these countries, and contests were going on between them. There were parties in favour of slavery, and parties averse to it. Should we then show a desire to foster the present practice of slavery? Should we do any thing to raise a presumption that our motives had not been disinterested? Should we do any thing to excite a belief that in voting the sum of £20,000,000 for extinguishing the curse of our colonial system, we had been actuated by any other than just principles and disinterested feelings, or should we allow it to be said, that we were now actuated by no higher views than the procurement of a relaxation of these duties? His own opinion was, that if the proposition of the right hon. gentleman were adopted, the present influence of this country would be materially abated, and that we should be unable to make any continued exertions in favour of any progress in this great cause—exertions on which the final abandonment of the slave-trade, and the extinction of slavery itself most materially depended.

The original motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

In the discussion on Lord John Russell's motion for leave to bring in a bill for the better discovery of bribery, at the election of members of parliament.

SIR R. PEEL said: Sir, I shall give my cordial support to the motion of the noble lord for leave to bring in a bill, to prevent the practice of bribery, and to facilitate the exposure of that offence after it has been committed. It appears to me, that there are three defects in the present law with respect to the examination of witnesses. The first is the case in which an election committee is appointed at the instance of an individual, for the purpose of determining an individual right. In that case the individual having no other object than to maintain his own personal right, when the enforcement of that right becomes desperate, or the expense of maintaining it is likely to be so considerable, that his private fortune would be injured, he has every motive for withdrawing from the contest. That consideration leads to compromises, several alleged instances of which we have heard of in the course of the present session. Now, I do think there ought to be a remedy for this, and that a committee having been appointed for the adjudication of an individual right, that committee ought to have the power, and ought to be compelled as a duty, to report to the House that the inquiry had been broken off on account of circumstances which the committee might set forth, and that it considered the public interest required that the inquiry should be conducted at the public charge. I apprehend that the noble lord's measure will have for its object the providing an effective remedy for this defect. There may be cases, too, in which electors, though aware of bribery and corruption having taken place, fear to call for a parliamentary inquiry into the matter, in consequence of the expense; and in such cases no committee would be appointed, whatever the state of the case, and there would be consequently, a great impediment in the way of justice. I am prepared to support a measure which should facilitate inquiries into such cases as these. I do not wish to transfer the onus of trying questions of individual right from individuals to the public, where such inquiries would otherwise be made in the same way as at present; but where, from some such circumstances as those which I have pointed out, the inquiry which the public interest demands would not otherwise be made, it would be highly desirable that the public should institute the inquiry, and that electors should have due protection in such inquiries. In cases where such an examination should be instituted, and it should be found that the sitting members were unduly returned, I should suggest that where the opposing candidates, by the determination of the committee, were shown to have had the majority of bona fide votes, that the seat should not be, as was proposed, declared void; but that the opposing candidates, so placed in a majority, should, as in the rule already observed, be declared the sitting members. I think it of great importance that members in affording facilities for candidates, who have not succeeded to petition, should take care not to transfer the onus of prosecuting an individual right from the individual to the public. When the public interest is involved in the question—when, for instance, the question arises, whether a borough should be disfranchised, or some public example should be made on account of bribery—in a case like this, it is quite right that the public should take charge of conducting the inquiry, and bear the expense of it; but, then, you must be careful, that by being too ready to transfer the expense to the public, you do not altogether do away with the inducement to the individual to prosecute his own rights. I do not say the public have no concern in the question as to who shall have the seat. What I say is, that if, without due precaution, you promote petitions to be prosecuted at the public expense, the effect will be that unsuccessful candidates may incite electors in their interest to present petitions in cases when such petitions would otherwise never be heard of. The opportunities or temptations thus presented for attempting to get a seat in the House through the means of election petitions would be a serious evil, and I hope the noble lord provides for it.

Lord J. Russell was understood to say, that when the petition was prosecuted at the public expense, and the sitting member unseated, the election should be declared void.

Sir R. Peel: In that case there certainly would not be so much temptation. But then, if it appeared clearly by the result of this inquiry that a majority of the electors was in favour of the unsuccessful candidate, would you in that case, make a new election necessary? Suppose it be proved to your satisfaction that a certain individual ought to have been elected, would it be just to make the election void, and have recourse to a new election? I do not understand, exactly, how the noble lord means to deal with such a case. With the principle of his motion I cordially concur—and I trust he will see that it is in no unfriendly spirit I throw out this remark. It is of the greatest importance that you should not lightly promote petitions at the public expense, relieving candidates from the charge attending the prosecution of their individual right. There is one other consideration with respect to this branch of the subject. You ought not to subject members honestly and fairly returned, to annoyance and vexation, on account of the facility given to the prosecution of petitions. You ought not to subject a member, who has firmly refused to participate in bribery, and who has obtained his seat through perfectly honest means—you ought not, indeed it would be manifestly unjust, to subject this man to the annoyance and expense of defending his seat. At present you subject the party prosecuting the petition to enter into recognizances. But if you provide that, on a petition against the return of a member merely signed by a certain number of electors, it shall be proceeded with at the public expense; that, no doubt will be very efficient in causing petitions to be presented when corruption has taken place; but take care that you do not subject members honestly returned, to vexations to which an honest man will not submit. Now, you take a certain number of voters—you say six—as the number by whom the petition must be signed. Take the case of a member who has said he would not owe his election to bribery, and whose friends have done all in their power to prevent it. Yet we all know what a stimulus to the getting up petitions, the heats and animosities of elections are. [Lord J. Russell would require recognizances from the petitioning party.] I wish to be understood that I speak for honest men, who are honestly returned; and if you wish members to be fairly returned to this House, you should not subject honest men to a prosecution which would operate as so great a discouragement against coming forward as candidates as to deprive the House of the services of many who are most useful as members. I do hope, therefore, that, in facilitating petitions, you will not subject honest men to these discouragements. The other defect which I wish to allude to, is the difficulty, so far as the boroughs are concerned, of obtaining results satisfactory to parliament and the public. We appoint a committee of inquiry; the committee reports the existence of systematic bribery; the inquiry goes to the Lords, and is not proceeded with during that session. In the mean time, the feelings which led to the presentation of the petition have died away. The electors meet: they say, why should we proceed with this? Shall we not be charged by posterity with causing the disfranchisement of the borough? and is it not much better to withdraw the evidence from the House of Lords? Again, two or three most important witnesses examined before the committee of this House may be dead, or gone over sea, when the case is proceeded with by the Lords, so that the House may have a different evidence from this. I apprehend, therefore, that if the law be left as it is, the Lords will not in such a case be unwilling to concur in positive disfranchisement, except upon evidence heard at their own bar. I understand the noble lord means to provide a joint tribunal, consisting of members of both Houses, before which these inquiries should be entered on; and if the law be framed so that both the Lords and Commons, in a clear case, would be satisfied, the House of Lords, whose legislative power I understand the noble lord to leave in full force, would consent to the step of disfranchisement; I believe, that supposing the House consent to the measure, it would be better to leave to the Crown the nomination of the tribunal than to give it to parliament, as it appears more likely that the Crown, acting under the advice of responsible advisers, would make an appropriate selection; especially when it is considered that there may be differences in parliament from election reasons, and a committee constituted under such influences could hardly produce a good result. Though the course is somewhat novel, there is, I think, something analogous in East Indian jurisdiction, and on the whole, I think it would be better to leave to the Crown the appointment of a certain number of members. The noble lord's proposition I am perfectly satisfied with, and I believe it to be a great improvement on the bill of 1834, which was sent down from the Lords. It is much less cumbersome, and we have seen, Sir, by recent experience, the good effect of leaving nominations in certain cases to rest with the chair, under the guarantee of the character of the individual who occupies it, instead of referring them to majorities of the House. For these reasons, Sir, I approve of the noble lord's bill more than that of the House of Lords. With respect to the observations of an hon. gentleman opposite (the member for Montrose), as to the see-saw decisions of committees, though, by adopting a definite rule, you might avoid these see-saw decisions, I doubt much whether this is a principle by which questions of this kind ought to be decided. To the retrospective provisions of the noble lord's bill, I shall give my cordial support. With respect to Newcastle, for instance, I hope that it will be carried into effect, and that a clause will be contained in the bill, by which, though the noble lord's bill may not receive the royal assent these two months, any person taking money at the approaching elections, whether it be taken in the shape of "market-money," or in any other way, shall be liable to punishment. The law with respect to bribery and treating is certainly in an unsatisfactory state. I hardly know what the law relating to treating is now. It will be a difficult point to define between the mere innocent conviviality between friends and actual corrupt treating, when you come to apply penalties and declare what practices are corrupt. If you make a law making it corruption for a candidate to give a dinner to an elector, either before or after the election, this would prevent treating; but would it not, if possible, be still worse to trench so much on the liberty of the subject as to interfere in that way? Bribery, in the way of treating, exists, I think, to a very great extent. In the borough which I have the honour to represent, as I believe in every borough in the kingdom, the electors are in the habit of having a dinner. A number of wealthy individuals sit down; and I do think it hard that if two hundred gentlemen meet for this purpose, it being impossible that all the electors should sit down together, the rest of the constituency should be prevented meeting if they please and dining together. But here again, I fear, it must be admitted that though such dinners do not operate as bribery on the electors, they may do so on the publican.

Therefore it will be difficult in boroughs of a limited size and particular description to discriminate between hospitality and corrupt practices. There is another point to which attention should be called,—I mean the payments made for the conveyance of electors to the poll. It is very doubtful, at this moment, what is the law in respect to that point. Some committees of this House will say that it is legal to give reasonable refreshments to the electors, and I believe it has been decided that it is perfectly allowable on the part of a candidate to pay the expenses of the conveyance of electors to the polling places. [Dissent.] At least I am under the impression that election committees of this House have determined that a candidate might legally pay for reasonable refreshment for his voters, and for their conveyance to the place of polling. [“Mr. C. Wynn: No.”] My right hon. friend may be right. But I never yet passed through a town in which there was a contested election, that I did not see a number of carriages always provided at the expense of the candidates for the conveyance of their voters. And if it be the case that electors will not take a sufficient interest in the exercise of the valuable privilege they possess, to induce them to come to the poll, unless they have the means provided them of doing so, I am very much afraid that any sudden and violent interference with the existing practice in that respect, will very materially diminish the number of voters. To say, therefore, that on no account shall the expenses of conveyance or reasonable refreshment be paid on the part of the candidates, would be, in my opinion, to make the number of electors voting at each election considerably less—thus practically diminishing the amount of the elective franchise. On the other hand, I am sensible that if it were made legal to pay such charges, the permission might be made a cloak to cover a far worse degree of corruption than now prevails, and which carried to excess, would be neither more nor less than the grossest bribery. Now, Sir, I think that the noble lord is perfectly right in proposing that every species of direct payment, as between the voter and the candidate, should be held as bribery; whether that payment be made under the name of “market-money,” of “head-money,” or of treating in general; be the amount 7s. 6d., to one class of electors, 10s. to another, or £1 to another. I am perfectly ready to support that proposition. But after this shall have been done I am afraid that we will leave the law on other points connected with the question, on treating for instance, and on various other classes of expenses, the same as we found it. In every borough there are certain individuals who take a lead in all political matters, and who altogether influence the electors in their respective places. Now, I believe that if these influential persons of both parties in boroughs set their faces against bribery, and came to an understanding to discourage all unnecessary expenses, they would do a great deal more towards the suppression of the evils complained of than all the acts of the legislature. These practices have prevailed so long that I do not expect a great deal could be done towards their suppression at once; and I consider that the extinction of them must be the effect of time and better habits. I do not wish to underrate the advantage of law in this respect. I believe that the noble lord has struck at the root of bribery in this bill; but, though the committees of this House have shown hitherto an almost total absence of party feeling and a fixed determination to put down bribery, I think at the same time that the exposure of the practices made necessary some preliminary proof. I do not, therefore, underrate the law, but I think that good example and improved habits will more effectually lead to the diminution of bribery—its extinction I scarcely look for—than any legislative enactment whatever, and I do hope that the leading men of the country will set their faces so effectually against it, that after the next general election, come when it may, there shall be little or no cause to complain on the score of bribery.

Leave given to bring in the bill.

CUSTOMS ACTS—THE TARIFF—COALS.

The House in Committee on the Customs' Acts.

Mr. Gladstone proposed that the duty per ton upon coals, culm, and cinders, in foreign ships, should be 4s.; in British ships, not small, 2s.; and on small coal or screened, 1s.

Viscount Howick proposed an amendment, negating the government proposition. SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the prevailing feeling on my mind, in the course of this debate, has been one of unmixed satisfaction that I have secured the Income-tax; for what would have been the position of the government, since so great an opposition is made to this duty on coal, if we had proposed to raise three millions by taxes on articles of consumption? That was the alternative which the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) pointed to in his memorable resolution on the Income-tax, in which he tried to gather as many followers as possible under his banner. The noble lord stated, that up to the year 1836, twenty-three millions of taxes had been repealed, and if he did not directly say, "Levy some of those taxes again," the meaning of the reference was, that it would be much better to revive some of them than to have recourse to a direct Income-tax. Suppose I had been credulous on this subject. Suppose I had said I had better give up the Income-tax, and try my hand at the revival of taxes on consumption. Why, the tax on coal was one which was repealed, and certainly the opposition which has been shown to my raising £130,000 out of four millions by means of it, makes me rejoice that the Income-tax is beyond the grasp of that opposition. When I see the right hon. gentleman warmed to such a degree on this point, what would he have been if I had attempted to raise the amount of revenue indirectly? He says, that the proposition, as it at present stands, is infinitely better than the original one. If so, it cannot be bad. That which is not bad must be on the road to perfection. Here is a proposition supported by the coal trade, not universally, perhaps, but pretty generally. [Viscount Howick: A large body opposed it.] When a public meeting is called, and agrees that a duty of 1s. on small coal, and 2s. on other coal, is satisfactory to them, it may be taken as their meaning, that the proposition is not so bad, and they are ready to support it. It being desirable to supply a deficiency, and being in want of revenue, we make this proposition. Compare it with any other indirect taxation. The right hon. gentleman himself says, that our proposition is infinitely better than the other; and we have the consent of the parties interested. Then, as to the compromise which has been spoken of, and which I really thought the right hon. gentleman was going to refer to the committee of inquiry—so little was I aware of any compromise, that on Saturday I met my right hon. friends at the Board of Trade to consider the whole coal trade, to examine the information received from foreign consuls, from gas companies, and steam navigation companies, and I did not then understand that I was a party to any compromise. I thought myself then as free to propose any duty I might think fit as on the first day of the session. I did not know in what manner the parties to this resolution meant to vote, nor did I feel myself bound as to the course I should pursue. I can believe that the coal-owners might ask what progress the government had made in the tariff—that they would find that it had adhered to and carried all its propositions by large majorities—that they might ask if it adhered to the 4s. duty on coal, would that not be carried too? And they might state that they thought a 2s. duty might be accepted, as it would not check the export. I can believe that they would not imagine that the government would abandon the coal duty altogether; but would, on the 19th head of the tariff, adhere to its original proposition in the same manner as it had done in the eighteen others. It would be a great reflection on their understandings had I thought otherwise. I was no party to any compromise; but supposing I had been, we were acting for great interests; and were we to be deprived of the privilege of obtaining information? Has not the right hon. gentleman himself tried to ascertain what propositions would be palatable to certain parties? In the timber duties I entered into a compromise with the hon. member for Lambeth. I heard what the custom-officers could state; and I did infer, that if his proposition did not cause a loss of revenue, that it would not be met by violent opposition. Is this improper? There is no use in seeing deputations, if we cannot say to the parties making a new proposition, "How many of you agree in this? and if we accede to it, do you withdraw your opposition?" I saw the noble lord (Lord Howick) and the member for Southwark on this subject. Suppose they had said we think a 4s. duty too much, and that 2s. 6d. is enough. I should have asked what were the opinions of other parties. And he would have told me the opinion of the trade. These negotiations are essential to settle taxes concerning commerce. What took place last night? The noble lord, the member for Liverpool, had given notice that he should move, that the duty on what is called naturalised coffee should be 6*d.*; we had consultations on the subject, and we did not accede to his proposal, and, without a single minute's notice, he altered his proposition to 7*d.*, only 1*d.* less than the duty on foreign coffee. It appears, that in the course of the debate, the noble lord (Lord Howick) went over to my noble friend, (Viscount Sandon,) and said, that he would vote for a duty of 7*d.*, but he could not vote for a duty of 6*d.* We never heard of this—the noble lord made a compromise in coffee but he would have no compromise on coals. When we determined on proposing a different duty on coal, I immediately came down to the House, and gave notice of it. The government would be subjected to nightly defeats, if members gave notice of one motion, and then confederated for the purpose of making another. All the negotiations on the coal duties were published in the Newcastle papers, all persons interested were consulted, and this is the concealment which it is said we have practised. I never made any compromise. Yesterday I was at liberty to make any proposition, and I can prove by written documents, that I did not know how my hon. friend intended to vote. I now come to the question itself. We must never lose sight of the deficiency of revenue, and we have imposed a duty on an article which we think is fairly subject to it. It is an article not capable of reproduction; one which this country possesses in greater abundance than any other. I do not say that in order to suppress foreign manufacture, the export should be checked, but that having a great natural advantage in the possession of this article, do not let us lose the opportunity of raising some revenue from it. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring) has referred to the argument I used against his 5 per cent. duties, and he makes a confident prediction that this duty will greatly prevent the export of coals. I will tell him the reasons why I think it will not. The export of coals was, in the year 1836, 916,000 tons; and in 1838, it amounted to 1,313,300 tons. This is a strong indication that the article would bear a small duty, and I doubt whether a 2*s.* and 1*s.* duty will have any effect in reducing the exports. Every town on the continent is now, or about to be, lighted with coal gas, and the English coal is peculiarly adapted for that purpose. It was Mr. Warburton's opinion (and I suppose his opinion still has some weight in the House) that it was not expedient to export coal too freely; and Dr. Buckland participates in that opinion. This coal is peculiarly adapted for foreign manufactures, for lighting with gas, and for steam navigation. It is said that foreign countries will be indignant at our levying this duty. Our position is a peculiar one; we freely furnish foreign countries with our coal, and when they have it they extract as much revenue as possible from it. I will read to the House an account of the duties they levy on coals.

THE IMPORT DUTY ON COALS INTO

	s.	d.		s.	d.
France—Mediterranean ports and to Oleron,			Other countries	11	8
French Vessels	2	6	United States	6	8
Foreign	6	5	Brazil	8	0
From Oleron to Dunkirk			Denmark	3	0
French vessels	4	0	Sweden	2	0
Foreign	8	0	Prussia	3	0
Holland	6	10	Hamburgh	1½	per cent. ad valorem
Belgium—From France	1	9	Russia		Free

I do not think then that ours is a very extravagant proposition, when it is considered that upon all exported coal foreign countries have the whole advantage, and take all the revenue. Every country feels the advantage to be so great, as not only to take the coal, but to levy a revenue on it. This is not an article of human industry, like silk—the supply is limited, and is it unreasonable that when other countries consider it a subject of revenue that we should partake in it? There may be coal mines in Belgium, but take a geological map of Germany and France, and compare the carboniferous strata of France and England. There is not a single mine in the northern and western districts of France, and in the whole superficial surface only a two-hundredth part contains strata, while in England, one-twentieth does. In the south of France there are small coal mines, and great alarm has been experienced lest they should be worked; but even if they were, I should not think it a misfortune, for in the greater part of France the supply must be derived from this country. In Nantes, where there is a very heavy import duty, the whole of the coal which is consumed comes from this country. Supposing that an import duty of 8*s.* was levied in France, I do not think that country could be jealous of our laying a 2*s.* duty on the export. I cannot see the injustice or unreasonableness of such a proposition. With respect to there being a difference in the price charged in the small coal, purchased for domestic manufactures and for export, if you go to the coal pits you are asked the purpose for which it is required, and 2*s.* a ton more is charged for that which is used for domestic purposes. I will now read to the House a letter which I have recently received on this subject from a person engaged in the coal trade. ["Name, name."] I can assure hon. gentlemen that this is a bona fide letter; but I hope I shall not be called upon to subject the party to injury by a disclosure of his name. The right hon. baronet then read a letter to the following effect:—"I this morning received your letter, and I have no objection to these facts being made known. The coal-owners of Newcastle and Durham have refused to sell me small coals, except for exportation; and a short time since certain parties refused to send me 200 tons of small coals unless they were screened before shipping, it being alleged that it was contrary to their custom to do so."

There certainly are mysteries in the coal trade which I cannot pretend to develop, there is something in its regulations which I confess I cannot understand; but, certainly, there is a general impression among the manufacturers in this country that a higher price is demanded for small coals, if intended to be used for domestic manufactures than if intended for exportation, making full allowance for the increased labour in washing and screening them. I speak of coals of the same quality. Now it seems to me that that is a rather unfair disadvantage to which our manufacturers are subject. I cannot speak positively of the effect of this proposed export duty; but I think at all events that any regulations must be defective which would subject our domestic manufacturers to disadvantage as compared with foreign manufacturers. I will not trouble the House with minute calculations at this late hour. No duty can be imposed on any article without subjecting trade to some inconvenience; but I trust that under the peculiar difficulties of the present time, seeing the great financial exertion which the House has been called upon to make, recollecting that this is a duty which is levied by every foreign country, and bearing also in mind that our proposal is supported by a large majority of the coal owners, I hope the House will sanction our amended proposal, and not compel us to forego that financial supply which we hope to derive from a moderate duty on coals—a duty which we trust will not have the effect of injuring either the shipping or the commercial interests of this country.

The committee divided on the question that the proposed words and duty stand part of the schedule:—Ayes, 200; Noes, 67; majority 133. Proposition carried. Rest of the resolutions agreed to; and the tariff finally passed through committee.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S INVENTION.

JUNE 21, 1842.

In reply to Sir Charles Napier, who wished to know what steps had been taken with regard to Captain Warner's invention,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated that he was very sorry the gallant commodore had brought forward this subject. Since the last mention of this subject three weeks ago, applications had been made by several individuals to have personal interviews with him on the subject of destructive inventions, which, they stated, were entitled to the utmost consideration on the part of the state. He did not wish to say any thing in disparagement of Captain Warner's invention, but he would give his own version of his transactions with Captain Warner. Shortly after his appointment to office, he had a private opportunity of seeing the extraordinary effects produced by Captain Warner's invention, and he signified that he was willing in the regular authorised way to have experiments made with the discovery; that he thought, however, it rested either with the Admiralty or the Board of Ordnance to judge of the invention, for that he himself was wholly incompetent to form a judgment upon it; that he must remit to the heads of those departments the charge of instituting experiments of this kind. He, therefore, wrote to Sir George Murray, the Master-general of the Ordnance, to request him to name two officers to whom no possible exception could be taken—who had the most professional knowledge and the greatest practical skill in gunnery, and every thing respecting the destruction of human life. He had also stated, that thinking it unreasonable that Captain Warner should be put to any expense in the course of conducting the experiments, he would consent that the expense should be borne by the public. He asked, then, the House, whether or not, knowing the number of similar applications that had been made, and might be made, he could have taken any better course? The two gentlemen whom Sir George Murray had appointed for the purpose of making the experiments were Sir Howard Douglas and Sir T. Hastings, and he would appeal to any person conversant with those subjects whether more suitable parties could be selected? Captain Warner had certainly suggested that Lord Hardwicke or some other gentleman should be added, but he had objected to this as quite unnecessary. He certainly had not undertaken to pay any sum of money whatever beyond the expense of the experiment; what he said was, let the experiment be made, and we can then judge of the value of it. This was not an experiment, the real value of which could be tested in a small pool of water, and under prepared and advantageous circumstances; experiments must be made on a large scale and under adverse circumstances, so as to enable us to judge what would be the effect of the invention when wind and weather were against it. For the rest, if he were to give way to all the suggestions of all the persons who thought themselves in possession of a valuable discovery, in war, in finance, in commerce, in every possible branch of art and science, there would not be a guinea at the command of the treasury for any other purpose.

WAR IN AFFGHANISTAN.

Mr. H. J. Baillie moved for "Copies of the correspondence of Sir Alexander Burnes with the Governor-general of India during his mission to Cabul in the years 1837 and 1838; also copies of the correspondence of the Governor-general of India with the President of the Board of Control, and with the secret committee of the East-India Company, from the 1st day of September, 1837, to the 1st day of October, 1839, relative to the expedition of Afghanistan."

A long debate ensued, towards the close of which—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the question upon which the House is now called upon to decide is, whether, in the present circumstances of this country, and of our relations with Afghanistan and India, it is desirable that the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved should be produced. I form my judgment on this subject solely with reference to the consideration of what is best for the public interests. I forget all party considerations, all political differences; and the single consideration which influences me is this—what in the present position of Indian affairs is the wisest course for this House to pursue? I come to the conclusion, that it will not, under present circumstances, promote the public interests to produce the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved. As an illustration of my meaning, I will direct the attention of the House to our present relations with that great power whose conduct has excited considerable apprehension—I allude to Russia. Full explanations were demanded by her Majesty's late government with regard to certain transactions on the part of Russian agents, and those explanations were frankly afforded by the government of Russia. The papers containing those explanations have been laid on the table of the House; and I may observe that, however suspicious may have been the conduct of Russian agents, and I admit that that conduct warranted some suspicion, and that it required explanation—there has been, on the part of the Russian government, a distinct disavowal of that conduct; one of the agents has been recalled, and a positive assurance has been given, on the part of the Emperor, that he has no wish to disturb British supremacy in India, and that he desires to maintain with us a good understanding with regard to the affairs of Persia. These sentiments, on the part of the Emperor of Russia, were conveyed to us by Count Nesselrode and Count Pozzo di Borgo. The noble lord opposite, in a letter, dated December 20, 1838, referring to the communications made by Count Nesselrode on the part of the Russian government said, that the despatch communicated by that nobleman expressed the desire of the Russian government to co-operate with the government of this country in reference to Persian affairs. The despatch contains the most full and complete assurance on this point; and the papers produced by the noble lord state, that her Majesty's government accept as entirely satisfactory, the declarations of the imperial government that it does not harbour any design hostile to the interests of Great Britain and Ireland. When the noble lord stated, that her Majesty's government accepted as satisfactory the declaration of the imperial cabinet, it must be inferred, that the noble lord placed confidence in that declaration. As far as I can bear testimony to the conduct of that great power, its acts have been in entire conformity with the declarations to which I have referred. No act has been done by Russia, with reference to her relations with Persia, and especially with reference to our relations with Afghanistan, since the reception of the recent disastrous accounts, which I have not every reason to believe is in strict and precise conformity with the declarations of her Majesty's government. Whatever may be the conduct of Russia, I believe that the governments of England and of India are sufficiently powerful to protect themselves. I do not think, that we are, as a nation, dependent on the co-operation and good faith of Russia or of any other power; but it is right to bear testimony to the facilities we have enjoyed in consequence of the good faith observed by Russia, and to declare publicly in the face of Europe, that it is impossible that any power could have acted with more strict good faith and more friendly feeling than have been evinced by Russia with reference to Persia and Afghanistan. A most cordial understanding subsists at this moment between the government of this country and the government of Russia. With reference to this subject, and founding my opinion on practical evidence, I will venture to say, that Russia is prepared to give proof of her good wishes, and of her desire to promote the maintenance of British supremacy in India. This being the case, can I reconcile it with the public interests to bring forward papers which might have reference to a different state of things? If there be such evidence of good faith—such proof of cordial good-will—would it be wise in us to disturb this good feeling by producing documents which might intimate the existence at a former period of a different state of things? I do not think, that in the present state of our relations with Afghanistan, the production of the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved would promote the public interests; and, looking solely and singly to public interests, I must oppose the motion. The same principle upon which I have acted with regard to the production of these papers must also regulate my course with regard to this discussion. I stand in a position very different from that of the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion. I am an actor in these scenes, charged with great responsibility, and desirous to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion; and I think, as the representative of her Majesty's government in this House, that it would not be advisable to enter fully and unreservedly into a discussion on this question. What are the circumstances under which I should address the House? We are acquainted with the misfortunes which have befallen our troops at Ghuznee, but we are uncertain as to the fate of the garrison of that fort. We are also in a state of uncertainty as to the position of our troops in Candahar. Is this then a time at which a minister of the Crown can enter into a full and unreserved statement on these subjects? I may at the same time observe, avoiding all discussion as to matters on which caution is necessary, that I cannot entirely concur with the hon. gentleman in his views of Indian affairs. Whatever Lord Castlereagh may have said in 1820—whatever may have been the embarrassments of the finances in India at former periods, which it has been able to recover, I cannot but think that the question of Indian finance is a subject of the utmost importance. Sir, I made no exaggerated statement with respect to India; I am afraid I said nothing more than is strictly borne out. I look at the last official account which has been made up, and which I believe rests on the highest authority; and I find that in 1835 the Indian government had a surplus revenue of £1,500,000, which was reduced in 1836 to £1,100,000; that was reduced to £650,000 in 1837 and 1838; to £238,000 in 1838 and 1839; and in 1839 and 1840 the change was from a surplus revenue to a deficit of £2,414,000; in 1840 and 1841 to a deficit of £2,324,000. The expense of the annual charge, including the interest of the debt, was in 1835, £15,766,000. I believe the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mangles) will find that the total charges, including the interest of the debt, in 1839 and 1840, amounted to £18,615,000, and in 1841 to £19,339,000. I am afraid that my right hon. friend will find, that that is the state of Indian finance; and, considering the importance of equalising the income with the expenditure in a state of general peace, recollecting that in India there is no Income-tax to resort to, and from what sources taxation must there be derived, how hardly it must press upon the cultivators of the soil, and what effect it must have on your hold of Indian opinion, I cannot help thinking, that Indian finance at the present time—whatever may be the case at other times—is a matter of the utmost interest. And when I see a gradual advance in expenditure from £15,700,000 to £19,300,000; and within the period of seven years a surplus of £1,500,000 converted into a deficit of £2,400,000, notwithstanding the strong views of the hon. gentleman, I still adhere to my opinion, that Indian finance is not in that satisfactory state he described. Now, with respect to the advance of our power in India, I don't understand the hon gentleman's (Mr. Baillie's) argument. He speaks of the valour and success of our forces, at the same time he leaves the policy of our advancing untouched. The right hon. gentleman refers to the policy of hanging some persons. I don't understand the application of this circumstance to the subject under discussion. From the known humanity of my noble friend, I am certain that such rigorous examples were perfectly justifiable; but the bearing of that argument, and what it has to do with the policy of our advancing across the Indus I don't see. And with respect to the tendency of the Indian empire to extend itself, I am afraid there is much truth in the observation, that between civilised nations and nations very much their inferiors, there is a great tendency in the former to extend their empire in order to give security to what they possess. But still you cannot push that argument indefinitely; you must always inquire whether the policy of any war is advisable. I presume you cannot push that argument so far as to justify the expedition against Khiva, or the occupation of Bokhara. The policy of each particular war must always rest on its own special grounds; and the policy to which the right hon. gentleman refers won't vindicate the general principle of the universal extension of our dominion. On a former occasion, I deprecated the declaration of the hon. gentleman that he would not vote a single shilling to push the war in Afghanistan. I deprecated that as too hasty a decision. On the other hand, I don't wish to pledge myself that Lord Auckland's policy must be strictly adhered to—that must have reference to the experience we acquire in the intervening period, and on the change of circumstances that have occurred. I wish to give no opinion whatever. Considering the distance we are from that country, the uncertainty we labour under as to events, it is unwise to pledge ourselves to any particular course respecting the policy to be pursued in Afghanistan. I trust, that in any course that her Majesty's government may pursue, they will not forget to insure that the honour of the British arms shall be fully maintained, and that no instances of gross treachery and perjury shall pass altogether unpunished. With respect to this disaster—I will not conceal my opinion, it is a great military disaster; but we are strong enough to repair it. It is not a disaster to shake our dominion in India. It is impossible to see the examples of valour and fortitude which this disaster has called forth, and permit ourselves to despair. Is it possible to think of the persevering valour and endurance of Sir R. Sale, and I must say, to witness the heroism of that lady of whom we have heard so much, and to think of the effect of that example, and permit ourselves for one moment to be cast down and dispirited? Our reverses are great, but they are not worse than reverses we have met with before; and I have the greatest confidence in the proved valour and fortitude of the British arms that these disasters will be so far repaired that they will not, in the slightest degree, shake the confidence of the people of England in our supremacy, in which I trust their confidence will never be shaken. As I said, I proposed to avoid the expression of any opinion; but I cannot but acquiesce in the fairness of the quotation which the hon. gentleman has made of my former statement. The right hon. gentleman, referring to my declaration on the Queen's Speech, in 1839, observed, that all I said on that occasion was, "I viewed the proceedings in India with great anxiety." I don't think any public man speaking on such a declaration—considering, of course, that subsequent events were quite unknown—ever showed more foreboding as to the consequences of the policy then pursued. I am afraid, I did not limit myself to expressions of anxiety. On this, the first intimation of the policy of Afghanistan, the words I made use of were—"He would next advert to a subject of far deeper interest, to a question which had for too long a time escaped the attention of that House—to the subject of the British empire, and the British interests in India. When they considered the immense importance of diverting the attention of the inhabitants of India from war, and of teaching them the arts of peace, and when they contemplated the evil consequences of a great financial expenditure, imposing the necessity for an additional taxation, he was bound to say, that he could not consider this question without the greatest anxiety."

That was on the policy of this war. I said, referring to part of the statement of the Governor-general, that—"The Governor-general confidently hopes that the Schah will be speedily replaced on his throne by his own subjects and adherents; and when once he shall be secured in power, and the independence and integrity of Afghanistan established, the British army will be withdrawn. Now, he should require that the fullest information should be laid before the House on this subject. Here was a sort of guarantee given by the Governor-general, that the British army would not be withdrawn until Schah Soojah-ool-Molk should be restored. That prince was deposed from his throne in 1809, and had been kept out of it ever since, though on one occasion he had endeavoured to recover his authority, at the head of an army of 20,000 men, and failed. Yet this was the prince whom the British government in India was about to restore by the aid of an immense and most expensive military force, and when restored, no doubt, another British force would be required to keep him on the throne. The principle was the same in the attempted restoration of the Schah Soojah as it would be in the attempt to restore Charles X. to the throne of France, with this difference, that the Schah had been thirty years dispossessed of his throne."

This was what I stated in 1839. I think I can hardly be charged with having expressed perfect satisfaction with the proceedings which had taken place. At least, I think that in 1839, before the events which have since occurred were known, I sufficiently showed, that I had great misgivings, not to say more, of what might be the event of the policy which was then under consideration. The right hon. gentleman says that, after giving notice of a motion on this subject, I abstained from pressing it; but I don't think that fact is quite conclusive against me, or that it justifies the right hon. gentleman in saying that I then approved of the policy of the late government in this matter. After you had decided finally on the course you would adopt—after you had determined to support Schah Soojah on the throne of Afghanistan, and after a considerable time had elapsed—and considering that this determination had been taken with respect to a policy to be pursued at a distance of so many thousand miles from this country—I think it will be apparent to every unprejudiced person that there might have been reasons for not pressing that motion which would not apply to the case of measures carrying on nearer home and under other circumstances. The right hon. gentleman says, also, that I seconded a vote of thanks from this House to Lord Keane. I certainly did second that motion; but nothing could be more distinct from approbation of the policy of the war than the terms I then used. The moment of success was not a time at which it would have been fitting to have gone into the question of that policy; but even in the moment of success I was careful not to say anything to imply our approbation of the military policy of the Indian government. Then, with respect to the present time, I quite admit that this is not the moment to make positive expressions of opinion with respect to that policy. Even now, I have not expressed a more strong opinion than I expressed then. I should think that I violated my duty as a minister of the Crown if I had not at once stated to the House that, looking to considerations of public policy, and whilst a treaty is pending, I had determined not to produce the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved. The same considerations of public policy also prevent me from entering upon the discussion of the general question, and oblige me to confine myself strictly to the limits which I have marked out.

The motion was negatived by a majority of 66.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

JULY 1, 1842.

On the Order of the Day being moved for going into Committee of Supply—Mr. Wallace moved a series of resolutions, relative to the very large amount of distress existing in the country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said:—Sir, however various may be the opinions of gentlemen on different sides of the House, with respect to the commercial policy of the country—however various their opinions respecting the measures which ought to be adopted for the purpose of mitigating the distress which all of us admit to be too extensive—still I trust no gentleman present will feel inclined to give his vote without attending to the proposal which he is called upon to sanction by the motion of the hon. member for Greenock. Let me call the attention of the House to what the proposal is. In most of the first five paragraphs of the hon. member's motion, but more especially in that portion of them which relates to the patience and fortitude with which the people have borne their sufferings, I entirely concur; but then I come to the sixth paragraph, which contains a proposal to which the assent of the House is invited, and it is a proposal to which the House must, in my opinion, for the sake of its credit and character, give close attention before it decides. It is to this effect: "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to refuse her consent to the prorogation of parliament, until a diligent and searching inquiry shall be instituted into the causes of the unprecedented distress existing at present all over the kingdom, and thereafter until her Majesty and this House shall have been assured by her ministers that effectual means are secured to provide sustenance for the unemployed and their destitute families, until their sufferings shall be terminated by a demand for their industry and wages for their labour."

Now, Sir, what a shabby way is this of evading any discussion of the difficulties of the country! I am now speaking on the 1st of July, and up to this moment no notice has ever been placed upon the books for any inquiry into the distresses of the country. Even to night such an inquiry is not asked for; the House is only asked to concur in praying her Majesty not to consent to the prorogation of parliament until a searching inquiry shall have been instituted into the causes of the distress. Sir, if any such inquiry were desirable or necessary—if the hon. member for Greenock thinks that such an inquiry could be brought to any useful or practicable result—why has he not called the attention of the House to it long before this time? But you are called upon not to be contented with merely resisting any prorogation until this diligent and searching inquiry shall have been made. In what mode is this inquiry to be made? Are you to inquire by evidence at the bar into the causes of the distress? If into such a complicated inquiry the hon. member wishes to lead you, let me ask when would it be completed? How is it to be conducted? Or are we to have a select committee? We really know nothing of what are the intentions of the hon. gentleman; he has carefully evaded all explanation on these points, and the House is literally in the dark concerning them. But, even after the diligent and searching inquiry into the causes of the distress, you are to have no prorogation! You are to have no prorogation of the parliament until her Majesty and this House have been assured by her ministers that effectual means are secured to provide sustenance for the unemployed and their destitute families,—until their sufferings shall be terminated by a renewed demand for their industry and increased wages for their labour. We are not called upon to create a demand for their industry by a revival of commerce; no, but to provide sustenance to all in distress for an indefinite period. Now, Sir, let me ask what does that mean? what is it but the motion of the hon. member for Knaresborough in another shape? It is the very same in substance, and I should like much to know who will undertake to discover the remedy; and after all, her Majesty and this House is to be contented with the assurance from the government,—"Until her Majesty and this House shall have been assured by her ministers that effectual means are secured to provide sustenance," &c.

What government could undertake to give such an assurance? The hon. member clearly means that we are to provide sustenance for the people. Again let me ask whether that is not the motion of the hon. member for Knaresborough, against which the hon. member for Greenock voted? Whatever may be the opinion of the House on the Corn-laws, I do hope it will never affirm such a proposition as to call upon her Majesty not to prorogue the parliament until a time which is left indefinite in the resolution. The hon. member has not shown that it would be either wise or prudent in the House, or consistent with its character, to encourage expectations which can never be realized; and, as I understand the hon. member for Whitehaven means to vote for the inquiry, I confess I am astonished that a gentleman of his knowledge and experience should sit in this House until this day, the 1st of July, without ever having mooted the question before, if he now thinks it of such importance. The hon. member is going to give his vote for the motion although he sat down, much to my surprise, without intimating any opinion as to the causes of the distress or suggesting any remedy. Surely a mercantile and intelligent gentleman like him is as able to see and judge of the causes and the remedy as her Majesty's government; he can form as correct a judgment upon them, and perhaps more so, than we can. Well, then, was it not surprising that he should sit down without offering one word to us or the House in the way of suggestion? [Mr. Attwood: I am not the doctor.] The hon. gentleman takes exactly my course—he is not responsible, and, therefore, he will not prescribe. I undertook the responsibility. I was called in, and her Majesty's government have taken the responsibility upon themselves, and with the utmost frankness we have proposed our remedies. All the hon. gentleman will do is to attend a consultation of doctors, but he will offer no opinion of his own. We have taken the responsibility upon ourselves, and we have proposed those measures which we thought best calculated to relieve the distresses of the country. The hon. member for Whitehaven thinks it absurd to expect any relief from a repeal of the Corn-laws; in that he is ready to give a decided opinion against the prescription offered by others. The hon. member thinks that we are wrong in relaxing the restrictions of commerce. Now, will he propose to increase the restrictions on trade? [Mr. Attwood: No.] The hon. gentleman will not alter the Corn-laws, and he is against any relaxation of the restrictions on trade, neither will he increase them; then, what are the remedies he would propose? Does the hon. gentleman consider that any commercial intercourse on the part of this country with foreign nations is desirable? I think the praise he has bestowed upon the policy of the United States clearly shows his opinion to be, that we ought to refuse to purchase from any foreign country articles which we can ourselves produce. How far will the hon. gentleman push these principles? If he pushes them to their full extent, he will annihilate all commerce. Commerce is merely the interchange of the productions of different countries, and if there be no interchange, commerce will cease to exist. It may be advisable to relax restrictions with caution; but, as I understand the principles of the hon. gentleman, he would push to its utmost extent the system of restriction on the import of all articles which we are ourselves capable of producing. That might be very well if the hon. gentleman could adopt securities against the illicit introduction of those articles; but the hon. gentleman would find that his attempt to encourage native production by a system of high duties would be defeated—he would find that the revenue would diminish, and that domestic industry would not be protected. I suppose the hon. gentleman would propose as a remedy for the existing evil, the abolition of that law which renders paper currency convertible into gold—a measure which he has advocated on former occasions. He disclaims the intention of advocating the re-issue of £1 notes, and I think it is clear, though he is not the doctor, that by exhausting his remedies he has placed himself in this dilemma. He thinks that the repeal of the Corn-laws would aggravate the prevailing distress; he considers that her Majesty's government acts with great impolicy in proposing relaxations on commerce; he does not advocate the imposition of new commercial restrictions, he is not favourable to the re-issue of £1 notes, and I apprehend, therefore, that he has no other remedy to suggest than that termed in familiar language "the little shilling;" making 9d. or 10d. pass as a shilling, and relieving those who issue paper from the obligation to convert that paper into gold or the precious metals. I do not believe the hon. gentleman has any other remedy to propose than this. Indeed, I think I have shown pretty clearly that he can have no other remedy. I am surprised, considering the loudness of his tone, that he shrinks from suggesting his remedy, and that he shelters himself under the proposal for a committee of general inquiry into the distresses of the country. Let him go into that committee, let him there meet the advocates for the repeal of the Corn-laws, and if he fights his battle for the depreciated standard, I should like to know what time will be consumed before the committee arrive at any—not to say an unanimous—conclusion for the recommendation of a practical measure. I now come to the arguments of the noble lord (Lord J. Russell), who says that he is disposed to adopt a much less hostile tone towards the government than that of the hon. member for Whitehaven—a tone of hostility for which I can hardly account, considering that the hon. gentleman has supported the financial measures of the government, and did not offer any very vehement opposition to the tariff. The noble lord says that her Majesty's government have, in his opinion, attached too much importance to the financial difficulties of the country. The noble lord thinks we ought to have treated somewhat more lightly those difficulties and embarrassments; considering, however, that a deficiency of revenue had existed for five years, and that that deficiency at length amounted to £10,000,000; it might suit the noble lord to make light of the evil, but I apprehend the country did not come to the same conclusion. The noble lord says that the people have afforded a gratifying indication of their public spirit by cheerfully acceding to the proposal of an Income-tax. But why have the people shown this cheerful acquiescence? If it be wrong to propose an Income-tax in time of peace, what stronger indication of general confidence in a government could a people evince than by submitting to such a measure against their own conscientious impressions? Why, what must the people have thought of the late government, and what must be their opinion of the present government, if—through distrust in one administration, and confidence in the other—they are ready to acquiesce, against their own opinions, in the imposition of an Income-tax in time of peace? Could a stronger manifestation be afforded of universal confidence in a government? Is it not probable that the people came to the same conclusion with her Majesty's government, that the political circumstances of the country are such, that it becomes a matter of great public importance to equalize the national revenue with the expenditure—that delay and evasion are no longer practicable, and that, grievous as an Income-tax is, unusual as is the proposal of such a measure in time of peace, objectionable as is the inquisition which it establishes, yet so convinced are the people of this country that some vigorous and decisive steps are necessary that they willingly submitted to the impost; and I can tell the noble lord that there is a very prevalent impression that, upon my first proposal of an Income-tax, it was the intention of the members of her Majesty's late government to support the measure. That impression is very prevalent. I cannot know that it is true, but it is on no light authority that I state it. What circumstances induced her Majesty's late government to change the view they entertained on my first proposal of the measure I cannot, of course, understand. As her Majesty's late government abstained from intimating any intention of opposition when I first proposed this measure, as they said they would take time to consider it, the people may have been led to believe that—if the late government, who were intimately acquainted with the financial affairs of the country, thus acted—there must be some good and conclusive reason for the proposal of a measure which was met in the first instance by such faint indications of opposition. But, looking at the general position of this country, seeing that on the north-west frontier of India we were engaged in hostilities of doubtful issue, and subjecting the East India Company to great expense—that, at the same time, we were involved in a war with China, the duration of which it was difficult to calculate—seeing that our differences with America had continued for several years, and that there was no prospect of their early adjustment—seeing that in another country, with which her Majesty's late government endeavoured to cultivate an intimate alliance, there had arisen feelings of jealousy and hostility much to be deprecated—combining, I say, these considerations, the people came to the conclusion, and in my opinion a most wise one, that it was desirable to make a great effort to equalize the revenue with the expenditure, and that in making that effort the burden should fall on the property of the country, not upon those who are chiefly occupied in its productive industry. My belief is, that it was not an extravagant degree of confidence in the government which led to the ready acquiescence in the proposal of an Income-tax, but a deep and conscientious conviction pervading the country that the time had arrived when a powerful effort must be made to put an end to the disorder in the finances. With respect to the tariff, the noble lord, by his admission, has gone far to convince me that her Majesty's government have pushed the principles on which the tariff is founded to as great an extent as is consistent with due protection to existing interests. The noble lord says, "You have reduced the duty on oil, on seeds, on ores, on timber; you have affected a great many interests; all I complain of is, that you have not carried your principles much farther." Now let us take the case of cattle. For a long period the complaint was urged, that the commercial intercourse of this country was restricted by the operation of the provision laws. It was said, "True, you admit corn under certain circumstances, but what course do you pursue with respect to cattle and meat? There is an absolute monopoly. Remove the restrictions, and the consequence will be a partial revival of commerce." Up to February, 1842, however, no government ever mentioned the article of cattle. The late government will say, no doubt, that they would have proposed an alteration with regard to cattle, for that such an alteration was consistent with their principles. I only know, however, that I never heard the restrictions on the import of foreign provisions mentioned in this House, except when charges were made against the government for not adopting some measure for their removal. I have proposed rates of duty which were scarcely objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite—namely, £1 per head on cattle, and 1*d.* per pound on meat. During the discussions on that subject, the noble lord, though he voted for my proposal, did not adopt a line of conduct calculated to smooth my course. He addressed himself, in plaintive tones, to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, telling them they had good reason to complain of the deception I had practised upon them; and his speeches had rather a tendency to aggravate the panic which existed in the country, and which might have produced most lamentable results. The noble lord complained that no notice had been given of the alteration with respect to cattle, and stated that a great panic prevailed on the subject. He said, cases had come to his knowledge in which farmers had bought cattle, had fed them, and had then been compelled to sell them for less than the sum they originally cost. This circumstance shows that the interference with such interests is not unattended with practical evils. The panics consequent on such changes are frequently productive of considerable hardships to individuals; and the farmers who, in consequence of the panic in this case, parted—perhaps not very wisely—with their cattle, had, I admit, some reason for complaint. The noble lord says that, disregarding the panic, I had the firmness to adhere to my principles; I braved opposition; and I was eventually rewarded by finding that the panic was unfounded. But the noble lord states that the reduction of duties I proposed has effected no good. Does the noble lord think the same result would follow if his proposals were applied to corn? Now, I ask the House to judge of the position of the government. One class of gentlemen declare, that only one remedy can be effectual—the repeal of the Corn-law, and that nothing else will avail. The hon. member for Whitehaven, who is practically acquainted with commerce, says that the Corn-laws do not in the slightest degree occasion the present distress; he says that commercial prosperity has coexisted with the Corn-laws, and that it would be absurd to expect any relief from their repeal; he implies an opinion that all commercial relaxations are unwise, and I should have thought his principle was this—that additional protection should be at once afforded to domestic industry; and he says that the grand remedy for the prevailing distress is to be determined by a committee of inquiry, proposed to be appointed on the 1st of July. What, I would ask, has been the practical course her Majesty's government has pursued? We have reduced the duties on corn one-half. At this moment wheat is admissible at a duty of 9s., and if the old law had been in existence the duty would, I believe, have been £1 : 3 : 8. This was a practical measure. We proposed no vague committee of inquiry, in order to devolve the responsibility from ourselves upon the committee. We proposed a practical measure in the first instance, and we reduced the duties upon foreign corn one-half. Then, in order to relieve the country from its financial difficulties, we proposed, and we staked the existence of the government on the proposal, to equalize the revenue and expenditure by a direct taxation. But did we appropriate the whole proceeds of that taxation to the payment of the public establishments? No; we proposed to apply a large portion of those proceeds to the remission of duties, in order to feed foreign commercial intercourse, and we revised, almost without exception, the whole commercial tariff of the country. It may suit the purpose of some hon. gentlemen opposite to undervalue the efficacy of these measures, but the hon. member for Montrose has not pursued that course. He has said that he thinks the tariff is a measure creditable to those by whom it was proposed, and that he believes that, on the whole, it will be attended with great benefit. But, in revising the tariff, we did not think it advisable to push to too great an extent principles which abstractedly speaking might be sound; or to create a panic, and to disturb the employment of capital, by too sudden and precipitate changes in the commercial laws of the country. My firm opinion is, that we adopted a proper course. I did not think we could be justly charged with an evasion of our duty, or with shrinking from our principles. We are blamed by some for going too far; by others for not going far enough. I ask you, however, to estimate all the difficulties with which we have had to contend, and I think any reasonable man will come to the conclusion that those difficulties have been fairly encountered, and successfully conquered. Then with respect to the Corn-laws, the motion before the House has no reference to the repeal or modification of those laws. It appears to me that any gentleman who may be desirous of a further modification of the Corn-law, or of its absolute repeal, is called upon to resist this motion for vague and indefinite inquiry. If he considers that the Corn-law ought to be repealed, it is open to him to make such a proposition; but an inquiry of this nature can only delay the accomplishment of this object. I earnestly hope no such proposition will be made, for I trust a fair trial will be given to the law which has recently been adopted; but if any hon. gentleman contemplates an alteration of that law, it is competent to him to bring forward the subject without voting for this practically delusive proposition of the hon. member for Greenock. I maintain the opinion which I have formerly expressed—I do not think that any of the proposals I have heard with respect to the Corn-laws would have the effect of mitigating the distress under which the country is labouring. I conceive, indeed, that by too precipitate a change of such a nature, you would involve the agricultural population in distress, and thus add immeasurably to that suffering which already prevails to a lamentable extent among the commercial classes. I find that the commercial prosperity of this country has been co-existent with the laws restraining the import of corn. I learn, on the authority of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, that up to 1837, and for several years preceding, the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country had been in a state of unexampled prosperity, and yet that prosperity was co-existent with laws which prohibited the free import of corn. I know the answer to this will be, that during four years preceding 1837, the price of provisions in this country was unusually low, and that the lowness of price had the effect you anticipate from the import of foreign corn. But during those four years no foreign corn was imported, and consequently you had no demand for the manufacturing produce of this country in consequence of such importation. Your prosperity could not, therefore, be dependent on that commercial intercourse which depends on the import of foreign corn. But is the importation of foreign corn, and the consequent reduction of the price of food, necessary to enable you to compete with the foreign manufacturers? What said the hon. member for Stockport? He said it was as absurd to demand protection for the cotton manufactures of England, as it would be to demand protection for the coal trade at Newcastle; that is to say, that notwithstanding the comparatively high price of food in this country, we have still contrived to outstrip all our competitors in the production of cotton. I cannot deny the distress that prevails in many parts of the country—that it is most grievous in many districts where there are many cotton manufactories, and that it is severe in other districts. It is said that a great portion of the mills in this country have stopped working; that must be true, of course, with respect to some districts of the country; yet still it is a remarkable thing (I am not citing this paper for the purpose of denying the distress which prevails, the indications of which are too manifest), when we hear of this universal distress in a manufacturing district and the immense extent to which the closing of mills has taken place, that the quantity of cotton taken out for home manufacture, as compared with last year, has not diminished. I have got from Liverpool an account up to the 24th of June of the quantity of cotton taken out for manufacture, and also of the quantity taken out during the same period last year. For the first six months of 1841 there were 464,500 bales of cotton taken out of the warehouses for consumption. Now, I certainly did expect to find, from the statements that were made of the extent to which industry has been paralysed in the present year, as compared with the last, a diminution in the quantity of cotton taken out for manufacturing purposes. But that is not the case. The quantity of cotton taken out in 1841, for the first six months, was 464,500 bales; and the quantity taken out for consumption up to the 24th of June, 1842, was 538,000 bales. So that, notwithstanding the distress and the closing of the mills, yet still the total quantity of cotton taken out for consumption in the first six months of 1842 exceeds that taken out in the first six months of 1841; and I doubt if it is not almost equal to that taken out in the first six months in any preceding year, with one or two exceptions. I know that this is no proof that profits are not greatly diminished, and that distress does not prevail; but still it is a remarkable thing, that during the prevalence of that distress the quantity of cotton taken out has not diminished, but has increased as compared with last year. Sir, I take, in one respect, a more desponding view of the position of this country than hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I firmly believe that, if you repeal the Corn-laws, and this should produce the effect which you anticipate, that this would not give you a guarantee against the recurrence of severe distress in certain districts of the country. It is my belief, I say, that giving you the repeal of the Corn-laws, and giving you the consequences you anticipate, yet such is the condition of the manufactures (and particularly in this country), I am afraid you must look forward to, occasionally, severe local distress. At this moment, when distress is so severe in some parts of the country, there are new mills in the course of erection. [Hear, hear.] That is a fact. The command of capital induces men, even during periods of severe distress, to construct new mills, and to fill them with new machinery. Now, what must be the consequence of this? Must there not always be in some localities men of small capital, and with imperfect machinery, yet still employing large masses of the population, who would find it difficult to enter into competition with those who could command capital and apply it to the construction of the best machinery, and that ultimately labour would be thrown out of employment? To resist the progress of these improvements is impossible; and though there might be a demand for cotton manufactures, yet there might be simultaneously with that demand the existence of severe distress on account of the sudden application of new machinery to meet that demand. Sir, I won't dwell on this. I could prove it to be the case, and could show that the immediate consequence of the improvement of machinery and the application of capital to the construction of it, had been productive in certain parts of the country of extraordinary results—that the tendency of it was to drive out of employment adult male labour, and to substitute for it the labour of females and children; and the infallible consequence is, that the man of twenty-five or thirty years of age, who up to that period of life has been employed in a cotton manufactory, finds it difficult to turn his hand to any other employment. Now, you must not make the Corn-laws responsible for evils of that kind. It is no impeachment of the invention—the invention may increase on the whole the demand for labour, and may call into employment the mechanism and industry of other nations; the commercial prosperity may be great, yet in certain districts of the country, from which it is difficult to transfer a married man and his large family, the progress of these improvements may produce great distress, even in times when there is a great demand for labour; and in this state of things, even with an increased demand for your manufactures, I could not anticipate that absence of distress and suffering on which some hon. gentlemen calculate. You apply opprobrious terms to our measures for alleviating the distress. You talk of “begging boxes,” and say that such things ought not to satisfy the people. I admit that it is a much less satisfactory mode of alleviating the existing distress than providing employment, in every respect. In a social point of view, I admit that it is less satisfactory to the honest feelings of those who derive a miserable subsistence from charity, than a demand for labour to enable them, by the sweat of their brows, to gain an honest livelihood. But when the pressure comes, can any one say that even this unsatisfactory mode of relief ought not to be resorted to. And is it wise to disparage such modes of relief, and to discourage such contributions, when you yourselves must feel that no improvement—according to your views—in your own commercial system could provide immediate relief? I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) say that the contributions to the Anti-Corn-law League were a more legitimate application of money. Why, even grant that the permanent effects may be so, yet still I do hope the hon. gentleman and those who act with him—particularly after the admissions of to-night, that years must elapse before permanent relief can be afforded—will consider the length and extent of the temporary evil; and, if nothing but temporary remedies are applied, that they will not discourage the charitable contributions of those disposed by their liberality to administer this temporary—I admit, this unsatisfactory relief. Sir, I do give credit to the patience, the high spirit, and the forbearance, with which the people of this country have borne their distress—I do believe that, if left to themselves, they would continue to manifest that patience; and I think them entitled to a higher degree of credit in consequence of the persevering efforts that are made to inflame their minds, and provoke them into disobedience. There are men, it is perfectly true, in those parts of the country, I have conclusive proofs of it, where there is a disposition to patient submission under distress—there are wicked men who are attempting to inflame the minds of the people by the exaggeration of their sufferings and privations. Now, it is quite right for us, as legislators, to be dissatisfied with temporary remedies; it is quite right for us to look for the permanent reduction of these evils; but let us forbear from making these statements; it will not answer any good purpose; it will not be for the interests of the people themselves; it will not be for the interests of society, in times of severe suffering and distress, to goad those who are the sufferers into disobedience of the law, which must be repressed. Sir, I can only think those entitled to still higher admiration who, in despite of such provocation, continue to submit to the law, and to manifest contentment and gratitude for those imperfect modes of relief which are obliged to be substituted for more satisfactory and permanent ones. While, on the one hand, this increases our admiration for their forbearance and submission, at the same time it does on the other provoke our indignation against those who are attempting by violence of language to drive them into courses which must necessarily end, for the preservation of the best interests of society and of their own interests, in leaving to the government no other alternative than the firm repression of disobedience to the law and the maintenance of the peace of the country against every effort to disturb it.

Debate adjourned.

LORD AUCKLAND.

JULY 11, 1842.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, in rising to move the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply, I wish to notice a statement made by a noble lord opposite (Viscount Palmerston) on the last night, or the last night but one, when the House met. That statement was made with reference to the policy pursued by the late government as to the war in Afghanistan. The noble lord stated, that her Majesty's present government had suggested that Lord Auckland should remain as Governor-general of India, and that application had been made to him by her Majesty's government for that purpose. Thence the noble lord had inferred that there was an approval on the part of her Majesty's government of the policy that had been pursued in India. Now, I must decidedly protest against any such inference. In the first place, I should say, that if her Majesty's government had been disposed to avail themselves of the services of Lord Auckland in India, it was not thence to be inferred that, therefore, they consented to make themselves a party to his policy. There must be every disposition on the part of a government, (whatever difference, in point of political feeling might exist on various subjects,) considering that Lord Auckland had for four years devoted the whole of his time and attention to the duties of his office, to avoid doing anything which might imply a reflection on the person intrusted with the discharge of such important duties. It was natural and generous to abstain from any act that might imply an unfavourable opinion, and might render still greater the difficulties of the situation in which he was placed. I am sorry that the noble lord should have rested his information on a private letter addressed from one gentleman to another; and, as I understand the matter, the communication was conveyed in a private letter from Lord Ellenborough to Lord Auckland. I must confess I am surprised at the noble lord's information, even if the impression it tended to excite were correct. I must say I heard with surprise the noble lord's statement; I was, however, at the time unwilling to make any reference to it, for I did not expect the introduction of the question of the policy of the war in Afghanistan on the third night of the debate on the resolutions of the hon. member for Greenock; and I certainly am desirous, in a matter which at all affects the conduct and character of a Governor-general of India who was about to return to this country—I am desirous to collect the best information as to the facts of the case before I offer any contradiction to the statement of the noble lord. I certainly do not recollect having been a party to any proposal such as that to which the noble lord had on a former evening referred; yet, at the same time, as the noble lord had said that the communication was conveyed in a private letter from Lord Ellenborough to Lord Auckland, it is impossible for me to offer any contradiction. As to the letter, however, I can find no such public letter; and certainly I could add, no such proposition as that which has been referred to had been made with the knowledge and sanction of the government; but I knew the high opinion which was entertained by Lord Ellenborough of Lord Auckland—I knew that opinion was of the most generous kind, and in proof of this I need only refer to the expressions used by Lord Ellenborough at a dinner given to him on the eve of his departure for India by the directors of the East India Company, on the 3rd of November last. On that occasion my noble friend spoke of Lord Auckland in these generous terms:—"He felt also that he was about to succeed a man who, in the office of Governor-general had, he rejoiced to have this opportunity of declaring, exhibited great practical ability in the administration of affairs. In fact, it was a source of great personal as well as public satisfaction to him, united as he had been with the Earl of Auckland in former times by ties of the closest friendship, to observe the indefatigable industry, the great ability, and the extensive knowledge he had brought to the investigation, elucidation, and management, of all the great questions which had come before his government."

That was the public testimony, the generous testimony, of one political opponent to another. I have referred to my own communications with the Board of Directors on the subject of Lord Auckland. I shall not undertake to answer for any communication which might have been made from Lord Ellenborough to Lord Auckland in the same generous spirit, but these are the facts of the case as far as I can ascertain them. Immediately on accepting office I made inquiry with regard to the appointment of the Governor-general of India, and I received from the East India Board the following intimation:—

(MINUTE BY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.)

"A request from the honourable court is conveyed to me by this despatch, that I would not in the ensuing spring resign the high office which I have the honour of holding in India; and to a wish to this effect, expressed in this quarter, in terms and in substance so honourable to me, I can, under present circumstances, make but the one answer—that I will not abruptly throw up the trust which has been confided to me, or appear hastily and unduly to shrink from any important responsibility of which it may be supposed that I should be able more easily to acquit myself than could be expected from any one new to the cares and duties of the Indian administration.

"I readily, therefore, consent to postpone any immediate decision upon the time when I may return to England, and it may be assumed that for the next year I shall serve in India, giving in the course of the year such timely notice of my wishes and intentions as public and private considerations may seem to me to require."

The consequence was that Lord Auckland remained in India, and that he did so at the specific request of the Board of Control and of the Board of East India Directors; and the present government found him remaining in India at the express wish of the public authorities in this country. On the 1st of September I found a letter from Lord Auckland. I had made inquiry as to Lord Auckland's intentions, and if I had found that that noble lord had entertained a wish to retain the government of India longer, I never would have advised the Crown suddenly and peremptorily to recall Lord Auckland, and I should have abstained from the exercise of power, retaining, of course, my own opinions. But I must fairly avow it, that if it had been intimated to me that in compliance with the public wish at home Lord Auckland's personal convenience should be consulted, and that he intended to remain in India, I should have thought it an act of gross injustice to that noble lord if I had advised the Crown to dismiss him. The 1st of September was the date when Lord Auckland's intimations were known. The next letter which I found was dated the 7th of April, in answer to my inquiry whether or not Lord Auckland's intentions were known. All was conceived in a friendly spirit, and without the slightest intention of impugning the conduct of Lord Auckland. Lord Auckland wrote Lord Ellenborough a private letter, and intimated that he was desirous to leave India in the June following, at the same time expressing his desire not to leave any great measures unfinished; that he had no objection whatever to the appointment, but the court could not wish him to go for the purpose of taking the government, unless they knew that Lord Auckland had privately fixed the time of his departure. Now the appointment of the Governor-general, it was well known, was with the Court of Directors, with an understanding with the government. There was no objection on the part of Lord Auckland, be it observed, to the appointment of a successor, but the court did not wish this till Lord Auckland should have positively fixed the time of his departure. Then, on the 24th of September, Lord Ellenborough wrote to me in these terms:—

"The chairman read to me to-day a letter received from Lord Auckland's brother, of a tone similar to that of the letter you received from him. I conclude that the next mail will bring his formal resignation. His successor ought to leave England on the 4th of December, in order to be able to communicate with him fully before he leaves India, as it is of the highest importance that this communication should take place. Facts and opinions may, perhaps, be gathered from the records, but without personal communication with Lord Auckland his successor will know little of the men by whom his measures are to be executed.

"ELLENBOROUGH."

And on the 8th of October I proposed, having accepted office on the 1st of September, that Lord Auckland should remain in India until his successor should arrive—Lord Ellenborough having accepted the government of India. These, then, are the facts of the case. Lord Ellenborough might have written a letter to Lord Auckland in terms similar to those which have been publicly avowed. He might have pressed upon Lord Auckland the policy of remaining until his successor should arrive: but it could not be deduced from that fact that Lord Auckland was to remain permanently the Governor-general. I now pass from this subject, and before I move the Order of the Day, I must express what is the position of the government in respect to the votes of supply, the miscellaneous and other estimates, and for the China service. The House must see the necessity of these votes being agreed to as soon as possible. I stated to the House that the time was fast approaching, when considerable inconvenience must arise to the public service unless the House were pleased to assent to them. It was then said that the government ought, at an earlier period, to have called attention to the votes of supply. In answer to that charge, I must remind the House how the time has been occupied by her Majesty's government in respect to measures relating to the financial and commercial position of the country. We have sat eighteen weeks; two days a week only were at the disposal of the government for part of that time; but through the indulgence of the House, Tuesdays were given up to the government. I believe that if every day had been taken when her Majesty's government had precedence, there would have been fifty-four days. With the general concurrence of the House, I placed upon every day's paper the three measures of the Corn-law, the Income-tax, and the Tariff. The House was occupied on the Corn-law sixteen days, on the Property-tax seventeen days, on the Tariff fourteen days, making together forty-seven days; and I am sure the House must have felt the necessity of not interposing other measures until those had passed. The tariff was at length happily concluded, and came into operation on Saturday last, and I hope the returns of the Custom-house will show that that measure has had a favourable effect, if it were only by removing a suspense which has operated most disadvantageously for trade. We now have to vote, with the sanction of the House, the miscellaneous and China estimates, which are very pressing. There will be a vote for the service of the East India Company for the expenditure in China, which is of urgent importance to the government of India. Besides meeting the extraordinary expenses on account of the war in Afghanistan, we have had to advance largely, on account of the Chinese loan opened in India not having turned out so productively as was expected. A communication has been made to the Court of Directors to render relief by their home treasury, and a communication has been made to the Treasury, and the understanding is, that a sum of £800,000 shall be advanced in payment of sums formerly advanced in China; that the government of India might suspend their advances on hypothecated goods, provided they should abstain from drawing on the treasury of India for six months, and making an engagement to meet the China expenditure. The first vote to be taken will be for China, and great inconvenience will arise to the East India Company and the public service from any delay in fulfilling the engagements which have been made. With respect to the miscellaneous estimates, I can only state, as might be expected, that this is an additional grant, the vote being made from the 31st of March, one year, to the 31st of March the next year, whilst I am addressing the House now on the 11th of July. We have abstained from applying for these votes, but I think it my duty to state to the House, that many of these votes are exhausted, as in the case of the vote for criminal prosecutions in Ireland. The government had no alternative but making advances, and, as might have been expected, we have postponed payment as long as we could. Great public inconvenience must necessarily arise from any further delay, for which I cannot be charged, and shall not hold myself responsible; and I therefore hope, that the House will not, through any courtesy to the government, but for the sake of the public interest—I hope, I repeat, that the House will not sanction any unnecessary delay, which will have the effect of impeding the public business.

Lord Palmerston having replied,—

Sir R. Peel said, the noble lord had read a passage of a letter from Lord Ellenborough, in which it was stated that no appointment that could be made could convey the slightest reflection or imputation on Lord Auckland. Lord Auckland, it must be observed, had been asked to stay a year after May, 1840. And what was his answer?—"I will readily, therefore, consent to postpone any immediate decision upon the time when I may return to England, for it may be assumed that for the next year I shall serve in India, giving in the course of the year such timely notice of my wishes and intentions as public and private considerations may seem to require."

Well, on the 7th of September last, it having become time that some step should be taken in the matter, the government of India was asked, what was to be done? What was the answer of the President of the Board of Control?—"There is no objection to naming a successor, but the court would not wish him to go for the purpose of taking the government until they know that Lord Auckland has positively fixed the time of his departure."

He need not state to the House that he was not withholding any other communications than those he had read. He had read every thing bearing on the point in his possession, and he could, therefore, only say again—of course not undertaking to answer for what private communication a man of generous feeling like Lord Ellenborough might have addressed to Lord Auckland,—that the House would see he could by no possibility have been a party to any such communication.

After a short conversation the subject dropped.

REPEAL OF THE CORN-LAWS.

JULY 11, 1842.

On the question that the Order of the Day for a Committee of Supply be read—
Mr. Villiers moved as an amendment, "That, previously to granting any supply, this House should go into Committee, to take into consideration the present Corn-law, with a view to its total repeal."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I am grateful to the hon. and gallant officer (Sir C. Napier) for the expression of opinions so congenial to my own feelings, and so conducive to my health. I am glad to hear it admitted by the hon. and gallant gentleman, that the question of the Corn-laws has been fully discussed, and that it is unfair as well as unjust to adopt such a mode of stopping the supplies. I am also glad to hear the hon. and gallant gentleman add that upon which I would not venture; namely, that such discussions are an unwarrantable waste of the public time. [Sir C. Napier: I only expressed my own opinion.] That may be the case, but in justice to the other side of the House, I am bound to say that in that opinion he does not stand alone. It is argued that the present Corn-laws are as objectionable as the preceding; and the hon. member for Ashton stated, that under the old system corn was withheld until August and September, when the foreign growers would introduce it in consequence of the duty falling to 1s. The hon. gentleman said that the same objection applies to the present law, and added that if I could show him that the present law was more favourable to the consumer than the former one, I was entitled to some credit for having made the change. Gentlemen on the other side have, however, though I will not say intentionally, adopted a course which in effect prevents my measure from having a fair trial; for whilst any hope exists that parliament will be induced to alter the law, and that corn might be admitted into this country on more favourable terms, the measure can have no fair trial, for the grain will be held back. I have quoted, on a former occasion, an instance, to show that under the existing law corn had come in, not certainly in the quantity I wished, but to a greater extent than under the preceding law. The period to which I alluded was the 23rd of June, when there came in of foreign corn 27,500 quarters, and of colonial corn 6,000 quarters, making in all 33,500 quarters. The hon. member for Liskeard said, that I happened to light on a lucky week, but in answer, I stated, that I took the last week in the returns. I now, however, shall quote the returns of a week later, to show that the results are not so unsatisfactory as some hon. gentlemen would have them believed to be. Notwithstanding the expectation which had been held out respecting an alteration in the state of the law, it appears by the return for the 30th of June, that, for home consumption, there had been brought in from the colonies 5,002 quarters at 1s. duty, and of foreign corn 48,112 quarters. The whole of the corn for home consumption amounted then to upwards of 53,000 quarters. This, then, shows the satisfactory working of the law; and, in addition to this, I am informed that the harvest has already commenced in some parts of the country. The consequence is, a fall of 2s. in Mark-lane, and in other parts of the country there is a similar tendency to a decline of price. This occurred notwithstanding the expected alteration in the law, from which arises a disposition on the part of the holders of corn to keep it back. I repeat, then, that if, under the existing impression that the law is to be altered, such circumstances have occurred, those who hold back with such an impression labour under a great error, and are likely to incur a considerable loss. If they believed that the price would rise till corn would be admissible at a duty of 1s., my belief is, that these parties would have committed a great error, and incurred large loss. It would evidently be most unwise to proceed to condemn the law after an experience of seven weeks; but, even judging from the experience of seven weeks, if you choose to form a judgment from so short an interval as to the effect of a new act of parliament, I think marked symptoms of improvement are perceptible within the two last weeks. Notices of importation under the existing law from very remote parts of the continent, and the prices given at which that wheat can be imported, combine to show that the unfavourable conclusions drawn with respect to the operation of the existing law are not founded on any experience from which you can draw a safe inference. Considering the motion which was made by the hon. member for Aberdeen, the motion which has been made to-night, and the motion of which the noble lord had given notice, I think you may fairly infer, if the law has not operated so rapidly or so favourably as might have been expected, that a part, if not the whole of that unfavourable operation, is to be ascribed to the expectations which these notices have created in the minds of the dealers that the present arrangement would be disturbed. Nothing shall tempt me to extenuate the facts attested by the reports received from various parts of the country as to the existing distress. It is impossible for me to allude to it without expressing the deepest regret at its existence, and the sincerest sympathy with those who are its unfortunate victims. I say at once, that if I could believe that a material alteration of the Corn-law would produce any permanent relief, not only I, but I am sure those who are, like myself, immediately connected with the land, if they were convinced that the Corn-laws were the main cause of the distress, and that their repeal would give substantial and enduring relief, would instantly relax our determination to maintain them. I am afraid that the measures of commercial reform which government have felt it their duty to propose have had a tendency to increase the stagnation of trade now so severely felt. I think, that even the reduction of the duties on articles in respect to which no difference of opinion prevailed—I am not now speaking of corn or sugar, but of raw materials, on which a reduction took place with satisfaction to the great majority of this House—I say, I believe that in these, as in many other instances, the attempt to effect admitted reforms is accompanied with present, although I trust, only temporary pressure. I think this view is confirmed by a reference to the revenue returns for the last quarter, from which it appears, that on several articles of the Customs there had been a falling-off, and on others an increase. It may be interesting to observe the articles on which there has been an increase of revenue, which is a test of increased consumption, and those in which there has been a decrease, a test of diminished consumption. There has been a decrease in the article of wine. We are now engaged in negotiating commercial treaties on that subject, and I beg to say, we have this day received accounts which inform us, that we have succeeded in carrying into complete effect the intention of the noble lord and the government which preceded us with respect to a commercial treaty with Portugal. This day we have received word that that treaty has been signed, and negotiations have been set on foot for our amended tariff, of which I will only say, that they are proceeding in a satisfactory train. But one effect of this negotiation, and of the prospect of a diminution of duty on wines imported from Portugal, as well as of the impression which was probably anticipated on the government and people of Spain, who might be supposed to be awakened to the policy of entering on negotiations with this country, has necessarily been to paralyze the retail trade and lead to a diminished demand for wine, and the holding back of the stock on hand. I believe it will be more reasonable to attribute the diminution of duty to the doubt caused by pending negotiations, rather than to any diminished power of consumption; but the consequence has been a falling-off in the duty on wine of £108,000. The next article in respect to which a great falling-off of duty has occurred is that of timber. The announcement of an intention to reduce the duties on Baltic timber, and entirely to abolish the duty on Canada timber, has necessarily produced, as was inevitable, some stagnation in the trade. The hon. gentleman opposite reproaches me with not having made the reduction of duty immediately. In all those matters it is of great importance not to press too heavily on existing interests. We determined not to allow any drawback on account of timber imported at the old duties. Urgent remonstrances were made to us as to the individual suffering, the ruin almost, which would be inflicted by any hasty and precipitate reductions of the duties on timber by a given day; and in consideration of those remonstrances we considered it right to postpone the application of the new duty, rather than return to the bad and objectionable system of drawback. But, while endeavouring to do justice to individuals, we have occasionally improved the productiveness of the revenue to some extent. It was doubted at the time, whether it would not have been wiser to make an immediate reduction; but I think I may appeal to those who were in favour of the general policy of the measure, and even to the hon. member for Lambeth himself, whether severe distress would not have arisen from an immediate reduction. One of the most effectual means of removing the obstacles which impede the progress of sound and salutary reform is, to prove to the country that you can effect them without ruin to individuals; you will thus make it much more solid and enduring. In the present case, the effect which I have noticed has no doubt occurred at a most unfortunate season of stagnation in trade, and the loss of revenue on the article up to the 5th of July has been £113,000, and the next articles on which a loss has occurred are those of brandy and rum. Here the effects of the uncertainty prevailing as to wine have been felt, and there has been a loss of £31,000. Let us now look at the chief articles on which there has been an increase, and we shall find they have been articles in no way affected by our commercial reforms. Upon sugar, on which we avowed our intentions, on which a reduction of duty in the course of the present session was not expected, there has been an increase in the revenue for the last quarter to the amount of £113,000. On molasses there has been an increase of £34,000. On cotton-wool, the duty on which I expressed great regret that I could hold out no hopes of being able to reduce, there has been an increase of £96,989. On tea, another article with respect to which we expressed our intention to make no change, there has been an increase of £16,718. Comparing the articles on which there has been a reduction with those on which there has been an increase, I own I am afraid that to the tariff itself is partly attributable an increase of the depression now so much to be deplored. After the declaration I have already made with respect to the necessity of votes of money for the public service, of course, this is not a time to enter into a prolonged discussion on this subject. I have already, at a former period of the session, stated my general views on the financial and commercial policy of the country. I was charged the other night by the hon. member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) with having attributed a portion of the distress under which the country is now labouring to the effect which the rapid introduction of improvements in machinery produces among the labouring classes. I thought I had done all I could to guard myself against being supposed to hold the opinion, either that you can impede the progress of mechanical invention; or, that if you could throw impediments in its way—looking at the general, enlarged, and permanent interests of the country—it would be politic to take any such measure; but at the same time, Sir, I am quite at liberty, if I entertain an opinion regarding the partial and local operation of improvements of that description, to speak the truth. I stated my opinion that the rapid application of improvements in machinery has a tendency, in certain parts of the country where there is less capital and where the machinery is less improved, to throw men out of employment, and consequently to produce distress. Take what course you will on the Corn-laws, the hope that a country so artificial as this, the seat of manufactures so extensive, can be exempted from partial suffering is, I fear, visionary. The hon. gentleman said, that the report made by the assistant Poor-law commissioners who went to Stockport was highly creditable, that their opinions were most just. I am not much disposed to quote the opinion of Poor-law commissioners on a subject of that nature, however high their character, however satisfactory the mode in which their duties are discharged; but these gentlemen took the evidence of all the principal manufacturers and residents in Stockport who were capable of giving them an opinion, and if the hon. gentleman wishes for the evidence of his townsmen, I think he will see I am, at least, fortified by high practical authority in stating, that the immediate effect of the rapid introduction of machinery must be to cause partial distress. I will quote no evidence but what is of high authority and given by persons from Stockport itself. Mr. Lawton, one of the relieving officers of the union, is asked—

“Have the working classes been in distress at Stockport during the whole time of your service, or when did that distress appear to begin, and what has been its progress up to the present time?” He states—“There was no great pressure in the number of applications for relief before the year 1838, excepting under such casual circumstances as the break-down of a mill, or the turn-out of the hands, which have occasionally occurred. About the end of 1838, the applications became more frequent. At that time several of the manufacturers began to introduce improved machinery into their mills, which enabled them to reduce the number of hands. In some cases one man would be enabled to do the work of two by what is called coupling the frames. There has been a gradual increase of distress since that year, a number of factories having stopped work altogether, and others having worked short time. About the commencement of the last quarter, which ended the 25th of December, 1841, the applications increased in a great degree, in consequence of the stoppage of Messrs. Lanes' and Messrs Carrs' mills, and a large proportion of those now upon our books were thrown out of work at that time."

The great majority of the witnesses attribute a considerable portion of the evil to the operation of the Corn-laws, but I am now showing that the great majority do admit also that the sudden application of capital to improve machinery must ever have a tendency to produce a diminution of manual labour. The hon. member says—"Do not countenance the vulgar prejudices entertained by the workmen." I do not want to countenance them; I wish to state the truth as to the matters in question; and when the hon. member deals in such lavish abuse of those who hold different views from his, he must allow us, even at the risk of being unfairly charged with countenancing vulgar prejudices, to state the truth, when we are considering this important question, whether the Corn-laws can be assigned as the chief and only cause of the existing distress, and whether their repeal is likely to prove a permanent remedy. I am referring here not to the opinions of speculative writers on the subject, but to the opinions of gentlemen who are his constituents and townsmen, recorded in a report, which he says is entitled to the highest credit. Mr. R. M'Lure in his examination is asked—

"Has there been any reduction in the rate of wages paid in the spinning and weaving mills?" He states—"Within the last two years there has been a reduction very generally; there is no exception to that; if one does it, another must. In the spinning department we have since December, 1839, reduced the wages of labour from 2s. 11d. per 1,000 hanks to 2s. 1d., which has been wholly unconnected with any change in the machinery, or any increase or decrease of production. I have reason to believe that that is about the rate of reduction in the spinning department throughout the town; that is, about 30 per cent. The card-room hands and the throstle-room hands have been reduced about 7½ per cent.; that is also since December, 1839. The weavers' wages have been reduced about 9 or 10 per cent. The other hands connected with the weavers have been reduced in about the same proportion. I believe that the rate of reduction in these departments also has been the same throughout the town."

"What has led to the larger rate of reduction in the spinning department?—Principally the introduction of the self-acting mule, which has been introduced into many of the mills in Stockport and the neighbourhood. We have had self-acting mules in our mill in Heaton Norris since 1834, and have been continually improving our machinery to the present time, by which means we are doing with fewer hands by 100 for the whole mill for the same quantity of work than in 1836, when the mill was first filled with machinery."

Well, but the hon. gentleman said, improvements were very slow in their progress, and that it was almost impossible to get any body to introduce the better machinery; that patents were taken out of which no one would avail himself. The witness whose evidence I have quoted states that they can now get the same quantity of work done by 100 hands less than in 1836, in consequence of the machinery which has been introduced. I do not say that it would be wise in government to check the extension of machinery. I do not say that this is not the instrument which will enable us most effectually to sustain the competition of foreigners. I do not say that ultimately and permanently there will not be a vast increase of strength from machinery. I am countenancing no vulgar prejudices, but when in 1841 I see that the same quantity of work can be done in one mill by 100 hands less than in 1836, I cannot help still retaining my opinion that improvements in machinery must have an immediate and local effect, and it is unjust to make such charges against me when I am only with fairness, and I trust with temper, stating the causes which must be sought for to account for the distress. The third witness I shall quote is Mr. Cruttenden, the partner in a well-known firm at Stockport, selected, I presume, as being the most intelligent and enlightened. His evidence is as follows:—

"Are you of opinion that there has been any falling-off in the home consumption of manufactures in this country?—I have no reason to believe there has,

if you look to the whole of Great Britain and Ireland. We manufacture entirely for the home trade; and we have not produced as much as we used to do, because the present rate of prices does not remunerate us. By working short time we lost about three months in 1840, and more than three months in 1841. But then during the last few years the number of producers has very much increased, and I believe that there has been quite as much cotton actually consumed in the home market as ever. It must be remembered, as I stated before, that there has been an immense increase in production. Owing to the improvements in machinery a much greater amount of goods can be manufactured in a certain period of time than formerly. By working full time, we ourselves could manufacture nearly twenty miles of calico a day; and when you consider the immense amount of steam power employed in the cotton manufacture, this will give you some idea of the powers of production which are daily in operation, and which must have a tendency to reduce prices."

"Do you think that the laws affecting trade have contributed in any degree to cause the distress at present existing in Stockport, or in other manufacturing districts?—I do not think they have had much to do with it. I am aware some persons suppose that the Corn-laws have been the cause of our present distress. I believe that the distress has arisen in a far greater degree from the immense increase in the amount of capital which has been employed in the cotton trade, and the consequent unnatural increase in the production of manufactured goods."

I shall trouble the House with but one more short passage from the evidence of Mr. Forster, the chairman of the board of guardians, I believe a most respectable person, who formed one of a deputation with which I had an interview on Saturday morning, and who fills the situation he now holds solely from a sense of public duty. He says,

"What has induced the guardians to adopt so strict a practice in reference to removals?—We think it, in the long run, for the interest of the town, to remove all those who are burdensome, and do not belong to us, notwithstanding the expense which attends their removal. The great improvements which have recently been made in the machinery of factories have reduced the demand for labour; and the present prospects of trade are such, that there is little probability of the hands now idle getting into employment within a moderate period of time. We have to consider many conflicting interests on this point; it is the apparent interest of the manufacturers and shopkeepers to retain the population here; but, on the other hand, our own settled labouring population may be benefited by reducing the supply of hands under these adverse circumstances; and what weighs with us mainly is, that the rate-payers ought to be relieved, by such means as the law affords, from the burden of maintaining those who are no longer useful to the town."

The hon. gentleman spoke of £30,000 having been applied to the erection of new machinery. Now, suppose some temporary cause—the fire at Hamburgh, for instance—creates an unusual demand for some description of goods. A person having the command of such an immense mechanical power is enabled to supply the demand, and the advantage of machinery is, that we can defeat foreign competition in any market where there is an extraordinary demand. Compare the effect produced by this machinery with the condition of countries in which there is less machinery and capital, and do not tell me that there may not be very severe distress in certain localities co-existing with general manufacturing prosperity. That was all I said on a former night, that opinion I decidedly retain, and I fear that in this country, even when trade is prosperous, we must still expect that there may be in some districts a great amount of suffering. The hon. gentleman the member for Oldham asked me to pay attention to his observations. I did pay the utmost attention I could, but I think most hon. members must have observed, that it is not very easy to catch what falls from the hon. member. The hon. gentleman said, that in 1815 the handloom weaver received 27s. a week, the price of corn then being 63s. 9d.; that in 1824 the price of corn was 62s., and the wages of the handloom weaver had fallen to 13s. 6d.; in 1833 the price of corn was 53s., and the wages had been reduced to 8s. a week, and in 1842 they were reduced to 3s. a week. Now, I cannot conceive that any operation of the Corn-laws can be the main cause of this extraordinary fall. There must be some other cause. Whatever may be the effect of machinery or competition in producing this depression of wages I know not, but when I compare the price of corn in 1815 with its present price, and when I look at the vast quantity of cotton imported, manufactured, and exported, and retained for home consumption, — when I consider the marvellous increase which has taken place in the purchase of the raw material, and in manufactured goods, and when at the same time I look at the rapid decrease of wages, as stated by the hon. gentleman, at the time when manufactures have been increasing in a most extraordinary way, I cannot, I repeat, attribute this diminution of wages mainly to the operation of the Corn-laws. Here is an account of cotton manufactured since 1831. I have no means of comparing the increase with 1815; but since 1831 there has been a most extraordinary increase in the quantity of cotton imported for manufacture and retained for home consumption, and the quantity of cotton goods exported. In 1831 the total quantity of cotton spun was 208,000,000 lbs., and in 1841 it amounted to 337,000,000 lbs. The total quantity of yarn manufactured goods in 1831 was 70,000,000 lbs., and in 1841 it had risen to 138,000,000 lbs. Now, though it might be that we do not take corn in exchange for our cotton goods, yet the quantity of goods exported, for which we receive some sort of return, has been enormously increased, comparing 1841 with 1831, and with 1815 also, when the wages of the artisan were so high, as described by the hon. gentleman, and when corn was about 6s. a quarter. The increase of the trade, as measured by the imports and exports, has been most extraordinary. I was also taunted by the hon. member for Stockport for having referred to the necessity of maintaining the public tranquillity. However much we may lament the sufferings of the people, however inadequate our measures may be deemed by way of remedy for the distress, yet it is for the interest of all parties that the government should maintain the public peace. I said that the people had shown unexampled patience in the midst of their distresses, and I was deprecating appeals to their passions, and the use of exciting language. In this feeling I should expect that every true friend of the working classes themselves would concur. Reference was made in the House the other night to a handbill headed "Murder," in large letters, and I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman state that he knew that the members of the Anti-Corn-law Association decidedly deprecated the issue of handbills of that nature. I think, he said, he knew they were no parties to the issue of the handbill in question; that they discountenanced it in every manner, and had read the expressions contained in it with the deepest regret. I was glad to hear that declaration from the hon. gentleman; at the same time I think there ought to be a more effectual measure taken for the purpose of manifesting a severance between disseminators of bills of this character and those who profess to have the true interest of the working classes at heart. I was determined to make no reference to this handbill without information, but these facts have been stated to me: — "The inflammatory placard headed 'Murder' continues to be issued in a shop in Market-street, Manchester. The placard was still exhibiting on the 23rd of June, at No. 22, Market-street. Above the door of this house there are printed the words, 'The dépôt for the National Anti-Corn-law League.' The printer of the placard, who is the tenant of that shop, is the printer and publisher for the Anti-Corn-law League. About four doors distant from this 'dépôt' was a building in which the Anti-Corn-law League held their meetings."

I am glad to hear from the hon. member that the members of the Anti-Corn-law League express their disapprobation of the exhibition of this placard; and I trust what I have stated may induce them to take steps which may make it impossible for any person to attribute to them any participation in appeals of this nature to a suffering population. In the course of these debates it has been repeatedly said that "something must be done. Let the government state what they mean to propose for the relief of the people. We look for relief." I advert not to subscriptions; but I trust nothing will be done that shall have a tendency to check their progress. I trust the country will still feel the obligation of contributing towards the funds raised for the purpose of alleviating the existing distress. Yet I am convinced that this is no permanent remedy for the distress—it is only a temporary provision. It effects much good by mitigating the sufferings of the people, and I trust that even those who may disapprove of the policy of the government will do nothing tending to diminish the amount of these benevolent contributions. It would be perfectly consistent for persons to disapprove of the commercial policy, and yet not to throw any obstructions in the way of the subscriptions which are being collected. I stated in the early part of the session that my hope of permanent relief for the suffering which afflicts the country consisted in an extension of the commerce of the country. I stated also the general principles on which I thought that commerce ought to be established. I stated, and I am ready now to repeat the statement, that if we had to deal with a new society, in which those infinite and complicated interests which grow up under institutions like those in the midst of which we live had found no existence, the true abstract principle would be "to buy in the cheapest market, and to sell in the dearest." And yet it is quite clear that it would be utterly impossible to apply that principle in a state of society such as that in which we live, without a due consideration of the interests which have grown up under the protection of former laws. While contending for the justice of the abstract principle, we may at the same time admit the necessity of applying it partially; and I think the proper object is first of all to lay the foundation of good laws, to provide the way for gradual improvements, which may thus be introduced without giving a shock to existing interests. If you do give a shock to those interests, you create prejudices against the principles themselves, and only aggravate the distress. This is the principle on which we attempted to proceed in the preparation of the tariff. I admit that we have not applied, and I have stated the grounds on which we abstained from applying, to the great articles of subsistence the principle of buying in the cheapest market. I frankly admit this. With respect to corn, I think it possible, if you repealed all protection, a present stimulus must be given to manufactures; but the time might come when, notwithstanding the stimulus given to manufactures, if the effect of that repeal should be to discourage domestic agriculture, and render you dependent on foreign supplies, you would repent of the measure you had adopted. I do not wish to enter into this argument, but I hope it may be borne in mind that we did reduce the duties on foreign corn to an extent which induced many gentlemen on the other side to upbraid us with having broken faith with the country gentlemen, and to allege that I was disintituled to the support of those who placed me in office. The duties were reduced more than one-half. I have already stated that I think those who disapprove of the law too hasty and precipitate in their condemnation. I think it is entitled to a fair trial. The period will shortly come when it will be subject to that trial, and in the meantime I deprecate inconvenient discussions like the present, which may have the effect of retarding the attainment of an object so desirable. With respect to sugar, no reduction has been made, but the motive you assign for this is entirely without foundation. I utterly deny that we abstain from reducing the duty for the purpose of conciliating Parliamentary support by giving undue protection to the West Indian interest. I believe that that interest is one of the weakest in the country; and I deny that our conduct with respect to sugar has arisen from any unworthy motives. To judge properly of the measure introduced by the government, altering the duties on foreign produce with a view to the relief of trade, you must look at its whole effect. With respect to the enactments of the tariff regarding cattle, what was stated by an hon. gentleman opposite? He said that three or four years ago he contemplated the same kind of measure, but was told by the then President of the Board of Trade that it would be considered revolutionary by the agricultural interest. At any rate, we propose a measure which, for its reduction of duty, gave general satisfaction to those who ask for a reduction of duty on agricultural produce. At the commencement of this year declarations were being constantly made about the comparative prices of meat in this country and abroad. There were constant prophecies that no attempt would be made to deal with the monopoly of provisions in respect of cattle and meat. In respect to rice, potatoes, fish, and various other articles of subsistence, there have been made most extensive reductions of duty; and with respect to raw materials there was likewise a reduction, such as the advocates of free-trade could scarcely complain of. The effect of all this change could not yet be fairly estimated. But then it was asked, "Do we intend to do nothing else? We do intend, agreeably to the recommendation of a committee, to permit the taking of foreign corn out of bond, on substituting for it in the warehouse, or delivery for exportation, an equivalent quantity of flour or biscuit. With respect to other countries, it will be our endeavour to extend on the true principles of reciprocal advantage, the commerce of the country. An hon. gentleman opposite asked, why have we not meddled with the banking laws? What would have been the advantage of such a course? Every day at the disposal of the government has been consumed in the consideration of the measures I have mentioned, and up to the present time we have scarcely been able to pass more than the first clause of the Poor-law. What encouragement then, have we to introduce a measure which, when introduced, ought to be brought to a practical conclusion? Does the hon. gentleman think the public advantage would be consulted by tossing on the table of the House a bill affecting the whole banking interests, and leaving it unfinished? Instead of affording relief, this would only tend to aggravate distress. With respect to the Income-tax, we have been taunted with having done nothing but introduce that measure. We brought it forward as a substitute in part for other taxation, which we thought was pressing more heavily on the industry of the country. We introduced it because there was an absolute deficiency of revenue, and because we thought it desirable, in reference both to the public service and the public credit, that this deficiency should be made up. I thought, and the country thought so too, that it would be wise to make a great sacrifice to supply the deficiency; and never did the country respond with greater unanimity to the demand which was made upon it. Hon. gentlemen may think the country wrong; but could any government ever have carried that measure against a decided expression of public opinion? Instead of hostility, there has been a decided expression of feeling throughout the country that the deficiency ought to be supplied; and though I will not contend that an Income-tax, or taxation of any kind, has any other effect than that of curtailing in some respect, the amount of capital applicable to the productive interest of the country, yet I maintain, that as there was a necessity to raise £4,000,000, the best course to pursue in the present condition of the country, was to levy that amount on the property of the country, rather than on articles which entered into consumption. These are the measures which, with the consent of parliament, the government have passed. As I have before said, the government have entered into negotiations with other countries. A treaty has been satisfactorily concluded with Portugal, and treaties are pending with other countries. I hope, now that we have been able to bring these measures to a conclusion, with some difference of opinion on this side of the House, on account of the alarm given to the agricultural interests, that they will be allowed to have a fair trial; and if they do not prove calculated to increase the prosperity of the country, if they should prove inadequate to meet the distress of the country, in that case I shall be the first to admit that no adherence to former opinions ought to prevent their full and careful revision; but I hope that no precipitate conclusion will be come to but that a fair experiment will be made, in order that we may see whether they have a tendency to revive the prosperity of the country, and to terminate that stagnation which no person in this great community views with deeper concern than those who are immediately responsible for the government of the country.

Mr. Villiers's amendment was negatived, and the House went into committee; several votes were agreed to, and the House adjourned.

ELECTION PROCEEDINGS.

JULY 28, 1842.

Mr. Roebuck moved the following resolution, being the first of a series founded on the report of the Election Proceedings Committee:—"That the compromises of election petitions, as brought to the knowledge of this House by the report of the Committee on election proceedings, must, if for the future they be allowed to pass without punishment or censure, tend to bring this House into contempt with the people, and thereby seriously to diminish its power and authority."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: The hon. gentleman the member for Bath, in the speech by which he had opened the present motion to the House, stated that he had received from me a consistent and decided support in the former proposal he had made for an inquiry into these transactions. The hon. gentleman had made that willing admission, and I cannot say, although I know the course I pursued on that occasion caused some dissatisfaction and led to some animadversion, that, on reflecting upon the matter, I see any reason to regret that course. I certainly did think that the notoriety and development of those proceedings—the public notification that compromises, as they were called, had taken place, should not prevent the House from instituting an inquiry—I certainly did think that the very inquiry and development of the facts of the transactions referred to, would operate as a strong discouragement to their repetition; but at the same time that I stated this much I had a strong impression that it would be unjust on the part of the House of Commons to brand with peculiar censure those hon. members who had been parties to these proceedings. I felt that for very many years those compromises had taken place almost with the connivance of the House of Commons itself. I felt that it was notorious such compromises were made, and I think, whatever might be wrong in those compromises, the House of Commons itself ought to bear a considerable portion of the blame, because the fact being notorious, the House had permitted them to pass for years without the slightest attempt to discourage them or to visit the parties to them with censure; and therefore when the notoriety of the facts was such that inquiry could not be prevented, still my object in consenting to that inquiry and these proceedings, was not, as I avowed from the first, to imply a censure upon the individuals mixed up in them, but for the prevention of the system. I thought not only that the appointment of a committee of inquiry would operate as a strong discouragement to future compromises, but I was ready to go further, and to take legislative precaution against the continuance of the practice; and I also thought the result of the proceedings of the committee would be, that the hon. gentleman the member for Bath would move some such resolution as this, namely, that it is desirable, in consequence of the disclosure made before the committee, of which the hon. gentleman was chairman, that immediate measures should be taken by parliament to correct, by legislation, such a system as had been proved to exist; and if that had been the motion of the hon. gentleman the member for Bath, it should have received my support. But only last night a bill (one of the objects of which is to prevent compromises of this kind) was passed through committee, and, therefore, it appears to me unnecessary now to pass resolutions of this kind. As to the mode of conducting the inquiry, I think the hon. gentleman the member for Bath has been hardly dealt with. The appointment of the committee was the act of the House of Commons—the House had associated with the hon. member for the purpose of the inquiry and investigation, eight other gentlemen of the highest character. From this side of the House there were selected Sir William Heathcote, Mr. Lascelles, Mr. Bramston, and Mr. W. Miles. For two of those gentlemen Mr. E. Yorke and Mr. Wilson Patten were subsequently substituted. The report and the proceedings of the committee thus appointed and selected I consider to be the report and proceedings, not of the hon. gentleman the member for Bath, but of the tribunal which was appointed by the House of Commons itself. It is true, the hon. gentleman was chairman of the committee, but that was the act of the committee which elected him chairman; and therefore, for the whole of the proceedings before the committee I consider the select committee appointed by this House, and not the hon. gentleman, to be responsible; and I cannot see in the manner in which their proceedings had been conducted, or in the mode in which truth was elicited, any departure from the ordinary course taken by other committees appointed for similar purposes, which can justify a condemnation of the mode in which this particular committee has discharged the duty assigned to them. While I relieve the hon. gentleman from personal responsibility for the proceedings, or the report, or the mode in which the evidence was taken, yet at the same time I must attach some weight to the recommendations of the committee, and I cannot think, looking at the third paragraph of the report, that the committee ever contemplated any such proceeding as that in which the hon. gentleman has now engaged. The committee, in their report, state that—“they understand their duty to have been to elicit and lay before the House, faithfully and clearly, all the facts of the several cases, rather with a view to expose the evils of a system than by any direct expression of their own opinion to inculpate individuals, or directly to lay the foundation for any legislative enactment with respect to the particular boroughs in question; and they consider that they are borne out in this opinion by the nature of the debates in the House upon the motion for the appointment of the committee, and upon several subsequent occasions. In this view of their duty, the committee called before them the parties immediately concerned in these transactions; and the committee feel bound, in justice to those parties, to state, that their willingness to appear, with few exceptions, and the full and frank disclosures made by them, have tended greatly to facilitate the proceedings of your committee; and they have consequently been enabled to obtain from the most authentic source evidence relative to practices which although supposed to have existed, have never before been so clearly and unquestionably brought to light."

Now, I cannot help thinking that the parties who so gave their evidence did so under the impression—which I also thought to be the impression of the House at the time the inquiry was agreed to—that if they fairly disclosed the facts of the case they would be entitled to indemnity. Under that impression, and also on the understanding that we were to take due precautions against the continuance of the system, I gave my vote for the committee, but not in order that we might visit with censure those five or six gentlemen who had been concerned in these compromises; and here is an admission by the committee that the evidence relative to these practices had exhibited them in a clearer light than had ever yet appeared; so that the House had now got the testimony from willing witnesses, and I must say I cannot reconcile it with my sense of justice now to select for censure those particular individuals. [Captain Bernal: How do you provide for the future?] I provide for the future by the bill last night under discussion. But how did the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Roebuck) meet the case? His resolutions are, "That the compromises of election petitions must, if for the future they be allowed to pass without punishment or censure, tend to bring this House into contempt with the people, and thereby seriously to diminish its power and authority."

And further,—“That all such practices are hereby declared to be a violation of the liberties of the people, and a breach of the privileges of this House, which it will in all future cases strictly inquire into and severely punish.”

Why, that being translated, means no more than this: “You have been guilty of an offence which is a violation of the liberties of the people, and a breach of the privileges of the House. Still we will not call you to the bar and censure you, but any person who hereafter in like manner may offend, we will.” But there are several other parts of these resolutions with which I am not satisfied. The hon. gentleman, by his resolutions, declared these practices to be a violation of the liberties of the people, and a breach of the privileges of the House. Now, I do not like dealing with general terms of this kind. I think the House ought not lightly to adopt such a declaration. The hon. gentleman does not state the particular nature of the compromise which shall constitute a violation of the liberties of the people and a breach of the privileges of the House; but he refers to certain compromises, all of which differ in character, and, speaking generally, says, they are breaches of privilege and violations of the liberties of the people. If they be so, why do you not go on and censure the parties to them? When you talk of inefficient proceedings is it not inefficient to pass by those guilty of these violations? Why, you abstain from censuring them because we gave them reason to believe that if they gave their evidence fairly, they should not be visited with censure. I cannot reconcile it to my mind, as a fair proceeding, to brand these parties after they have so given their evidence, with censure. Their evidence has been obtained upon a distinct understanding that the inquiry was set on foot, and the investigation gone into in order to put an end to the system, but not to punish them. I think the hon. gentleman agrees with me that that was so. [“Hear, hear.”] Well, then, I think the hon. gentleman's resolutions have the effect of branding these parties with a sort of qualified and implied censure. I concur with the hon. gentleman in thinking that in all future cases you should deal strictly with such compromises, but I will not do so by mere resolutions, but I will do it by law. I wish to see a law passed which shall ensure a full inquiry into, and a remedy against such practices, but I am not quite certain that they are a breach of the privileges of the House, because when the House passed the Elections Trial Bill, it divested itself of the charge of inquiring into bribery, and said to individuals, “We leave it to you to prefer and defend charges of bribery,” and the legislature visited with costs those who preferred or advanced frivolous and vexatious charges or defences; and I think the House when it adopted that course, be it wise or be it wrong, left to individuals the vindication of the purity of the House, and therefore the House ought to take care not to visit with severe censure the parties to such compromises, and by legislation rather than by resolution to prevent them in future. If, therefore, as I have already said, the hon. member had moved a resolution to the effect that the disclosures made before the committee required a legislative remedy, to that resolution I would have now given my support; and it is only because there is a bill before the House which will effectually, I think, ensure a remedy, that I believe it unnecessary to come to the resolutions proposed. So much for the first two resolutions. With regard to the last,—“That whereas in the late elections for Harwich, Nottingham, Lewes, Reading, Falmouth and Penryn, and Bridport, the present laws have been found insufficient to protect the voters from the mischievous temptations of bribery, it be ordered that Mr. Speaker do issue no writ for any election of members for the said towns till further legislative enactments have been adopted to protect the purity of elections.”

I cannot acquiesce in it. On a former occasion I stated strongly the danger of establishing precedents for the suspension of any particular writ, but to make a general resolution pledging the House in six cases involving the seats of twelve members is, as my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-general has pointed out, full of danger, inasmuch as on a nice balance of parties in the House the majority might retain the balance of power. I think it may be right to suspend the writ for any borough in case you are about to deprive that borough of the franchise, or to institute an inquiry with that view, but I greatly doubt whether you have any right to suspend the issue of a writ on the vague intimation that you contemplate some general measure with regard to bribery. In this case it is not intended; at least no notice has been given of any such intention to disfranchise these particular boroughs. It is merely proposed to suspend the writs until further legislative enactments are adopted. From these resolutions, if once adopted, it will be difficult to recede. In the case of Bridport there is no compromise for vacating the seat—there is no seat vacant—and yet the hon. member opposite (Mr. Roebuck) invites us to agree to a resolution which in that case will have the effect of suspending the writ whenever a vacancy may occur. Again, to pledge the House to suspend these writs until some legislative enactments were passed is, in my mind, a course not only inconsistent with justice, but most dangerous as a precedent. At some future period there might be a difference of opinion between the two Houses of Parliament on the subject of legislating with regard to bribery; and yet by these resolutions the constituent body must forfeit their right to return members until both the Lords and Commons had consented to some bill which they both might think essential for the prevention of bribery. On that ground, therefore, I must vote against the resolution. At the same time it is my intention to support the bill which we have lately considered, and which I trust will have the effect so generally wished for, of deterring from compromises, and rendering the proceedings connected with elections more pure.

Resolutions negatived, and the House adjourned.

CAPTAIN WARNER'S INVENTION.

AUGUST 4, 1842.

Sir F. Burdett moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the negotiations of the government with Mr. Warner, concerning his invention.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, I am sorry that so much of the valuable time of the House should have been occupied with a subject of this description. Although I have arrived at a conclusion different from that which the hon. baronet near me has urged upon the House, yet I am perfectly ready to give him full credit for having brought the motion forward with the most perfect good feeling, and I am quite satisfied that my hon. friend was influenced by the best feeling. Nevertheless, I am bound, in my own defence and that of the government, to lay the facts before the House, inasmuch as the motion for a select committee implied something like a reflection upon the line of conduct pursued by the responsible advisers of the Crown. The hon. baronet said, that if there were a full House he had no doubt that he should be able to carry his motion. Now, if the whole 658 members were at this moment assembled, I do not believe there would be found amongst them ten men who would support the hon. baronet on a question like the present. The proposition is, that we should have a select committee,—to do what? Was it intended that they should try experiments? If fifteen members were selected from one side of the House, and fifteen from the other, to try if Mr. Warner had fulfilled his undertakings, how could that gentleman's secret be preserved? It appears to me, that to take this matter out of the hands of the Board of Admiralty and the Board of Ordnance, implies a sort of reflection on me for not having more freely and decisively supported the views of Mr. Warner. I assure the House, that though I am an unprofessional man, I still have given to this matter a great deal of attention; and with reference to all such real or supposed discoveries, I have thought that my duty was to pursue a middle course. I think that on the one hand, a public man is culpable if he wholly disregards suggestions of this nature; and, on the other, equally culpable if upon slender grounds he lends himself too unreservedly to their support. Twenty years' experience has taught me that we are not to take things of this sort for granted, and pay £400,000 for a secret, the efficacy of which has not yet been tested. Every man in office has been in the habit of receiving applications of this nature—not a day passes without something of the sort—some most specious proposal. But respecting this case, we have had rather a remarkable statement, in which, after a warm panegyric upon the character of King William, in which every one must concur, the writer states that that sovereign had given a distinct assurance to Mr. Warner that all his expectations would be realised. I think, looking at the professional experience of King William, that it was not very likely he would have given any such assurance; however, as he is now not living, we have no means of knowing how the matter really stood. As we can say nothing further on this subject, I wish next to recall the attention of hon. members to the frequency of applications of this nature, and to the fact that Mr. Warner is not the only person who lays claims to discoveries. I hold in my hand a letter dated the 11th of July, 1842, and which is in these words:—"Fourteen years ago I made experiments in Italy, before several officers, on implements of war, of power unsurpassed, and I was urged by them to come home to lay them before his Majesty's government. By his Majesty, on the certificates produced, I was assured of every reward if I would disclose the secret. The prosecution of my professional studies suggested the composition to me. One species is superior to Mr. Warner's, as a single shot, striking a line-of-battle ship, would consign her to destruction. I cannot go the length required by the Ordnance, of £500 deposit, to make undisclosed experiments."

With numerous applications of this kind, what course was open to me? I am sure hon. members do not think that I should at once have complied with Mr. Warner's demands. I am, however, enabled to tell the House that much more was done for Mr. Warner than has been done for any one else similarly circumstanced. His application was treated with a great deal more consideration than usual. The practice is to allow people in general to try their experiments, but at their own expense. If every man in society possessed the power of insisting that his theories and speculations should be tested by experiments at the public expense, the whole time of the public departments would be wasted and the cost would be enormous. Therefore the rule is that experiments shall not be tried unless those who allege that they have made discoveries or perfected inventions give prima facie evidence of their sincerity and good faith by trying the experiments at their own expense, the public departments affording them every reasonable facility. To show the consideration with which this supposed discovery was treated, it is enough to say that I consented that Mr. Warner's experiments might be tried at the public expense. Mr. Warner stated that he could cast his projectiles to a distance of six miles, with a force sufficient to produce the gigantic effects which he promised. This appeared most marvellous, but I was not deterred. Wonderful as it seemed I did not scout the proposition. The hulk was ready at six miles' distance; two experienced and distinguished officers, Sir B. Martin and Sir H. Douglas, were ready to witness the experiments, and the secret was not to be divulged. With these facts before the House, I confess I am at a loss to understand how hon. members can agree to a motion thus reflecting upon us. Mr. Warner, before he would proceed to try any experiments, required that a sum of £400,000 should be guaranteed to him by her Majesty's government in the event of his being successful. But then, what is success? Could he accomplish these tremendous results in the face of an enemy? Could he effect them under all circumstances? This did not appear likely from the experiments which were tried, and, therefore, I would not promise him a single shilling. I could not guarantee the payment of public money under hypothetical circumstances, though I agreed that the cost of the experiments should be defrayed at the public expense. It is not immaterial to observe that this matter has been under the consideration of the executive government ever since the year 1834. At one time, when a proposition was made to try the experiments before officers of both branches of the service, Mr. Warner required that Lord Hardwicke and Lord Ingestre should be present, but I decidedly objected to Mr. Warner's appointing any nominees, though no one can entertain a higher opinion than I do of the two noble lords whose names I have just mentioned. At different periods since the year 1834 the subject has been under the consideration of successive boards of Admiralty. The correspondence which has passed upon these subjects will best show what really has occurred, and with the permission of the House I propose to read a letter addressed to Colonel Couper, and dated the 8th of July, 1834. It is in these words:—"I am directed by Lord Auckland to request you will acquaint Sir James Kempt that an application has been made to his lordship by Major Fancourt, M.P. for Barnstable, and Commander Warner, of the navy, for permission to have some experiments in gunnery, proposed by Commander Warner, tried before a mixed committee of ordnance and naval officers; and that it is stated to his lordship by Commander Warner, that a promise was made to him some months ago, by Sir James Graham and Sir James Kempt, that an opportunity of trying his experiments should be afforded to him. Commander Warner further states that he will be ready in about a week to appear before a committee."

I shall next read to the House another letter to Colonel Couper, altering, at Mr. Warner's request, the arrangement made by the preceding communication. It is dated the 14th of July, 1834, and is as follows:—"There has been, I am sorry to say, some little mistake in the matter of Captain Warner's experiment, about which I wrote to you a few days ago. Captain Warner has been at the Admiralty this morning, and produced a letter from Sir J. Graham, dated the 27th of February last, in which Sir James acquiesces in the proposition made by Captain Warner, that the exhibition shall be a private one, and consequently Captain Warner now objects to its being made at Woolwich. He also wishes that three officers only of each service should be present instead of six, and says that it would be more convenient to him if the day of exhibition were to be fixed for Monday the 21st, instead of Friday the 18th. Lord Auckland therefore now proposes to make an alteration in the Admiralty minute to meet Captain Warner's wishes; and I am to request you will move the Master-general to do the same with respect to the Ordnance, and to fix Wanstead-park, in Essex (ten miles from London), as the place for the experiment to be tried at, before three officers of each service, on Monday, the 21st inst., at 2 p. m.

I shall now read the official report of what occurred after the time and place had been fixed for trying these extraordinary experiments:

"WOOLWICH, July 21, 1834.

"SIR,—I have the honour to report, for the information of the Master-general, that in obedience to his commands, signified in your letter of the 15th inst., Colonel Williamson, Sir A. Dickson, and myself, proceeded to-day to Wanstead-park, to witness the intended experiment of Commander Warner; but after making every inquiry in the neighbourhood we could only at last learn that Captain Warner had left his house at Claybury this morning for London, and that his return was uncertain. Under these circumstances we returned to Woolwich to attend to any further directions which we may receive on the subject.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"A. F. FRAZER,

"Colonel Royal Horse Artillery."

"Lieutenant-colonel Couper, &c."

Thus ended the proceedings of that period. Then came the experiments which were to be tried in the presence of Sir Howard Douglas and Sir Byam Martin, and he met those distinguished officers by declining to try any experiments unless he received a guarantee for £400,000. No doubt there may be, and we know that there are, compositions capable of producing tremendous results—nitrate of silver, for example. It is well known that a person recently engaged in experiments on that substance was himself blown to atoms, and the building in which he had been trying his experiments very materially injured. It is no new discovery, then, to announce that a combination may be produced more powerfully destructive than any which we now have in ordinary use. But the mode in which this invention is to be applied is a matter of much more difficulty than the question as to the material. Considering the demands which are made upon my time and attention, I must say that I think I have given sufficient consideration to this subject, and I hope that, as far as the claim of the right hon. baronet to a select committee is concerned, I have succeeded in blowing Captain Warner out of the water.

Motion negatived.

PUBLIC BILLS—LATE AND PRESENT MINISTERS.

August 10, 1842.

Viscount Palmerston, at the conclusion of an elaborate speech, in which he reviewed the acts of the late and of the present government, moved for "A return of the names and titles of all bills brought into parliament during the present session."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I rise to second this motion, this lame and impotent conclusion to the speech of the noble lord. After questioning every act of the government, after impeaching all their policy, the noble lord contents himself with moving for some details about the dates and titles of bills, about which no man cares a straw. And the noble lord has not even the merit of originality for his motion. He is a humble follower in the footsteps of a gallant member on this side of the House (Colonel Sibthorp), and has not the candour to acknowledge the plagiarism he has committed. Read the noble lord's notice, and compare it with the motion of last year of the member for Lincoln. You will find one literally copied from the other, and that the noble lord's great practical achievement of to-night will be to complete for 1842 Colonel Sibthorp's returns for 1841. I am grateful to the noble lord for the performance of this very useful but somewhat humble duty, I am grateful to him for enabling the public to draw a contrast between the imperfect, bungling efforts at legislation of himself and his colleagues, and the extent and value of the comprehensive measures proposed by the present government, which have received the sanction of parliament in this session. The noble lord commenced his speech by an historical review of the state of parties and public questions since the signature of the definitive treaty of peace. With respect to the Catholic question, I have no complaint to make of the noble lord's observations. I acknowledge the fairness with which the noble lord, on this as on former occasions, has done justice to the motives which influenced my noble friend the Duke of Wellington and myself in bringing forward that measure. Whether the panegyric he made on the course we pursued was not greater than our merits, it is not for me to determine; he did but justice, however, to the motives which influenced us in attempting to settle the Catholic question. The result of that attempt must have been perfectly obvious to us. We could not have failed to foresee that it must withdraw from us the confidence of many of our supporters, and entail the loss of power: we cheerfully submitted to that sacrifice, in obedience to a sense of public duty. The noble lord referred, in the next place, to the question of Parliamentary Reform. He observed, that chiefly on account of the events in Paris of July, 1830, and the revolution that followed them in France, a great comprehensive measure of reform became unavoidable in this country. Surely, when the noble lord calmly reflects on his own conduct in reference to reform (conduct influenced throughout, I doubt not, by honourable motives), he ought to view with toleration the changes of opinion of others. The noble lord, for the long period of twenty years, was the zealous partisan of Perceval, of Castlereagh, of Canning: up to the year 1827, up to the death of Mr. Canning, the determined unvarying enemy of parliamentary reform, of reform to every extent, and in every shape, the noble lord was the faithful follower of Mr. Canning. In 1830 he became the equally faithful follower of Earl Grey—the determined, unvarying advocate of reform. Did the noble lord, during the lifetime of Mr. Canning, see nothing in the circumstances of the times—in the progress of events, which indicated the approaching necessity of great constitutional changes? Did he see nothing to convince him that it was prudent to anticipate popular demands, and by timely and moderate concessions to avert the necessity for dangerous innovations? If he did not, let him forgive the fallible judgment of others on other questions, and put a charitable construction on their blindness. Nay, if the noble lord was perfectly justified in his strenuous opposition to reform up to the death of Mr. Canning, and in his strenuous support of it after the accession of Earl Grey—if some sudden unforeseen contingency, not within the scope of human foresight (such as the revolution in France of 1830), justified and demanded this change of opinion on the part of the noble lord, I may feel, as I do feel, convinced of the purity of his motives; but I feel, also, that harsh and intolerant criticisms on the versatile opinions of others proceed with a very bad grace from the noble lord. The noble lord said, that when the great question of reform was carried, it was clearly necessary to adopt new principles of commercial policy. Sir, I deny that the necessity for liberal principles of commercial policy originated with the change in the representation of the people. I deny altogether that the adoption of these principles originated with parliamentary reform. Mr. Huskisson and others entered into these views of commercial policy, and practically enforced them. You cannot date the relaxation of restrictions, and the abolition of monopoly, from the period at which parliamentary reform took place. For ten years previously to the Reform Bill, more important changes were effected in our commercial policy than for the ten years succeeding that epoch. But if you are right—if from parliamentary reform there arose the necessity for commercial improvements—if that be true, then the noble lord passes the most severe censure on those to whom the Reform Bill gave political power. They were strong in power; they were convinced of the truth of certain documents; they were convinced that the practical application of them was necessary to the public interest, and yet they let their principles lie dormant, without an effort to awaken them. Nay, more, according to your own showing, the combination of circumstances, and the nature and necessary consequences of great constitutional changes, enforced the policy of immediate action. In respect of commercial reform, doctrines abstractedly and universally true, doctrines suited to all times and to all circumstances, came specially recommended by the character of those times, and the special nature of those circumstances; and yet, with every advantage, you, who were convinced of certain truths, who were able to enforce them, who were powerful enough to trample down all opposition (the complexion of the times and the fortuitous concurrence of events proclaiming to you that the time for action had arrived), you did nothing to advance the cause of commercial reform. And then, when the time had passed away, when you were in the hour of dissolution, like sorry penitents you remembered, in the days of your decay, the principles you had forgotten or neglected in the time of your strength; and you threw discredit on the principles themselves, by trying to make them subservient, not to the promotion of the public weal, but to the rescue of a tottering administration. Nay, at an earlier period, when your power began to fail, when the public began to withdraw their confidence, when there might still have been a decent adoption of a liberal commercial policy, you did not invoke its aid for your deliverance. It was not till your days were numbered, when it was convenient to yourselves that you should appear martyrs in the cause of free-trade, that you demonstrated any zeal in the enforcement of its principles. The noble lord taunts us with the support of the Bonded Corn Bill, and exults in the passing of it as a tardy triumph of the principles of the late government. Did that government propose the bill? Did that government, as a government, lend a cordial support to the measure when it was introduced in 1836 or 1837? When Mr. Robinson, the member for Worcester, first introduced the measure, when he asked in 1835 merely for a committee to inquire into the policy of admitting bonded corn into consumption, was not that motion actually opposed by the late government? Then the sugar duties. When did you become converts to the policy of admitting foreign sugar at a low rate of duty? Was it not at the very period when you had lost all power and authority in this House? In 1841, you proposed the admission of foreign sugar; you ridiculed the arguments of those who opposed it; you could see nothing but hypocrisy in the motives of those who feared that the admission of foreign sugar, without the attempt to make stipulations in respect to slavery, might encourage the slave trade, and aggravate the horrors of slavery. You had no mercy on your opponents in 1841. But in 1839, when it was proposed that the duties on foreign sugar should be reduced from 63s. to 34s. per cwt., when every argument on which you subsequently relied was adduced in favour of the proposal—you opposed the reduction of duty. When the price of sugar was unusually high, you opposed it with all the weight of the government; you rejected it by a majority of 122 to 27; and you assigned as your reason for opposing the reduction that you could make no distinction between sugar, the produce of slave-labour, and sugar the produce of free-labour, and that you were unwilling to inundate the British market with sugar the produce of slave-labour. Now I ask you, in return for the question of the noble lord, when did you become proficient in the doctrines of Adam Smith and Ricardo? Did you become their disciples before that day, when the profession of their principles might possibly save your administration, or, if that were impossible, might diminish the discredit of your failure? The noble lord has professed to review some of the principal measures of the session. He began with those announced in the speech from the throne—the alterations in the tariff, and in the corn and provision laws. He would insinuate, that I have deluded my supporters by the extent and importance of the alterations which have been made in those laws. Is that the charge which the noble lord prefers? From one section of his supporters I have uniformly heard a very different one; namely, that the alteration in the Corn-laws is not important and not extensive—that there has been certainly deception and delusion; but deception and delusion practised, not on the agricultural interest, but on the great body of consumers—that the present Corn-law is no better than the old one, and that the admission of foreign cattle and foreign meat will be of no practical advantage. These charges cannot both be true; and, in fact, both are without foundation. I have deceived no one. I have adopted no principles of government which I did not profess in opposition. When in opposition was I not constantly told that the support given to me was a reluctant and hollow support; that my supporters disapproved of my moderation, of my leanings towards commercial freedom? When I took office in 1836, did I not make a public declaration of the principles on which I should act? and in what particular have I departed from them in 1842? The noble lord says, that we were mistaken by our friends, and that the mistake was theirs; that we, during all the time of our opposition to the government, held good principles, but, holding them in silence, we astonished our friends when we avowed and acted upon them in office. We must, in truth, have held them, he says; for we could not, according to the Indian superstition, have inherited the principles, because we occupied the seats of our opponents. We did not find these good principles, says the noble lord, or the measures founded upon them, in the red boxes of the late ministers. No one can contest that truth. Never was an observation more just. There was not, I willingly admit, one trace left by the late government of their intentions with regard to the tariff. They may have been excellent, but we discovered no evidence of them. What right have they to plume themselves on the tariff? What particle of credit belongs to them for it? Did they appoint the Import Duties' committee? Did they attend that committee after it had been appointed? If public benefit has been derived from the evidence adduced before that committee, if the public mind has been prepared by the publication of that evidence for extensive changes in the commercial system of the country, let the credit be given where it is due. Let it be given to the member for Montrose and the member for Wolverhampton, and not to the late government, that merely stood by passive spectators, and coldly tolerated the appointment of a committee, the object of which was not avowed, and the result of whose labours they could not have foreseen. If they had, surely the President or Vice-president of the Board of Trade, or some member of the government holding a commanding situation, would have thought it worth his while to attend the committee. The noble lord has a defence for the inaction of the government in the later years of its existence, which he thinks quite triumphant. They were not strong enough, it seems, to enforce their principles. They were controlled, overpowered, by their opponents. Then why did they retain office? Why did they tamely acquiesce in being controlled against their conviction—against their sense of what the public interest required? They knew what was right, but tolerated what was wrong.—What does this amount to? Simply this—that just so long as office could be held at all, they preferred the retention of office to the maintenance of their principles. Why did not they at an earlier period appeal to the people, in the legitimate way, for the support of good principles? Why did they not propose that which they believed to be right, and cast on parliament the responsibility of rejecting it? Why did they not even incur the risk of that alternative, horrible as it may have been, of losing office? I have a right to ask that question. Did I abandon the malt-tax, in 1835, because I was threatened with opposition from my supporters? No. I called them together; I told them the continuance of the malt-tax was essential to the maintenance of the public credit; that I would resist the repeal of it, and retire from office if I was beaten. I did resist the repeal effectually. I willingly admit that I received from those opposed to me in politics effective support in resisting it. It was cordially given; and why? because it was seen that I was in earnest, and was ready to make that sacrifice, the risk of which must be incurred on many occasions, before you can hope to mitigate opposition and conciliate support. In the late discussions on the tariff what confident expectations were entertained that I should be forced to yield! What chuckling there was about the import of salmon and of cattle! You thought I must yield. You heard of the exaggerated fears of the grazier, the forced sales of cattle at great loss; the rumours, the unfounded rumours probably, of combinations to oppose, of resolutions of lukewarm support, of staying away on critical divisions. Suppose I had followed the example of others; Suppose I had argued thus:—“These are serious indications; the welfare, nay, the existence of a conservative government is at stake; that is a vastly superior consideration to any amount of duty on foreign cattle; friends must be conciliated; there is no great difference between a duty by the head and a duty by weight; much may be said on both sides; it is the most prudent course to give way handsomely, and before a division.” Suppose I had taken this course; suppose I had run no risk; should I have carried the tariff? should I have had your support in carrying it? that support which you gave cordially when you knew that I was in earnest, that I was resolved to deal justly with all interests, and to make no concession to groundless fears, or to any influence but that of reason? The noble lord claims for the late administration, or rather for his own share in it, the merit of having wonderfully extended the foreign commerce of the country. I watched the uneasiness of the member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) during the progress of the noble lord's demonstration on that head: his countenance fell wofully with every figure the noble lord quoted. The noble lord was showing that there had been a rapid increase in the trade of the country, all owing to the skill and wisdom of the late government; that the real value of the exports, which in 1832 were only £36,000,000, advanced in 1835 to £47,000,000, and in 1841 to £51,000,000. What, and all this under the old Corn-law! That law was in force during the whole period, and yet it either had no pernicious influence on our prosperity, or, if it had any, that influence was counteracted by the personal merits of the noble lord and his colleagues. But of this fact there can be no doubt—that the noble lord has proved that this wonderful progressive increase in the real value of our exports, and in the extension of our trade, took place concurrently at least with the Corn-laws. The noble lord's demonstration seemed to be so triumphant, that I took for granted he would conclude it with a condemnation of me for having disturbed the Corn-laws. Notwithstanding the variations in the price of corn, notwithstanding that wheat for four consecutive years averaged (I think) 47s., and for four other years 64s., the noble lord is ready with his proof that the price of corn had no influence on the amount of our exports. And the very men who were cheering the noble lord to-night, and exulting in his proofs, from figures, that trade has been progressively advancing for the last ten years under the fostering care of the wise government which had their support, have been maintaining night after night during the whole session, that the inferences to be drawn from these same figures are totally fallacious, and that our foreign trade has been progressively declining instead of advancing. The noble lord complains that certain measures, which were recommended in the speech from the throne, have not passed into laws. He says, we have not proceeded with the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and the registration bills. We were prepared to proceed with them. There surely were no difficulties to deter us, after having overcome the obstacles in the way of those great measures which were connected with the finance and commerce of the country. But after the labour of the session the measures mentioned could not have secured proper attention. Was I not right in that expectation? Why, when the noble lord has been passing his panegyrics on his late colleagues and himself, where are they? Where have they been for the last month? Much of the important business of the session, after the completion of the three first great measures, has been carried on during that period. Perhaps we have made, indeed, too much haste in legislation, in our anxiety for securing practical improvements; but certainly there has been more of business done in the last month than was ever transacted before? And where have been the members of the late cabinet? What a decisive refutation is their absence of all the assertions of the noble lord! What a decisive mark of public confidence in opponents! Do I allege that the absence of such men, during all the press and sweat of parliamentary business, argues indifference to their public duties? No; but it argues entire, unqualified confidence in the government. They have left the noble lord (as was once said of another gentleman here)—

"The last rose of summer, all blooming alone, His lovely companions all wither'd and gone"— left him "to waste his sweetness on the desert air;" with the injunction to "bottle up a great speech; no matter how thin the House, let it explode at the end of the session, lest we be utterly forgotten." "Yes," said the noble lord to his colleagues; "but am I to move a vote of want of confidence, or something expressive of distrust?" "Oh, no!" (said his colleagues) "follow the example of Colonel Sibthorpe, and move for returns which the most jealous and sensitive of ministers cannot find it in his heart to oppose; but, for heaven's sake, don't risk a division! Speak about America and Affghanistan, and every thing else; only avoid any motion which may provoke a division of three to one against us." The noble lord must not charge me with ingratitude. I here publicly acknowledge my obligations to the friends of the noble lord for their absence, implying as it does unbounded confidence in us, a perfect assurance that we will not abuse our power, but diligently persevere in repairing their blunders. But surely their absence may account also for our reluctance to proceed with some of the measures to which the noble lord has referred. Could we proceed with propriety to amend the registration of electors, in the absence of the great luminary of reform? Were we to proceed with the Registration-bill, when he had left the Bribery-bill to its fate? Let us shortly review the progress of the Bribery-bill. We heard of enormous and universal corruption at elections, of compromises for the suppression of the proof of it. The necessity for instant reform was manifest. "Let us" (it was said earnestly on the other side,) "let us have a measure to shame these corrupters of public virtue." I promised every assistance. Well, the first intimation I received was from the noble author of the bill, "I'm off." Then the Attorney-general of the late government was to have charge of the bill—and in the eulogy pronounced on his eminent abilities I entirely concur; but soon it was "I'm off" with him also. Then the chairman of the committee, the member for Halifax, had charge of the bill; but he was off also, and was to be found, I believe, on the Continent. Then, at last, the bill came to the learned member for Liskeard, not a member of the committee; and certainly then I found it necessary to give that energetic support, which I often gave the late government to insure the passing of their measures. When the learned gentleman, with infantine simplicity, being called upon to defend the main clauses of the bill, piteously looked round, and said, "I suppose I must say something, but I've nothing to say." I began to fear this measure was in danger of miscarriage when committed to such innocence, till at last the hon. member for Finsbury rose and said, "For God's sake give up the bill to Sir R. Peel, for no one else can take charge of it!" Now if other proof of confidence were wanting, what say you to this? Flesh and blood would never have deserted this hantling, had it not been for the unbounded confidence that its life would be watched over by me with parental care, after it had been abandoned by its natural protectors. The noble lord observed with a sneer, that there was one measure, indeed, which we did pass, namely, the Income-tax. Yes, and why did we propose it? Why did we call upon the country to submit to a tax so unpopular and obnoxious? and why did the country respond to the call? because they acknowledged the truths which night after night I sedulously impressed upon their mind; that you, the late government, having alienated France, having done nothing to improve our relations or adjust our differences with the United States, with a lowering prospect in Europe and in America, had undertaken three wars at a great distance from your resources, had been carrying on simultaneously war in Syria, war with China, war in Afghanistan; that you had at the same time contrived to make your annual revenue fall short of your expenditure by £2,500,000, and had an accumulated deficiency of £10,000,000, on comparing the revenue with the expenditure of the last five years. These facts sunk deep into the public mind, and resistance to the Income-tax was hopeless. But where were you (Lord Palmerston) during the discussions on the Income-tax? How happens it that you were a silent looker-on? This was the greatest financial measure of recent times, a measure, if not imposed by some overruling necessity, the most open to objection? You, who for many years have been in the service of the Crown, and taken a leading part in public business, and in the debates of this House, maintained absolute silence while night after night the bill was under discussion; and now that it is safe, now that it is passed into a law, you discharge your puny popgun against the Income-tax. Is this creditable conduct? How is it to be accounted for? Is this the solution? Is it true that you and your colleagues had at first resolved to support the Income-tax? Is it true that you met together in private conference, and that you took the resolution manfully to support the bill? that your first generous impulse was not to thwart vigorous measures for replenishing an exchequer which had been exhausted through your own mismanagement? and that you afterwards yielded to the remonstrance of some of your supporters, and determined to oppose measures which your own unbiassed sense of duty would have inclined you to support? The noble lord complains that the bankruptcy and lunacy bills were postponed in the House of Lords till a late period of the session. No doubt they were. I have been informed—however, I cannot vouch for the fact—but I have been credibly informed, that the late lord-chancellor, Lord Cottenham, expressed a wish that the bankruptcy and lunacy bills should be postponed until the county courts bill should be ready for discussion, in order that they might be all considered together, and that that has been the cause of the delay. Both by the bankruptcy act, and the lunacy act, a great improvement in the law has been made, and we were unwilling to defer the passing of them, seeing that all parties were generally agreed as to the principle at least, of these acts. We have passed a measure respecting ecclesiastical leases, which will contribute to the improvement of property and to the efficiency of the Established Church. But the amount of what we have done will, thanks to the noble lord, be laid on the table of the House; it will become matter of record, and when any impartial man shall consider it, if he be possessed of a generous spirit, he will make allowance for what has been left undone, and give us credit for what we have effected. As the noble lord has said, those only who have been in office can have any idea of the enormous amount of duty that is connected with it. The number of despatches that are received from every quarter of the globe, and which a minister must of necessity read, in addition to his other labours, would alone suffice to convince any one desirous of forming a correct judgment on the subject, how difficult it is for a public man to reconcile the performance of his duties in the House of Commons with the conduct of official affairs. The noble lord might, therefore, have readily found in his own official experience an excuse for us, if, on entering office, we required three or four months to digest our plans, and consider what steps we should take to relieve the country from its financial embarrassment. The noble lord has referred to the state of the country, and he has to-night, as on former occasions, made use of language which is calculated to aggravate dissatisfaction. He says,—“You are about to let parliament separate without, after all your labours, having done any thing to relieve the existing distress. I trust parliament will be soon called together again in order that you may deliberate upon measures for rescuing the country from its difficulties.”

I was in hopes that the noble lord, when he had tendered his advice for the summoning of parliament, was about to accompany that advice with the intimation of his opinion, as to the measures to be adopted; but all that fell from the noble lord was the perfectly safe, but not very useful declaration,—“Something or other must be done.” The noble lord proceeded to review the whole of the foreign policy of the country, but found it very difficult to introduce his reference to it on this miserable motion about the names and titles of the bills which we have passed in the present session. The noble lord fortunately recollected that my noble friend (Lord Stanley) made a speech three months since, in which there was some mention of the mischievous activity of the noble lord; and after three months' deliberation the noble lord comes forward with his vindication from the charge of my noble friend. The noble lord paid a compliment to my noble friend for his skill in off-hand debate: I apprehend that compliment cannot be reciprocated to the noble lord, in replying to my noble friend after a lapse of three months. The noble lord began by a statement which I feel it wholly unnecessary to dwell upon, because it received its best confutation in a burst of incredulous laughter. The noble lord said that we have done nothing but avail ourselves of the facilities in foreign affairs which were bequeathed to us by our predecessors. The noble lord's first reference was to the question of Hill Coolies, but I will pass by that, as belonging rather to the colonial department. If my noble friend should think it worth while to defend his conduct from the attack which the noble lord, after three months' preparation has made, with reference to the Hill Coolies, I have no doubt that my noble friend will be able most satisfactorily to do so without the advantage of quite so much premeditation. But surely before the noble lord is so severe upon an opponent, to whom he imputes a change of opinion respecting the importation of Hill Coolies into the Mauritius, he would do well to take a retrospective view of the various ministers of all shades of political opinions with whom he has been connected in the course of his own political life, and in that review he might find a charitable excuse for the public man who sees reason to modify in a slight degree his opinions about the Hill Coolies. As regards the foreign policy of the noble lord, no one can estimate more than I do the noble lord's personal activity and attention to business. But when the noble lord refers to certain treaties with the state of Texas, and to six or seven treaties about the slave-trade, as the triumphs of his administration, I am induced to ask if those are points to which a minister, taking a comprehensive view of the foreign policy of the country, can refer with pride and confidence as the result of several years of official labour? Look to the great countries of the world with which it was your boast to be connected. For six years your constant boast in this House was, that you had formed and consolidated the alliance of Western Europe, a powerful confederacy, based on the community of material interests, as well as of political opinions. The influence of despotic power in the East was to be counterbalanced by the intimate union of states in the West, governed by liberal institutions. Proud of the co-operation of France, you forgot your professed repugnance to intervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, and took an active part in the civil dissensions of Spain, for the purpose of consolidating the great bulwark of constitutional liberty—the quadruple alliance. What has become of the French alliance? What were your relations with France when you relinquished office in 1841? When you assumed it in 1830, you found every facility for improving a good understanding with that country. The government of the Duke of Wellington had recognised the dynasty of Louis Philippe, and had conciliated the good-will of France, by the unhesitating acknowledgment of the right she had recently exercised in respect to the change of the reigning family. For five or six years after your accession to power, your great boast in respect to foreign policy was, the establishment of amicable relations with France. All the aid we on this side of the House could lend you to confirm these amicable relations, was repeatedly and cordially given. How stand those relations now? By whose fault is it that they have been interrupted? You congratulated us on the maintenance of peace, and on the extension of that commercial intercourse which is the offspring of peace, and the great instrument for allaying international jealousies. Your policy has not been thwarted by the hostile feelings of this country towards France. This country has no feeling of hostility towards France. It was but the other day that we heard of the lamentable death of the Duke of Orleans, the heir to the throne of France, with a deep and universal regret and sympathy. We have no hostile, no irritable feeling towards France, neither have we any fear; we are too proud, too conscious of our own strength, to regard the power of France with apprehension; but we deprecate, for the interests of humanity, the interruption of friendly relations with that country. Our wish is to enter into no rivalry with France but rivalry in the generous race of increasing civilisation and social improvement. So far from viewing with jealous eyes the advances that may be made by France in the career of that civilisation and improvement, we know they will react upon and stimulate our own. Seeing that these are the genuine feelings of this country—seeing that the animosities, the relics of former hostilities, were fast subsiding, that the vulgar feeling of assumed superiority over France was supplanted by a kinder and more generous impulse—seeing all the advantages which the noble lord had for improving the friendly relations with France, for effecting that which he professed to be the great object of his policy, and the great guarantee for European peace—seeing all these things, how does the noble lord account for his signal failure? He complains of the non-ratification of treaties by France, and of her delay in admitting our just claims; and his complaints are just; but these things are the consequences of that alienation, of that state of irritable feeling, which, either through the fault or the misfortune of the noble lord, have been the consequences of his policy. The noble lord thinks it was necessary to incur the risk of rupture with France, in order to maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish empire. "True," says the noble lord, "we have alienated France, but then we have re-established the authority of the Porte in Syria." Syria, indeed;—this, no doubt, is one of the facilities in the conduct of foreign affairs bequeathed to us by the noble lord. You have delivered up Syria, not to the Porte, but to anarchy; and my firm belief is, that it was in the power of the noble lord to maintain every interest which England has with respect to Syria, every interest which the Porte has with respect to Syria, without the necessary disturbance of friendly relations with France. I proceed with the other comments of the noble lord. I regret that these charges and imputations are brought at this period of the session. I should have been content to depart in peace, without disturbing those feelings (free at least from any hostile spirit) which may subsist, after the labours and conflicts of the session, between political opponents. I deprecate the spirit in which the remarks of the noble lord were conceived, because it compels the disclosure, in our own defence, of what had better have been withheld for the present. But I will not be silent when such charges and imputations are made against us. I know the inconvenience to the public service of making premature revelations; but I cannot remain silent under unfounded imputations. First, then, with respect to the United States. I am sorry that the noble lord has tried (I trust that the attempt will not be successful) to defeat the settlement of a question between that government and this, which has remained unadjusted for the long period of forty years. Yes; for forty years this question of disputed boundary has been waiting for settlement. Seeing that we may be on the eve of effecting it, the noble lord does his best, by needless appeals to the sense of honour, to prevent it. Such is the blindness of his hostility, that every argument which he directs against our policy is the bitterest condemnation of his own conduct. He says, that subsequently to his appointment to office, he offered to acquiesce in an adjustment of this disputed question, which according to his own declarations, was fortunately rejected by the United States; fortunately, because it was most prejudicial to the interests of this country. He avows that he was ignorant of the merits of this question, that he had not sufficient local information—and defends on that ground his readiness to acquiesce in a settlement injurious to the honour and interests of his own country. What a wretched defence! What prevented the noble lord from making himself master of the merits of the question, and from procuring the local information which he required? The question had been in dispute for forty years. Why did not the noble lord, while he might have professed his earnest desire to adjust this matter, demand the time that was requisite for the correct understanding of it? The truth is, the noble lord fears that we have made an arrangement with the United States more favourable to our own interests than the one to which he was willing, at a former period, to assent; and in order that he may dissatisfy the country with our arrangements, denounces his own, and declares that it was through ignorance and culpable neglect, that he was a party to them. It is unworthy of the noble lord to be now raising these difficulties in the way of an amicable adjustment of long-existing differences between this country and the United States,—between great communities, boasting a common origin, speaking a common language, whose interests are so closely interwoven, that a hostile blow, aimed by the one at the other, recoils upon the hand that strikes it. Considering the utter failure of the noble lord to remove the long-existing causes of misunderstanding between this country and the United States, he might at least abstain from throwing impediments in the way of others, from telling us that our honour is involved in maintaining our right to a swamp on the frontier; from counselling us to make no compromise, no concession; from inflaming the public mind in each country, until there is no alternative but war. Sir, I would not shrink from that alternative, did the honour of the country require its adoption. It was said, I think, by Mr. Fox, that the most legitimate ground of war was the necessary vindication of the honour of a country; that it rarely happened that where mere material interests were concerned, the cost of war was not greater (even in the case of success) than the value of the object in dispute. I confidently hope, however, that neither the vindication of honour, nor the maintenance of the just rights of this country, will impose upon us the necessity of an appeal to arms, but that there are the means, by a conciliatory adjustment of all differences with the United States, of maintaining honourable peace. The noble lord has referred to our recent discussion with the United States in respect to the right of search. He compliments us on the ability with which we have defended the claim put forth by this country with respect, not indeed to the right of search, but the right to ascertain the nationality of a vessel suspected of carrying on the slave-trade. He says, however, that we were only maintaining the position which he had previously taken, and enforcing arguments which he had previously used. There is, I presume, no ground of charge in this, if, for once, we thought the noble lord was in the right. He says, that my noble friend, the secretary of state for foreign affairs, conducted the discussion with much greater ability than he himself could have done; and in that observation, I cordially concur. It was not only with superior ability that my noble friend conducted this discussion, but he contrived to reconcile firmness with moderation and dignity, and abstained from offensive and petulant remarks which sink deep into the mind of a sensitive people. My noble friend did not think it essential to the argument to talk of a piece of bunting when speaking of the American flag. I follow the noble lord to Portugal. He says, that the negotiations which we have concluded with Portugal has been pending for five or six years. So it has. It stood in the same position that all the great questions with foreign countries have been left by the noble lord; it stood in the same position that the questions with the United States stood; that is to say, no effectual progress had been made by the noble lord towards their settlement. A vast number of diplomatic notes have been interchanged, all ably penned, I have no doubt, but there was no prospect of immediate and amicable adjustment. So hopeless was it, that the noble lord introduced a bill, which passed into a law, enabling the cruisers of this country to capture the slave-trading vessels of Portugal. The act may have been justifiable, but it was a proof that all hope of friendly negotiation with Portugal was abandoned by the noble lord. We have prevailed with Portugal; by the means of friendly negotiation we have replaced our relations with that country (the intimate and ancient ally of England) on the basis of friendship, and have been enabled to repeal the act of the noble lord, which was, in point of fact, little less than a declaration of war. Now, with respect to the treaties which the noble lord boasts of having concluded, I will give the House a specimen of the candour and generosity which the noble lord has exercised in the attack he has made upon us. The noble lord referred to the treaty between the Porte and the five powers, and told us that he was content, so little has he of assurance, so little does he wish to arrogate any thing to himself, that he was content to call this treaty, a treaty for the provisional closing of the Dardanelles; but that we, in magnificent language, had termed the same treaty, a treaty for securing the peace of Europe. I will read the language of the speech from the Throne, at the commencement of this session, in which her Majesty speaks of this treaty. Her Majesty says,—“ There shall also be laid before you a treaty which I have concluded with the same powers (the Emperor of Austria, the king of the French, the king of Prussia, and the Emperor of Russia,) together with the Sultan, having for its object the security of the Turkish empire, and the maintenance of the general tranquillity.”

Those were the terms in which we advised her Majesty to describe the objects of the treaty in question—exaggerated and inflated terms, says the noble lord, assigning to this treaty an importance which its modest authors never claimed for it. How stands the fact? I will now read the preamble to this very treaty, and leave the House to judge of the fairness of the noble lord's comments, and the justice of the compliment which he has paid to his own humility. The parties to the treaty (being all enumerated) state that, “ Being persuaded that their union and agreement offer to Europe the most certain pledge for the preservation of the general peace, the constant object of their solicitude, and their said Majesties being desirous of testifying this agreement, by giving to the Sultan a manifest proof of the respect which they entertain for the inviolability of his sovereign rights, as well as of their sincere desire to see consolidated the repose of his empire, agree,” &c.

Compare this preamble, setting forth the objects of the treaty, with our description of the treaty in the Speech from the Throne, and then say whether that description was erroneous, and whether it does not fall far short, in inflation of language, of the noble lord's preamble. I cite this as a specimen of the noble lord's fairness and candour towards his opponents. Now, with respect to Hanover and the Stade-duties. Notwithstanding the remarks of the noble lord, I have no doubt, that when the negotiations with Hanover shall be laid on the table, this House will not consider that they are incompatible with the national honour, while at the same time they promote the commercial interests of this country. But the noble lord says,—“ We, when we were in office, maintained that there was an obligation on Hanover to reduce the Stade-duties to 1-16th per cent. according to treaty.”

But, I ask, what did you do practically to relieve the commerce of this country from an oppressive imposition? You left us ten years' negotiations upon the subject—you sent commissioners; what came of all your negotiations and all the labours of your commissioners? When we came into office we found them suspended. We found not one single advance made towards a settlement, and the only point at issue, as it appeared, was, whether you should go to war with Hanover, or they should reduce the tolls to 1-16th per cent. That was the state of the case. But the noble lord would do well to observe a little more caution in his attacks on those who may not have been inclined in his opinion to maintain extreme rights, or the literal fulfilment of treaties of doubtful obligation. Did the noble lord ever hear of a memorandum on the subject of these duties, from which I will read an extract?

“ Upon the whole, as it appears that these duties are injurious to British commerce, more from the unfair competition to which it is thereby exposed from that of Ham-burgh, which is relieved from this charge, and still more from the vexation, the disputes, and the consequent delay attending its exaction, than from the pecuniary amount of the burden; whilst, on the other hand, the government of Hanover reaps no amount of revenue at all, comparable to the injury which it imposes on our commerce; it appears that the most advisable course to follow would be to endeavour to negotiate with the government of Hanover for the final cession of these duties, in return for a pecuniary compensation.”

Let this reminiscence be a warning to the noble lord, and teach him the prudence of reflecting whether his charges may not be too indiscriminate, and affect others besides her Majesty's present government. As for the noble lord's insinuation, that we made concessions with respect to the Stade-duties, with a view of conciliating the favour of the King of Hanover, it is an unjust and unworthy one. We recognise no claim on the part of the King of Hanover to any other measure than that of justice. But, as I have before observed, these are not the considerations which are to influence us in pronouncing judgment on the policy of the noble lord. He may boast of his slave-trade treaties, and of his new consulships, nay, of the facilities he has given for the importation of Mocha coffee. But what compensation is this for unfriendly relations with France and America? The noble lord says he has preserved peace. Peace, indeed! With three wars carried on at the same time—with a revenue deficient by £2,500,000, with every difference with the United States

unadjusted, the friendly relations with France converted into irritation and hostility, the noble lord complacently talks about the blessings and prospects of peace, about the facilities which he left to his successors for the conduct of foreign affairs! He says we have been subsisting since we entered office, on the broken meats which we found in the larder of the late government. What a just, though not very dignified illustration of the policy of his friends! The noble lord reserved for the climax of his speech, the happy topic of Afghanistan. He is displeased with my remarks the other night on his assurance. I certainly did say, and I retain the opinion, that it required a degree of incredible assurance to congratulate this country on the admirable position which the late government had secured in Afghanistan. It is more than assurance; it is a cruel mockery of the public feeling—after the lamentable events at Cabul, after the massacre of the garrison of Ghuznee, after the evacuation of every position, except that of Candahar, after the dreadful sacrifice of life and waste of treasure—for a minister, responsible for these things, to boast in the House of Commons of our admirable position in Afghanistan. The noble lord presumes much on my forbearance. He knows that considerations of public duty, that the fear of compromising public interests, prevent me from giving him the proper reply. He knows that the lapse of six weeks will convey to the scene of action any declarations that I may make with regard either to the operations of war, or to political or diplomatic transactions that may be in progress. The noble lord may throw out his imputations for the present with perfect safety. Whatever may be my feelings with regard to their injustice, whatever my inclination to retort on the noble lord, to expose the real truth with respect to the operations beyond the Indus, and the policy which led to them, I will not be betrayed into a remark which might injuriously affect the progress of pending negotiations, or compromise the safety of a single man employed in retrieving that disastrous policy. It is easy for the noble lord to dictate in the House of Commons campaigns upon the Indus, to insist upon the advance to this place, and the relief of that. The men who are on the spot, who are responsible for consequences, have other considerations to attend to, besides the map of the Indus. Does the noble lord know how many beasts of burden accompanied the army which he sent into Cabul? He may form some estimate of the number sent by the amount of the loss. Does the noble lord, when, without reference to seasons, to means of conveyance, to means of subsistence for an army, he talks so flippantly of advances into the heart of Afghanistan, does he know, that of the camels sent with the army under Sir John Keane, 26,000 perished before that army entered Cabul? What number remained I know not; but the absolute loss of camels accompanying the army, and employed in the transport of its stores and provisions, was 26,000. And the noble lord exclaims with indignation, "Who is the man that meditated the evacuation of Afghanistan, and the abandonment of our glorious policy in respect to that country?" Oh, I could tell the noble lord—I could tell him who is the man that meditated the evacuation of Afghanistan. I could give him another lesson on the imprudence and rashness of provoking answers to questions that imply misconduct on the part of his opponents. But I must be silent. The events that are passing—the death of our faithful ally, Shah Soojah, the king for whose restoration we have made such costly sacrifices—our altered relations, and the negotiations that have been entered into, in consequence of that death, impose upon me the obligation of silence, and prevent me for the present from giving to the noble lord the information he requires about the abandonment of his policy in Afghanistan—of that policy which, according to the noble lord, is to open to us new fields of commercial enterprise, by exhausting in war our own resources, and those of the countries with which we are to deal. The noble lord may have taught the barbarians on the Indus the true maxims of commercial policy, he may have inculcated upon them, at the point of the sword, the doctrines of Adam Smith and of Ricardo; but he has, at the same time, so exhausted and impoverished the country, that they cannot turn to account, either for their benefit or our own, the lessons they have received from him in political economy. Sir, I have done. I have attempted to reply in succession to the charges which the noble lord has preferred against the government. I deny the truth of the imputation that we have acted in office upon principles which we did not profess in opposition. Our commercial policy has been in conformity with that upon which the measures of Mr. Huskisson were founded, and which measure received from me, one of the colleagues of Mr. Huskisson, a uniform and cordial support. I stated on the passing of the Reform Bill—I stated in 1835, in 1840, what were the principles on which I should act if called upon to take office. And in what respect have I departed from the professions which I made? You told me last year that I must be an instrument in the hands of others, and that the power was denied to me of enforcing my own principles. I declared then, as I declare now, that I consider office—its power, its distinction, its privileges—as nothing worth, except as the instrument of effecting public good. If it is to be held by sufferance, if it can be retained only on the condition of abandoning my own opinions and obeying the dictates of others, it will not be held by me. My reward for all the sacrifices it entails, is the prospect of that honourable fame which can only be attained by steadily pursuing the course which, according to the best conclusions of our fallible judgment, we honestly believe to be conducive to the welfare of the country. These are the motives by which we are actuated, these are the rewards to which we aspire. What could induce my noble friend who sits beside me (Lord Stanley)—what could induce him, with his intellectual powers, with all the buoyancy of youth, with all his command of the enjoyments of life and his taste for its rational pleasures,—what could induce him to submit to the drudgery of office, to the toil of nightly attendance here, to the devotion of every faculty of mind and body to public duty,—what could induce him to submit to all this, but, first, the possession of an unfettered right to act on the impulse of his own conscientious judgment, and, secondly, the aspirations after that honourable fame which will be adjudged to those who exhaust their strength in the faithful and honest discharge of great public trusts? It is not by subserviency to the will of others, it is not by the hope of conciliating the temporary favour of majorities, that such fame can be acquired; and in spite of all the noble lord has said, in spite of the rumours he has heard of concealed dissatisfaction among our supporters, we have the proud satisfaction of knowing that we retain their confidence, while we claim for ourselves the privilege of acting on our own opinions. From the commencement of the session to its close, we have received that generous support which has enabled us to overcome every difficulty, to carry triumphantly every measure we have proposed. There may have been shades of difference, there may have been occasional dissatisfaction and complaint; but I have the firm belief that our conduct in office has not abated one jot of that confidence on the part of our friends, which cheered and encouraged us in the blank regions of opposition; and next to the approval of our own conscience, and to the hope of future fame, the highest reward we can receive for public labours is their cordial support and their personal esteem.

Returns ordered; and, on the 12th of August, Parliament was prorogued till Thursday the 6th day of October.

THE ADDRESS.

FEB. 2, 1843.

The Speaker having reported the lords commissioners' speech, and read it to the House,—Viscount Courtenay proposed, and Mr. Miles seconded, the Address in reply.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—I am happy, Sir, to infer from the general tone of the speech of the hon. member who has just addressed you (Mr. C. Wood), and from the spirit in which the speech was received by those who generally concur in opinion with him, that there is every prospect of an unanimous vote on the Address in answer to her Majesty's Speech. I listened to the hon. gentleman's speech, and particularly to that portion of it which referred to the foreign policy pursued by this country, with great satisfaction. It appeared to me, that the hon. gentleman was willing to afford his unqualified approbation to the policy which governed the conduct of ministers with respect to foreign affairs generally; and the only reserve he made referred to the conduct of the government in relation to those districts west of the Indus. I concur with the hon. gentleman in the observations which he has made respecting the great skill and ability with which the military operations were carried on in India, and the constancy and valour of the troops engaged in executing them; and I also concur in the justness of the remark that these will be more properly brought under our view when the notice upon the books calls the attention of the House more particularly to the subject. That will be the more becoming season to enter upon such a subject; and for that reason, I shall not at present dwell upon it. The hon. gentleman, in referring to that portion of the Queen's Speech which alludes to the treaty lately concluded between this country and the United States, for the regulation of the boundary question between Canada and the state of Maine, said very truly, that the possession of a few hundred square miles of territory, more or less, was of little importance compared to the adjustment of differences which had now existed for nearly half a century between two great nations—differences which, from their long continuance, and from their peculiar nature, were calculated, unless speedily and definitively adjusted, to leave but little hope that peace could be preserved between the two nations. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman's frank admission with respect to the settlement of the boundary question, and I feel satisfied that I shall be able, when the occasion offers, to show the House that the country is under great obligations to the noble lord by whom that adjustment has been effected. That noble lord had almost retired from the turmoil of public life; but, influenced by a high sense of public duty, he abandoned the repose of private life, and quitted his country to enter upon the task in which he so happily succeeded. I could show, if the policy of that noble lord had been called in question in this House, as it has been out of doors, that the treaty which was effected by him affords to this country every thing which can be considered essential to the security of our North American possessions—not perhaps as much as we were justly entitled to, and had a right to expect; but, considering the uncertainty attached to the interpretation of the old treaty, considering the great length of time which had since elapsed, taking into account that the geography of the country was in a great degree unknown at the time of first assigning the boundaries, and considering the difficulty, not to say the impossibility, of exactly ascertaining the intentions of those by whom the assignment was made, we should feel satisfied to accept, not, it is true, all that we claim, or all that we are entitled to, but such a division of the disputed district as secures our British possessions in North America, and at the same time preserves our military communication uninterrupted. The adjustment of the question by Lord Ashburton is far more favourable to this country than that formerly proposed by the King of the Netherlands, and in which we were willing to concur. It should be remembered that since the interference of the King of the Netherlands a fresh difficulty was added, by the occupation of a portion of the territory in dispute; and, in 1839, the hostile parties had almost come into conflict upon it. This being the case, I feel that I shall be fully enabled, if the policy of the late treaty be called into question, to show, that not only the honour, but the interests of the country have been carefully provided for. In America, as here, there are parties trying to obstruct the treaty. Mr. Webster is taunted in America because he receded from his extreme position when he saw there was no other way of coming to an amicable settlement. Here the treaty is called the Ashburton capitulation, there the Webster capitulation, but I hope the good sense of both countries will recognize the policy of relinquishing extreme pretensions which could not have been maintained without endangering the continuance of peace. No other advantage is to be compared to an amicable settlement between two nations of kindred origin, of kindred language, and of interests as kindred as their origin and language. I rejoice that the hon. gentleman has given me an opportunity of making some observations on the late message of the President of the United States. The sincere and honest desire I have always entertained for the maintenance of a good understanding between this country and the United States, and the spirit in which I have always spoken of America, makes it a doubly painful duty to me to have to refer to that message, which, I am sorry to say, does not give a correct account of the negotiations relative to the right of visit. Perhaps I may do right to confirm what the hon. gentleman has said, that there is nothing more distinct than the right of visit and the right of search. Search is a belligerent right, and not to be exercised in time of peace, except when it has been conceded by treaty. The right of search extends not only to the vessel, but to the cargo also. The right of visit is quite distinct from this, though the two are often confounded. The right of search, with respect to American vessels, we entirely and utterly disclaim; nay, more, if we knew that an American vessel were furnished with all the materials requisite for the slave-trade—if we knew that the decks were prepared to receive hundreds of human beings, within a space in which life is almost impossible, still we should be bound to let that American vessel pass on. But the right we claim is, to know whether a vessel pretending to be American, and hoisting the American flag, be bonâ fide American. We claim the right to know whether a grievous wrong has not been offered to the American flag; to know, for instance, whether a Portuguese or Brazilian schooner, sailing under the American flag be really what she seems to be. In the admirable despatch of my noble friend, dated the 20th of December, 1841, he wrote thus:—"The undersigned apprehends, however, that the right of search is not confined to the verification of the nationality of the vessel, but also extends to the object of the voyage, and the nature of the cargo. The sole purpose of the British cruisers is to ascertain whether the vessels they meet with are really American or not. The right asserted has, in truth, no resemblance to the right of search, either in principle or in practice. It is simply a right to satisfy the party, who has a legitimate interest in knowing the truth, that the vessel actually is what her colours announce."

I am surprised the United States should contest this, considering the many small states by which they are surrounded, and how easily their revenue might be injured if it could once be established as a principle that a foreign vessel might become exempt from visitation by hoisting any particular flag. With such a principle recognised, neither the revenue nor the commerce of the United States could be safe for an instant. But I know that the United States do liberally exercise this right in the seas adjacent to their own coast; I know that if a Mexican vessel were to hoist the British flag under suspicious circumstances, the United States would not hesitate to exercise the right of exposing the fraud; and, knowing this, I am the more surprised at the claim now set up by the President of the United States. Therefore, Sir, it will be my duty, in the face of the public, expressing deep regret that there should appear to be any difference of opinion on this topic, explicitly to declare that we have not waived one of the principles contended for by my noble friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) in his despatch of December 1841; and it is further my duty to declare that that despatch has remained to the present hour unanswered by the government of the United States. I know, I think, too well, what is the ability, and what the keenness of a Secretary of State in the United States, to believe that if doctrines so important as those advanced in the despatch could be questioned, it would have been permitted to remain fourteen months unanswered and unacknowledged, had it been thought wise to contest those principles. And, Sir, with respect to this right of search, that not belligerent but conventional right which is used by one power for the purposes of humanity, to check the traffick in slaves, I am bound to say that, even on that point, I am surprised at the determination with which the United States refuse that mutual right. I am now speaking of that right of search which, by the treaties which the great powers of Europe, by treaty with France and other states, is mutually conceded by parties desiring to prevent effectually the traffic in slaves—a right to search vessels belonging to each country which is a party to the treaty, detected in the act of carrying on this trade. For, in the year 1824, a convention was signed in this country, by Mr. Rush, the minister of the United States, almost at the instigation of America, which professed the utmost desire to put an end to the slave-trade. A convention, I say, was signed by Mr. Rush and Mr. Huskisson, which did mutually concede the right of search; that is to say, which enabled vessels of war, of the United States and Great Britain respectively, to exercise, under certain stipulations, that very right of search against which such a clamour is now raised in a neighbouring country. That treaty was rejected by the senate of the United States, not on the ground of an objection to the right of search, but because the right of search extended to the coast of America, and the United States objected to the right of search being exercised in the immediate neighbourhood of the coast of America, alleging that it was not necessary for the suppression of the slave-trade. The senate of the United States omitted the coast of America, and Mr. Canning refused to ratify the treaty in consequence of that omission; but if Mr. Canning had allowed the coast of America to be omitted from the treaty, at this moment a convention authorising the right of search would have been in force with respect to the United States. Sir, I hope that those who have contended with so much vehemence in the legislative chamber of France against the maintenance of treaties framed in the pure spirit of humanity, and who quote the example of the United States, will refer to that convention, and see that the United States themselves were among the first to permit that conventional right of search. There must be some great misunderstanding upon this subject; but, considering the importance of maintaining this right—a right not peculiar to England—considering that we are contending for a right which is the only security against fraud, against the grossest abuses by parties interested in this iniquitous traffic—considering that we are the advocates of a principle necessary for the interests and security of all maritime nations—it is my duty to state, in the face of the House of Commons, that the claim to that right of visitation contended for in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen has not been relinquished; that on this subject we made no concession whatever, and that to the principles laid down in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen we adhere at this moment. With respect to the treaty which we have entered into with the United States, in signing that treaty we consider that we have abandoned no right of visitation. We did not understand from the United States that they entered into that treaty with any engagement from us to abandon the right of visitation, which is not necessarily connected with the question of the slave-trade. We thought that it was a step in advance when the United States professed a readiness to detach a naval force to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. We did not accept the detachment of that naval force as an equivalent for any right which we claimed; yet still we thought that for a great country like the United States to take that step with us on the coast of Africa, although the power of visitation is limited under the treaty in such case, although we claim no right to visit slavers which are bonâ fide American, and the right is to be exercised by vessels of the United States—we thought it, I say, a step in advance towards the ultimate suppression of the slave-trade to accede to the proposition of the United States. But in acceding to that we have not abandoned our claims in the slightest degree, nor did it ever make any part of our intention, during the controversy, to abandon the right to which we lay claim in the despatch I have mentioned. We have not contented ourselves, Sir, with leaving this fact to become known by a declaration in this House; for, since the appearance of the President's message we have taken an opportunity of intimating to the United States the construction we place on the treaty. I trust, Sir, that I have said enough to satisfy the House on this point; I trust also, that although compelled to avow a material difference of opinion between the two governments upon this particular question, I have stated this difference of opinion with the respect which I wish to maintain towards the high authorities of the United States. Sir, I do not recollect that any other question of foreign policy was adverted to by the hon. gentleman; but he commented, in the course of his observations, on the state of the public revenue. I am quite ready to admit that the present appearance of the revenue is most unsatisfactory, and the hon. gentleman said he hoped there would be produced, or, if there were not produced, that he himself would call for it, a balance sheet, which would demonstrate that fact. Now, I tell the hon. gentleman at once that when he gets possession of that document his prediction will be fully verified; I tell him that that document will present a most unfavourable appearance; but I think he will admit that nothing would be more unjust or unfair than to infer the future state of the revenue, and its future prospects, from what shall appear on the face of that document. In the course of the last session I stated that there was then a great deficiency, on comparing the revenue with the expenditure. I stated also that I proposed to create a new deficiency, that I proposed to remit, or at least, to reduce duties which formed a very important source of revenue, the import duties on many articles which were the elements of manufactures in this country, and on many articles of general consumption which were productive in point of revenue. The article of timber, and others almost equally important, were included; and altogether I believe that a reduction was effected on 700 out of 1,100 articles comprehended in the tariff. That reduction of duty, too, took place at an early period of the financial year; in some instances from July last, in others, from October. Of course, the reduction of duty taking place at an early period of the year, had a very material effect in increasing the deficiency of the revenue; and the taxes which were imposed by parliament for the purpose of supplying that deficiency, the income-tax especially, has not yet been productive. At least, they had not by any means come fully into operation. I do not know, then, that the present moment affords us very safe grounds for judging of our financial prospects; but at any rate it would be most unfair to draw discouraging inferences at a conjuncture when all the reductions have taken effect, while the receipts which were calculated upon to make up for the deficiency have not yet come to hand. Sir, the hon. gentleman states, and states truly, with respect to the excise, that that branch of income has been most unproductive. That is quite true. The excise has been unproductive, and it was thought advisable, in the speech from the Throne, at once to admit the fact—to admit it with deep regret, but candidly and at once. There can be no doubt that the reduction in the excise revenue has been in part caused by diminished consumption, which is an evidence of the depression of manufacturing industry and of the prevalence of general distress. It was thought proper at once to make that admission, but, at the same time, I wish to caution the House against drawing too unfavourable and gloomy inferences with respect to the fact of that reduction. I admit the diminution in the excise and in the taxes, but I think a great portion of the diminution must be attributed to the very unfavourable harvest of the year 1841. The defalcation in the revenue, it appears to me, has proceeded in a great degree from that source. I think the reduction on that account alone has not been less than £900,000. In the produce of the malt duties, and also of the spirit duties, there has been considerable diminution; but with respect to the latter, it is not to be ascribed altogether to distress, for improved habits of temperance are becoming more general here as well as in other countries, and there is a tendency to a diminished consumption of spirituous liquors as compared to former periods. But the great reduction in the excise has arisen from the reduced manufacture of malt, which is in a very great degree the consequence of the unfavourable harvest of 1841. I am not contesting the existence of distress, and I cannot allude to the subject without expressing the deepest regret, but at the same time do not misunderstand me. I wish to caution the House of Commons against drawing the unfavourable and gloomy inferences regarding our position. The hon. gentleman says, every thing is infinitely worse than it was five or six months ago; but at any rate he cannot deny that there has been a very great reduction in the price of all the chief articles of consumption. You say that the Corn-law has had nothing to do with this; but that was not the language of last year. You say it has not in the least checked the spirit of speculation, that corn was poured in just at the time when it would have been poured in before, and that the fact of the reduction of the price of grain is to be attributed, not to the operation of the new law but to a productive harvest last year. Now, the language I heard in June and July last was, that the harvest would certainly be unproductive; and the holders of corn were encouraged to keep back their stock by confident predictions that the harvest would be unfavourable, that the prospects it held out were extremely discouraging, and that, from information collected from very numerous sources, it was certain that the harvest of 1842 would be no better than that of 1841. Sir, I ventured to entertain different opinions, I cautioned the holders of corn against such advice, and recommended them to form no such conclusion. They however, kept back their corn, and certainly it cannot be denied but it was at one particular time thrown into the market in considerable quantities. But let the hon. gentleman rest assured that, whatever be the Corn-law, there will be, at a particular time, great speculation as to what the produce of the harvest will be; and when it is found that it will be abundant, depend on it that there will then be a tendency to introduce foreign corn, in order to secure a good price while the opportunity exists. There must be uncertainty in the price of an article, the production of which depends so much on the nature of the season, and which, of course, must greatly vary in quantity in different years. The hon. gentleman may depend on it that a great part of the evil which he attributes to the effects of the law passed last session will at one particular period always take place, because at that period there must be uncertainty as to the produce of the future harvest; but if the Corn holders last autumn kept back their corn, and then poured it in at a particular moment, those gentlemen who assured them that the harvest would be unproductive are responsible for that result. Now with respect to the excise, I have a return of the duty on malt for the two last quarters of the year 1842, compared with the corresponding quarters of 1841. They are the only two quarters with which it is possible to institute a comparison. In the quarter ending in October, 1841, the quantity of malt made from barley, the produce of the crops of that year, was 376,000 bushels. In the October quarter of 1842, the number of bushels of malt amounted to 604,000. In the quarter ending in January, 1842, the number of bushels of malt was 8,951,000. In the last quarter ending January, 1843, it was 10,567,000. So that in the two last quarters of the present year, as compared with the same quarters of the preceding year, there has been an excess of 1,844,000 bushels. That is a conclusive proof of one or other of two things, either the consumption of malt has increased, or that an unproductive harvest very materially affects the revenue. In considering the financial deficiency of the year, therefore, I contend that a very large portion of it must be ascribed to the fact of a bad harvest. Sir, I do not think this a fit opportunity to enter into lengthened details on the subject of finance. Future opportunities of entering fully into that subject must occur, but when the hon. gentleman picks out the consumption of a particular period on which to ground an unfavourable representation of the case, I hope the House will not be led to draw a rash inference. I think I can show them in the state of the savings banks, circumstances corroborating the view I take of this matter. An extraordinary effect was produced in the withdrawal of deposits from these banks, by the disorders which prevailed in the autumn of last year. During the suspension of industry in the north, the amount withdrawn from the savings banks was very great, and we have conclusive proof in the state of the revenue, that the disorders contributed greatly to diminish consumption; but since they have ceased this is no longer the case, and deposits have increased, speaking generally of the savings banks, in the manufacturing districts. I know this is not conclusive, in showing the condition of mere artisans and mechanics, but at the same time inferences may be drawn from the amount of deposits in the savings banks, which negative, at least, that very unfavourable view of the position of the country which the hon. gentleman has taken. That distress still exists in many districts, and especially in parts of that country with which the hon. gentleman is connected, I admit, but I think there are indications of an increased consumption of some articles, which justify a hope, at least, that the physical condition of the people is now in some respects improving—a hope too encouraging not to be seized on with avidity if it rests on a solid foundation. The hon. gentleman asked what further measures I am prepared to introduce, in order to carry out the principles on which I, last session, declared my resolution to act. I stated, in explaining the measures then passed, the general principles which I thought ought to guide the commercial policy of this country; and I said that I thought we ought to give, as far as possible, new scope to commercial enterprise. To the principles then laid down I adhere; but when I stated them, I at the same time referred to the many complicated considerations which must be borne in mind when you attempt to introduce and apply principles, unquestionably sound, to a country such as this. Sir, I made in the course of last year, with the aid of my friends and colleagues in office, more extensive changes in the commerce of the country, and the code which regulates it, than were made at any former period. If I had contemplated any former immediate extensive changes, I would at once have proposed them, in the course of last session. Why should I not have done so? I stated the general principles on which I proceeded, and to those general principles I adhere, but I did not lead hon. gentlemen to expect that I would go on, year after year, introducing extensive changes. I thought it would be infinitely better, when I had made up my mind as to the changes which ought to be proposed, to propose them all in one year, than to propose only a certain number of them in that year, with the secret reservation in my mind of an intention to introduce more during the next. Whatever changes I propose will be in conformity, when I do propose them, with the general principles which I laid down, by which I am still guided, and of the truth of which I am perfectly convinced. But, as I said last year, at the time of my laying down these principles, I cannot forget that in this country protection has been the rule—that under it great and extensive interests have grown up, and that if, in stating better principles, and substituting a better system for one that is defective, you proceed too hastily, if you produce distress in consequence of your beneficent efforts to introduce contentment and happiness, you run the risk of obstructing the free and rapid progress of those principles. It is, therefore, not in my power to assure the hon. gentleman that I have any great and extensive changes to propose in the commercial code of this country; when I do propose changes, they will be in conformity, as I have said, with the principles I laid down on former occasions; but I should be deceiving the hon. gentleman if I led him to expect in the present session any such extensive alterations as those at which he hints. Sir, I will not now enter into a vindication of the Corn-laws, or of the details of the course I pursued last session, with reference to the alteration then made; because an opportunity will probably be afforded by some gentleman who takes a different view of the subject from myself for discussing their operation and effects. It may be in the power of some hon. gentleman to adduce reason for believing that some better system ought to be enforced, but this I must say, that the event has proved that many of the arguments directed against that Corn-law which I proposed have not been fortified by experience. With respect to the alteration of the averages, for instance, it was confidently said, that the introduction of the new towns into the lists from which they were made up, would have the effect of lowering the price of corn, I think by 5s., and consequently increasing the duty. Now I shall be able to show that the introduction of the new towns has been an effectual corrective of fraud, but, at the same time, that it has not had the effect attributed to it by the hon. gentleman, and which he himself admitted that he overrated in the first instance. I certainly do remain of opinion that that law has not had a sufficient trial to warrant me in proposing the abrogation of it; I cannot say that I think the effect of it has been unfavourable, and I do not believe that the objections which have been urged by the hon. gentleman apply to it. Sir, when I introduced the Income-tax, I stated my firm conviction that the effect of the other laws I proposed would be to enable the party called upon to pay the tax to make a saving in his expenditure, equivalent to the sum which I should take from him for the Income-tax. My belief is, Sir, that that prediction has been fully verified, and that there has been a reduction of prices which does enable parties to make a saving in their expenditure, equivalent to the sum they will be called on to contribute in the shape of Income-tax. There will probably be other opportunities of discussing these important matters; but when I am asked to come forward and declare whether I contemplate extensive changes in the Corn-laws, I feel it right to avow that her Majesty's government have it not in contemplation to propose such extensive changes.

Motion agreed to, and a committee appointed to prepare the Address.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—GATES OF SOMNAUTH.

FEB. 9, 1843.

Mr. Vernon Smith moved for "A copy of any despatch from the Government of India to the Court of Directors, containing a proclamation addressed to the chiefs and princes of India, respecting the recovery of the gates of the temple of Somnauth, and any answer of the Court of Directors to the Governor-general of India."

SIR R. PEEL: Sir, when my hon. friend (Sir R. Inglis) calls upon me for an immediate expression of my opinion, and casts his censure upon me because I have not at once risen and announced my resolution not to defend this proclamation, I think he has not sufficiently adverted to the words, to the nature and object of this motion, or to the course pursued by the right hon. gentleman who is the mover of this question. I understood the right hon. gentleman to say, that if this motion were complied with, he should take a future opportunity of moving an address for the recall of the Governor-general of India [Mr. V. Smith: I have not expressed any such intention.] At all events, if the right hon. gentleman did not go so far, he admitted that he intended to found upon these papers a motion condemnatory of the conduct of Lord Ellenborough. The right hon. gentleman said, "I shall not shrink from my duty, but, whatever others may do, I promise to give to the House an opportunity of declaring its condemnation of this proclamation." Now, I think it would have been more fitting if the right hon. gentleman had reserved his denunciations upon this subject until he had ascertained whether these papers would be granted, rather than make a motion of this kind, which he knew would be assented to, the occasion and the vehicle of that censure which he declared should be founded upon the very documents which he calls upon her Majesty's government to produce. It is against all parliamentary usage, and indeed against all usage whatever, to say, "Give me the evidence which I require, and, before I get that evidence I will proceed to pass judgment upon the person and the policy to impugn which this evidence is required." It must have become notorious from the speech of the right hon. gentleman, that he thought of course I should acquiesce in this motion, and he was therefore aware that the time would shortly come when he would have the opportunity of calling upon the House to join with him in a vote of condemnation upon the subject. I repeat, therefore, that I regret the right hon. gentleman, intending as he has himself declared, to invite this House to express its condemnation upon Lord Ellenborough, should have gone out of the way to vent his accusations before he was in possession of the evidence he desires to obtain by this motion. He asks for an official copy of this proclamation. Now, the government is not possessed in an official shape of any particulars of explanation tending to show Lord Ellenborough's motives and intentions in regard to this proclamation. But the proclamation and the despatch also shall be produced. I tell the right hon. gentleman the government is not in possession of the official grounds and causes which may have induced the Governor-general of India to express himself as he has done in this proclamation; but as the proclamation is itself an official document, he shall have it, and with it an opportunity of inviting the House to an expression of its condemnation. The right hon. gentleman commenced his speech by admitting that her Majesty's government had shown a great deal of forbearance in respect of the exhibition of political feeling, and that little political influence has been exhibited in the appointments which have been made to the governments of our foreign possessions. The right hon. gentleman said, that he differed from those around him, as to the selection of Lord Ashburton for the purpose of conducting negotiations on a most critical and important point with the United States, that with respect to the appointment of Sir C. Metcalfe, he had heard of it with delight, for that it was impossible that any appointment could have been made more calculated to promote the interests and to conciliate the feeling of those whom he was destined to govern, and that he gave the fullest credit to the government for that appointment. With respect to the appointment of Lord Ellenborough, the right hon. gentleman did not condemn it, nor did he say that the government had acted unwisely. On the contrary, the testimony which the right hon. gentleman had borne to the fitness of my noble friend for the office which he holds was striking. In speaking of Lord Ellenborough, the right hon. gentleman said,—“I followed him at the Board of Control, and had then an opportunity of proving his prudence, discretion, and the intimate knowledge he possessed of Indian affairs. The papers he left behind him were sufficient to convince me that no appointment could be better chosen.”

That was the testimony borne by the right hon. gentleman, not merely with the candour which is sometimes found in a political opponent, but from his own knowledge and observation; the right hon. gentleman declared the appointment to be a proper one; and it must be taken that up to the time of Lord Ellenborough's leaving England, the right hon. gentleman acquitted the government of all fault. Then what has Lord Ellenborough done since which justifies the right hon. gentleman in all the condemnation which he has uttered, and which will justify him in calling on the House to pronounce a formal censure on the noble lord? The House should bear in mind that the right hon. gentleman is a warm political opponent to the government, and that prejudices may naturally be excited in his mind with respect to the conduct of Lord Ellenborough. That noble lord has certainly reversed the policy on which the late government acted, but it must be admitted that, whatever the conduct of the noble lord has been, however triumphantly his military operations have terminated, every act of his will now be rigidly scrutinized. Lord Ellenborough is charged with an intention to outrage the religious feelings of the people of this country. Now, all who know his disposition and feelings on religious subjects must be convinced, that as far as regarded his intentions, at least, he is innocent. Looking also at the acts of Lord Ellenborough—not his former and remote conduct—but to his acts at a time when he was hailing the return of a triumphant army, and alike offering and receiving all the congratulations of success, he writes thus.—I am reading from a private letter from Lord Ellenborough, dated October, 1842 :—“I enclose for you a copy of the circular letter I have addressed to all the clergy of India. You see I am not unmindful of the real source of the success which has attended me.”

Now I ask (continued the right hon. baronet), what, in common charity, we must all sometimes feel ourselves obliged to ask, that this House will regard not merely the naked acts but the obvious intentions, not the mere act of publishing this proclamation, but the animus of that act. The letter shows that amidst all the excitement of triumph he did not forget to whom his country and himself were indebted for it. I am about to read from a letter addressed by the Governor-general, the right hon. Lord Ellenborough, to the chaplains in the Upper Provinces of India. It was as follows :—

“SIMLA, Oct. 1, 1842.

“Rev. Sir,—The seasonable supply of rain, following our prayers recently offered to God for that blessing, whereby the people of the north-western provinces have been relieved from the fear of impending famine, and the great success recently obtained by the British arms in Afghanistan, whereby the hope of honourable and secure peace is held out to India, impose upon us all the duty of humble thanksgiving to Almighty God, through whose paternal goodness alone these events have been brought to pass. Nor have we less incurred the duty of earnest supplication that we may not be led to abuse these last gifts of God's bounty, or to attribute to ourselves that which is due to Him alone; but that we may have granted to us grace so to improve these gifts as to show ourselves worthy of His love, and fit instruments in His hand for the government of the great nation His wisdom has placed under British rule. In the absence of any superior ecclesiastical authority in these upper provinces, I request that you will take these matters into your serious consideration, and that you will on the 16th of October offer to Almighty God such prayers and thanksgiving, at the time of Divine service in your church, as may seem to you best suited to impress upon your congregation the greatness of the blessings which the British nation in India, and the whole people of India, have recently received; and the high moral responsibility under which God has placed all those who have committed to them any part in the government of this empire. I remain, reverend Sir, your affectionate friend,

The man who, at the time he penned this proclamation, having no ecclesiastical authority, thought it his duty on the 1st of October to call upon the clergy to offer thanksgiving in the public service,—is it possible that he can be charged with a desire to represent himself as a favourer of Hindooism? What sentiments could be more worthy of a Christian Governor? Whatever effect this proclamation may have had upon the religious feelings of the community, if that effect should have been to shock the feelings of any one individual, the first man who would deeply regret this result would be the Governor-general himself. So much for the intention. Now for the act itself, and its effects; an effect deeply to be lamented indeed, if it be true that it has resulted in a feeling of jealousy between the two great divisions of the population of India, the Mahommedans and Hindoos. But I think my hon. friend has allowed his zeal to carry him too far. His horror of Hindooism has led him to go a little too far in his defence of Mahmoud of Ghuznee, and has induced him to exalt the heathen conqueror into a hero. My hon. friend has described him as a man most indifferent to wealth, and influenced in his destruction of idols by no other feeling than a conscientious abhorrence of idolatry. I apprehend if my hon. friend had consulted the pages of the historian who has been quoted, Mr. Gibbon, he would have found that other motives are attributed to this conqueror of the Hindoos. Mr. Gibbon says—“The fertile kingdom of Guzerat attracted his ambition, and tempted his avarice.”

And he then goes on to say, that he can devote only one page to a recital of all the battles and sieges which took place during twelve different incursions. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend is paying undue honour to the character and conscientious feelings of Mahmoud, when he attributes his invasion to a pure preference of Mahommedanism over Hindooism. My hon. friend says, he never before heard of these gates. He will find a reference to them in some of the highest authorities; and they are mentioned by Mr. Mount Stuart Elphinstone, not as a religious relic, but as—what Lord Ellenborough, I believe, considered them—a great trophy of war. Mr. Mount Stuart Elphinstone, one of the best historians of Indian affairs, thus speaks of these gates. I ask the house not to view with undue prejudice the conduct of my noble friend the Governor-general of India. My hon. friend has represented that Lord Ellenborough most wantonly and capriciously restored these gates, which never were heard of before, which have not been mentioned by any historian, for the mere purpose of paying a compliment to the superstitions of the Hindoos. Mr. M. Elphinstone says,—“The tomb of the great Sultan Mahmoud is also standing, about three miles from that city. It is a spacious but not a magnificent building, covered with a cupola. The doors, which are very large, are of sandal wood, and are said to have been brought by the sultan as a trophy from the famous temple of Somnauth, in Guzerat, which he sacked in his last expedition to India.”

The authority of Mr. M. Elphinstone is at least a very high one, and it appears that he did not consider these gates as a religious relic. He expressly uses the words which Lord Ellenborough applies to them—namely, that they were a trophy taken from the Hindoos. Now as to the account which Gibbon gives of the incursions of Mahmoud upon the unoffending people who then inhabited the country of Hindoostan. He says,—“In this foreign narrative I may not consume a page; and a volume would scarcely suffice to recapitulate the battles and sieges of his twelve expeditions. Never was the Mussulman hero dismayed by the inclemency of the seasons, the height of the mountains, the breadth of the rivers, the barrenness of the desert, the multitudes of the enemy, or by the formidable array of their elephants of war. The Sultan of Ghuznee surpassed the limits of the conquests of Alexander; after a march of three months over the hills of Cashmir and Thibet, he reached the famous city of Kinnoe, on the Upper Ganges; and in a naval combat on one of the branches of the Indus he fought and vanquished 4000 boats of the natives. Delhi, Lahore, and Moulton were compelled to open their gates: the fertile kingdom of Guzerat attracted his ambition and tempted his stay, and his avarice indulged the fruitless project of discovering the golden and aromatic islands of the Southern Ocean.”

The result of these expeditions—of this continued hostility—was the transference of these gates, this trophy of war, as it is called by Lord Ellenborough, from Guzerat to Ghuznee. They have also been mentioned by more recent writers. I have no doubt my hon. friend has read the work of Dr. Kennedy, who thus speaks of these gates:—“It was with no ordinary feelings that I stood at Ghuznee, by the tomb of Mahomet of Ghuznee. My long residence in Guzerat, and intimate familiarity with its people, its history, and its traditions, had made this destroyer's name a sort of household word in my memory.”

Having resided at Guzerat for a long period, having heard the traditions of the people, and well knowing their feelings, he says that the destroyer's name was a sort of household word in his memory. What, then, must it have been in the memory of those whose ancestors he had pillaged and ruined? Dr. Kennedy says further, after speaking of “The direful history of this man's doings,”—“This man of blood sleeps in peace in a spot of great rural beauty. His direful ravages are consecrated by bigotry as holy wars against infidels.”

These direful ravages were consecrated by bigotry as holy wars! But when we recollect the treasure which this man had amassed from the direful devastation he committed, do not let us be too forward in attributing these “direful ravages” of war altogether to zeal for the faith which he professed. I say again, Sir, that Lord Ellenborough regarded these gates as most important trophies of war, and as trophies of war he considered their return to those from whom they had been wrested would be most acceptable. I sincerely believe that the thought never entered Lord Ellenborough's mind that by this act he could be considered as paying a compliment to the religion of the Hindoos, or that he would by it offend the religious feelings of the people of this country. I believe that he considered the gates trophies of war, and trophies of war alone, and that, as such, he restored them to the people who had been deprived of them. I think when my hon. friend speaks of the "restored temple of Somnauth," he puts an erroneous construction upon the words. I apprehend that, when Lord Ellenborough used those words, he was under the impression that the original temple of Somnauth, which had been restored by the wife of Holkar, still existed, and it was his intention to place the gates in that temple. I believe he never intended to give any instructions for the restoration of the temple. The expression cannot, I think, justify the belief that Lord Ellenborough meant to undertake the restoration of a ruined temple, that it might become the receptacle of these gates. I wish to have no concealment from the House on such a subject as this; though I am sure hon. gentlemen would not ask for the production of documents of a private nature. As I before stated, the government is not in possession, nor is the Court of Directors, of any official correspondence on this subject. But I cannot hold one language in this House while I am writing another language to India; and I freely admit that this proclamation has attracted the attention of the government, and that they have made such communications to India on the subject as they have thought consistent with their duty. To such a delicate subject I cannot make more direct allusion, but I may state generally that it has received the attention of the government, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will not press me to make known to the House, or publish to the world, the comments we have felt it our duty to make. I cannot, however, profess opinions in this House at variance with those which I hold, and which I have communicated to my noble friend. But, Sir, I think the question comes to this—is it consistent with justice and equity to take one particular act of a public man, and on account of that act to visit him with censure? Why, who is there who could stand under such an ordeal? What public man is there who, looking back upon his conduct for the preceding year, does not know that there have been errors—that there have been inadvertencies—that, from the pressure of business, there has been neglect; and are you to judge him, not by the tenor of his general conduct, but to select one particular act, and say,—“I move my abstract vote upon this; I charge you with neglect, or impolicy, or incaution, in one particular instance; do not plead your general conduct; do not refer to the services you have rendered; do not speak of the time and abilities you have employed in the public service; do not say that your strength is sinking, as a plea of justification for your neglect in this particular instance; I judge you by this one isolated public act.” When the right hon. gentleman brings forward his motion of distinct censure, I will appeal to the House to do justice towards Lord Ellenborough. I am not prepared to say that I will go all lengths in defence of this act and proclamation. I will not say, “I see no danger in it; there is no expression I object to; I think it a fit and proper compliment to be paid to the people of Hindoostan.” I will not take that course; but I will say that it will be destructive of the character of the nation, it must be a fatal check upon the energies of public men, if you once establish the precedent that you will not allow the general conduct and services of a public man, who may be acting at a distance of 5,000 miles, to be pleaded against a single act of indiscretion. Oh, I have too much confidence in the justice of this House to imagine that it will not draw a parallel between the 9th of February, 1842, and the 9th of February, 1843. I will tell you of the condition in which, when Lord Ellenborough landed in India, he found some of the men of the Madras army. I will tell you of what tidings were brought to him. I will appeal to your own feelings on this subject at this time last year. I will remind you of the description that was given of the greatest disaster that ever befell the British army, of the destruction of 17,000 men and women, through acts of the grossest treachery, of the despondency which the Governor-general found prevailing among some portions of his army; and then I will exhibit to you, in the course of ten months more, that same Governor-general at the head of 40,000 men, having effected the evacuation of the kingdom in which we suffered such reverses—having, on the scene of every former disaster, retrieved our honours—[the remainder of the sentence was rendered wholly inaudible by an enthusiastic burst of applause from all parts of the House.] I will show you these dispirited sepoy converted into an army, excited by enthusiasm, ready to contend, if they could be brought against them, with the best and most disciplined troops of Europe; and, then, exhibiting this contrast, I will remind you (addressing the Opposition) of the language you held on this subject at this time last year. I will then ask you whether it is consistent with justice, with decency, or with common sense, that you, whose policy has been reversed [loud cheers from the Ministerial side,] should take this single proclamation and tell the Governor-general, "True, you have conquered; true, you have re-established the British name in Afghanistan; true, you have created one universal feeling of security throughout Hindoostan; but you have issued an unwise, an improvident proclamation, and the reward of your labours shall be, disgrace and condemnation."

The motion having been modified and amended was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

FEBRUARY 17, 1843.

In the fifth night's debate on Viscount Howick's motion, that "This House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider so much of her Majesty's Speech as refers to that depression of the manufacturing interests of the country which has so long prevailed, and which her Majesty has so deeply lamented,"

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cobden) has stated here very emphatically, what he has more than once stated at the conferences of the anti-Corn-law league, that he holds me individually—[Great excitement]—individually responsible for the distress and suffering of the country; that he holds me personally responsible; but be the consequences of those insinuations what they may, never will I be influenced by menaces either in this House, or out of this House, to adopt a course which I consider—[The rest of the sentence was lost in shouts from various parts of the House.]

Mr. Cobden rose and said: I did not say that I held the right hon. gentleman personally responsible—[shouts of "Yes, yes," "You did, you did,"—cries of "Order," and "Chair."] [Sir Robert Peel: you did.] I have said that I hold the right hon. gentleman responsible, by virtue of his office—["No, no," much confusion]—as the whole context of what I said was sufficient to explain—["No, no," from the ministerial benches.]

Sir Robert Peel: Sir, the expression of the hon. gentleman was not that he held her Majesty's government responsible; but, addressing himself to me, he said, in the most emphatic manner, that he held me individually responsible [Cheers.—Sir James Graham handed a paper to Sir Robert Peel.] I do not want to overstate any thing. I am not certain, on reflection, whether the hon. gentleman used the word personally, but he did twice repeat that he held me individually responsible. I am perfectly certain of that. The hon. gentleman may do so, and may induce others to do the same, but I only notice his assertion for the purpose of saying, that it shall not influence me in the discharge of a public duty. Sir, I wish most sincerely that I had been able to conduct this discussion in the same manner and with the same temper with which we conducted most of the discussions on the tariff of last year. And now, I will separate altogether, in approaching this discussion, all that part of it which relates to public interests, to the welfare and well-being of the great body of society, from that which may be assumed to be more of a party and political character. I can do that with greater ease, because I must say that the noble lord, in the course of his speech, set the example of so conducting the discussion. It would be, indeed, a great advantage if we were enabled to discuss matters of such importance without reference to party interests or party recriminations. I will, then, conduct all the first part of what I have to deliver to the House on the principles on which the noble lord made his speech on introducing the motion. The noble lord proposes that the House should resolve itself into a committee, to consider that part of the speech from the throne which refers to the public distress. Sir, I approach the consideration of that motion, I trust, in a temper befitting the acknowledged and long-continued distresses of this country—in a temper, too, befitting the fortitude with which privations and distress have been borne. I will consider singly and exclusively whether the adoption of the motion of the noble lord is likely in its results to mitigate that distress, or revive prosperity. I make no objection to the form of the motion of the noble lord, if an objection in point of form could be made. There are occasions on which, if you can realise public advantage or mitigate severe distress, to urge technicalities against the administration of a remedy, would be most unwise and unbefitting the legislature of a great country. But, in point of form, there is no objection to be urged against the motion of the noble lord. That motion is perfectly constitutional, and liable to no objection in point of form. If any objections are to prevail against it, they must be objections of a substantial kind. To such only will I address myself. Many hon. gentlemen have mistaken the nature of the motion. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, and who assumed such a tone with regard to the motion, inferred that the noble lord proposed a committee of inquiry into manufacturing distress. The hon. gentleman said that his only objection to the motion was, that the inquiry was not to be more extensive, and did not include agricultural as well as commercial distress. Why, Sir, the noble lord proposes no inquiry whatever, in the sense in which the hon. gentleman refers to inquiry. The noble lord does not propose to inquire for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the present distress, and all those who are inclined to support his motion in the expectation of having such an inquiry instituted, will find themselves entirely disappointed if the noble lord should be successful. What the noble lord proposes is, that the House should resolve itself into a committee of the whole House for the purpose of considering the distress of the country, and then, I presume, he has some proposition to submit for the relief of the distress. I must own I think the general complexion of this debate has not been such as entirely to convince me, that with the numbers here present, and influenced by the feelings that naturally prevail on each side of the House, with only the change of having Mr. Green sitting at the table, instead of having the speaker in the chair, that any very useful consequences could arise from the discussions of measures under such circumstances. But when we have got into committee what will the noble lord do? What is the motion that the noble lord will make in committee? There is to be no inquiry. When the noble lord gets into committee, he will not content himself with having succeeded so far, but must pursue some course or other. What course will that be? Will the noble lord propose a series of measures founded on the principles of which he is the advocate—the principles of free-trade. If he does, what must be the inevitable consequence? All the functions of government must necessarily be suspended. I speak of government not in the party sense of the word. I speak of the executive government, of that which is entrusted with important functions, and which has hitherto been responsible for their performance,—responsible for performing the particular duty—of explaining the expenditure of the year, and the financial means of the year at a certain period of the session, and of proposing the financial measures of the year. If the noble lord succeed in his motion, those functions of the government must be completely suspended. Will the noble lord propose to deal with the sugar duties? But I will take matters of mere revenue, which do not operate in the slightest degree by way of protection; and with respect to which there can be no objection, from conflicting and rival interests. Take the case of tea. Will the noble lord touch that. We have a prospect of increased trade with China. If you lower the duties on tea, there will probably be a greater consumption; there will be an increased importation of tea, and probably an increased demand in China for the produce of this country. Will the noble lord, therefore, submit a proposition for the reduction of the duty on tea? Will he take the same course with respect to tobacco, and with respect to the duty on raw cotton? Some gentlemen, in the course of the debate, have urged the reduction of the duty on raw cotton as indispensable to the prosperity of our manufactures. The duty on wool has also been referred to. These are all articles with respect to which duties are imposed, not for the purpose of protection, but for the purpose of revenue. Suppose the noble lord proposes to reduce the duties on tea, tobacco, cotton, and wool,—I should like to ask him how any one entrusted with the financial affairs of this country can stir one step, or know what course to pursue. So much for matter of detail, if the noble lord enters into detail. In the same way, the functions of government with respect to commercial treaties, must be at once suspended. Suppose the noble lord think it desirable to reduce the duties on wine, or on fruits, what course are the government to take with respect to negotiations now pending, and which had been pending for the last four or five years. The late chancellor of the exchequer, some three years ago, took credit, or rather debited himself with a reduction of £300,000 in the revenue, consequent on the expected termination of a commercial treaty with France, on which negotiations have been pending ever since. If the noble lord deals with these questions of revenue, in this committee of the whole House, how is the executive government to proceed with respect to the preparation of financial measures, or the conduct of negotiations with foreign powers for the reciprocal reductions of import duties? It is clear that the functions of government would be suspended by the noble lord's success in carrying such a motion as this. And at what time does the noble lord come forward? Hitherto it has at least been the practice to give the government some time after the commencement of the session, until the estimates have been voted, and until a full review can be taken of the state of the finances of the country, before they are called upon to propose measures for providing the means for the year; but the noble lord within a fortnight after the commencement of the session, calls on the House to permit him to undertake this duty. And at what period also, respecting the revenue itself, does the noble lord propose this measure? At a period when probably the future produce of the yearly revenue is subject to peculiar uncertainty. It is difficult to foresee what will be the product of the income-tax. I made an estimate of it on the best grounds on which I could calculate; but we have not made sufficient progress in its collection to enable us to determine whether the estimate was well founded or not. At this particular period, the revenue has been affected by the measures of last session. It was affected by the discussion which preceded them; and yet the noble lord proposes to go into a committee of the whole House, for the purpose of considering measures affecting the finances of the country. Will the noble lord avoid the difficulty by contenting himself with moving some such general resolution as this—"Resolved, That the principles upon which the tariff of last year was founded ought to be carried to further extent?" Is that the motion which the noble lord would propose? There is to be no inquiry, and he must propose either a specific measure of details, or he must propose some general resolution, embodying a general principle. The noble lord has no alternative. If you could do any thing at the present moment to create uncertainty, to paralyse trade, to suspend all commercial speculations, it would be to move some general indefinite resolution like that, leaving every man uncertain as to what specific articles the general resolution was to be applied. This country has not yet recovered from the effect of the tariff of last year. The discussion which preceded that tariff necessarily added to commercial embarrassment. It was impossible it could be otherwise. During the whole time of the discussion, commercial men were in a state of uncertainty as to what would be the final resolve of the House of Commons, and there was a suspension of commercial dealings. It affected the consumption of timber, and affected almost every other article of importance which entered into the tariff of last year. If you now enter on the subject again, without indicating the articles of which you mean to alter the duties, you do more to diminish public confidence and add to commercial embarrassments, than by any other course you could take. One great evil has been a gradual diminution of prices. When there is a tendency to an increase of prices there is a tendency to commercial prosperity. The effect of a gradual increase of prices is well explained by Mr. Hume—David Hume, in one of his essays on trade. Threatened reductions in the tariff tend to produce declining prices, and a vague resolution, such as I have referred to, leaving it uncertain to what articles the principle was to be applied, so far from being a relief, would aggravate all the existing evils. I hope I have conducted the discussion on the principles which I laid down, avoiding all party considerations, and making my appeal to the reason of the House against the proposal of the noble lord. Mere success in carrying this motion would be only a triumph over the government. That the noble lord disclaims, and I must say, from the character of the speech with which he proposed the motion, I have confidence in the declaration of the noble lord. He does not seek a temporary triumph of party by his motion. He proposes it in order to give a hope of relief for the distress of the country. Inquiry is not intended. You are not to have the operation of the Corn-laws—you are not to have the operation of other restrictive laws investigated, but some proposition is to be made. I have attempted to show that that proposition must refer to details or to general principles—that the one would suspend and paralyse the functions of government, and the other would add to the existing embarrassment and distress. Sir, I do not oppose the noble lord's motion on the ground of denying the distress which prevails. There are but too many evidences of that distress. And when some of my right hon. friends refer to circumstances which rather appear to indicate a hope of more favourable times, they have done so, not for the purpose of denying the existence or extent of the distress, but for the purpose of meeting arguments used by hon. gentlemen, and showing that in some cases there have been exaggerations of the degree of distress. And one hon. gentleman, the member for Manchester, (Mr. M. Gibson) has charged my right hon. friend with having made a statement, founded upon Mr. Horner's report, which is not confirmed by the details of that report. But then the hon. gentleman referred to the report of Mr. Horner for autumn last. Might it not have occurred to the hon. gentleman that an improvement might have taken place between autumn and January? Now, on the 30th of January, Mr. Horner did make a report, and, with respect to the new buildings, he did use this language:—"In the course of last year, forty-nine new concerns were set to work, having 1,378 horses' power, and employing 3,490 persons. Calculating five persons to each horse power, the usual rough estimate, when these mills are in full work they will give employment to 7,000 persons. Some of them are new buildings, and some of these are additions to pre-existing buildings; in other cases, the occupiers have removed from smaller to larger premises; but in all of them the parties must have invested new capital; and it would be irrational to suppose otherwise than that all of them have entered upon a branch of trade which they believed to hold out a fair prospect of yielding a remunerating profit. The greater part of the information from which these tables have been constructed, was collected between the beginning of September and the middle of November—that is, before there were any symptoms of that revival which began about the latter date; so that if it had been possible to give the actual state of the mills in the present week, there is every probability that a comparison with the same time last year would give a still more favourable result than I have shown above. I have formed this opinion, not merely on general reports of improved trade, but from facts such as the following, contained in returns recently received from the superintendents in my district:—Mr. Superintendent Davies, resident at Ashton-under-Line, reports to me, that on visiting the mills of A on the 9th of November, 1842, 252 looms were standing; on the 18th of this month all were at work, and 22 added. On the 10th of November, 1842, B had 500 looms, and 2-5ths of the spinning machinery stopped: on the 18th of January, only 250 looms, and 1-4th of the spinning machinery stopped. On the 28th of October, C had 186 looms stopped; on the 18th of January all were at work. In July, 1842, D had 252 looms stopped, and eight pair of mules working short time; in January, 1843, all were at work, and on full time. In July, 1842, E had 190 looms stopped; in January, 1843, all were at work. In July, 1842, F had 167 looms stopped; in January, 1843, nearly all were at work."

Do not let me be misunderstood. Mind—I do not deny the existence of great distress. If the noble lord's motion could really and truly tend to relieve the country, we have, I say, such full and ample evidence of that distress as to induce me to enter into the committee that he desires. But when gentlemen say, that we are in a worse state in January than we were in October, then I wish to show you that in that statement there is exaggeration. That is the remark I have to make upon that point. I have, Sir, little more to say of the reason why the government cannot, and why the House ought not to assent to the motion of the noble lord. But then, during the course of this discussion, I have been condemned by many gentlemen for the course which I pursued, in the last session, with respect to the tariff, and the principles on which it professed to be founded, and for the declarations which I made in the course of the present session. I will refer first to the principles on which the government acted in proposing the tariff of last year. In undertaking to revise the commercial code of this country—I beg the House to recollect the circumstances under which it was undertaken. There was in that year, and there had been for several preceding years, a great deficiency in the amount of the revenue. This country, too, was engaged in two wars. The East-India Company was interested in the one—that carried on to the west of the Indus, and the other the war with China. It was, under these circumstances, that her Majesty's government undertook the revision of the commercial code. There was a deficiency of £2,400,000, or of a sum something nearer £3,000,000. That deficiency did not deter us from undertaking what we thought would be beneficial to the commerce of the country. But, in order to revise our duties, it was necessary to create a new deficiency; and we, Sir, did not shrink from performing that which we felt to be necessary, because it compelled us to perform the unpopular act, which nothing but a sense of our duty could reconcile us to, of calling upon the country to submit to an income-tax in a time of peace. Without that tax, we could not have proposed a revision of the tariff, when we had to create a new deficiency of £1,200,000. But in the face of those wars—in the face of this deficiency—in the face of that deficiency which a reform in the tariff must create, we undertook the revision of our commercial code. I announced the principles on which that revision was to be undertaken. I ask, if it were possible to have undertaken a revision of the whole of our Customs' duties without having explained the general principles on which that revision was to have proceeded. There were two principles between which we had to choose, the principle of protection to the native industry, or to abandon prohibitory duties, and relax commercial restrictions. We had to take either one or the other, and we declared that we thought that the principle of protection could be carried no further in the abstract. I repeat the word, notwithstanding the objections of the hon. gentleman to the term. In the abstract he said, that protection was not to be defended as the permanent system of this country. We thought, that a revision of the commercial code ought to proceed upon the principle of abandoning prohibitory duties, and relaxing the restrictions on commerce, and now I am taunted for not carrying out that principle to all its legitimate and logical consequences, and told that I am not to pay any regard to specific or peculiar circumstances, and not to give any consideration to long vested interests! But when I stated that I thought that the pervading principle ought to be rather a relaxation of restrictions, than an increase of protection, I accompanied the declaration of that abstract principle with a distinct declaration that that principle, admitted to be a wise one, ought to be applied, in a country like this, with great caution and great circumspection—first, because we ought not lightly to affect great interests, which had grown up to great importance under long-enjoyed protection; and, secondly, because you ought not, by the course that you pursued, to throw discredit upon the principle you sought to enforce, by applying it so rashly and indiscriminately, as to cause more evil than good, and produce a doubt in the truth of the principle itself. I stated at the time that it was with those qualifications I should apply the principle, and in taking that course, I am justified by the conduct of those who had preceded me, who had advocated those principles, and set the example of removing commercial restrictions. When Mr. Huskisson, in 1825, proposed his revision of the commercial law of this country, the language he used I will read to the House. Mr. Huskisson was a great commercial reformer, a practical reformer, who felt all the responsibility, and anticipated all the consequences of his acts, and the House will see how he qualified the general principles of which he advocated the adoption. Mr. Huskisson, on the 21st March, 1825, used these words:—"I can assure the committee, that if I am about to recommend alterations which are at variance with the ancient sentiments of this country, in respect to colonial policy and trade, it is not because I consider the views of our ancestors as necessarily erroneous, or that innovation must necessarily be improvement; but it is because the circumstances and state of the world, in which we have to examine colonial interests, have changed: and it becomes us, as practical statesmen, to deal with those interests with a reference to that change. It is only in this sense, and with this qualification, that I desire to be looked upon as an innovator. I am not anxious to give effect to new principles, where circumstances do not call for their application; feeling as I do, from no small experience in public business—and every day confirms that feeling—how much, in the vast and complex interests of this country, do general theories, however incontrovertible in the abstract, require to be weighed with a calm circumspection, to be directed by a temperate discretion, and to be adapted to all the existing relations of society with a careful hand, and a due regard to the establishments and institutions which have grown up under those relations."

Are not these, I ask, the words of practical wisdom? They were used when that great commercial reformer undertook large and most important reforms in our commercial code. Do we not find here the prudence of a practical man, who, while he laid down general principles, thought it right and proper that they should be accompanied by circumspection in their application? Now take other men who have not been responsible for the practical consequences of the principles that they desired to see acted upon—take one who carried the principles of free-trade as far as any gentleman of the House—take the highest authority, for so I must still call him; for it appears to me that all—not all, but many subsequent writers on political economy, have only tended to confound by their observations that which was elucidated by Adam Smith; at least the doctrines propounded by Adam Smith, to my apprehension, appear more clear and satisfactory than those of his commentators. Take Adam Smith, and no man went further in advocating free-trade, the abolition of restrictive duties, and what does he say? This is the way that with reference to a state of society constituted like ours, he qualifies his doctrines. He says—"The case in which it may sometimes be a matter of deliberation how far, or in what manner it is proper to restore the free importation of foreign goods, after it has been for some time interrupted is, when particular manufactures, by means of high duties or prohibitions upon all foreign goods which can come into competition with them, have been so far extended as to employ a great multitude of hands."

But you will not allow agriculture to be reckoned a manufacture, or entitled to those benefits laid down as properly belonging to a manufacture by this great authority. But to continue my extract—"Humanity may in this case require that the freedom of trade should be restored only by slow gradations, and with a good deal of reserve and circumspection. Were those high duties and prohibitions taken away all at once, cheaper foreign goods of the same kind might be poured so fast into the home market, as to deprive all at once many thousands of our people of their ordinary employment and means of subsistence."

These are the words of the theoretical writer—of a writer not responsible for the practical application of his views, but they correspond with the doctrine of the practical reformer—of a minister of the Crown who did lie under responsibility. And, Sir, following in the footsteps of these great authorities with respect to our commercial principles, I accompanied their enunciation with a respectful admonition to the House to apply those principles with great circumspection—with great caution. It is said, however, that we did absolutely nothing by the tariff, that it was a mere delusion. Is that true? What did we do in that tariff to which you now attach so little value? Sir, in respect to articles of raw produce, constituting the elements of manufactures, in respect to almost all these articles we reduced the duty payable on their importation—in some cases we reduced it to five, and in other cases to two per cent. And where exceptions were made they were allowed on the ground of revenue. Take for example the case of cotton wool. I am here speaking of raw produce, the materials of manufactures. Take, I say, the case of cotton wool; the duty on which was retained on account of the revenue. With respect to articles half manufactured, if I may so speak—half raw and half manufactured—the general rule was to reduce the duty to ten or twelve per cent. With respect to articles of manufactures, the general rule was, to impose a duty of 20 per cent. Exceptions were made from these reductions in favour of certain articles, but they were made in favour of weak and unprotected interests. The claims of the cork-cutters, for example, were urged by the hon. member for Finsbury—the claims of the straw manufacturers were also among those urged—and when exceptions were made from the general reduction which the tariff effected, they were made in favour of branches of manufacture of that nature for which there could be no ground for making exception other than the desire to protect the fair interests of the parties concerned. We did except certain great articles. We excepted some on the ground of negotiations pending with respect to them. In the case of wine—in the case of brandy—in the case, I think, of vinegar—in the case of French fruits, and in those of several other articles, we did not reduce the duty in order that we might employ those duties as instruments of negotiation, with a view of effecting a reduction in the duties imposed by other countries on the produce of our own industry. I am not disposed to carry too far that principle of withholding from ourselves the benefits of reduction of duties, in order to force other nations to act in a reciprocal manner, and in many cases we weakened the effect of instruments we held in our own hands, by reducing the duties of articles relative to which negotiations might have been entered into. Our general rule was, that in cases where the articles were elements of manufacture, or where there was risk from smuggling, we took to ourselves the advantage likely to arise from a reduction of duty on these articles; but on others, wine for example, we made no reduction of duty, and intend to make no reduction of duty, in the hope that we shall thus induce other countries to give to us an equivalent advantage; and with respect to cases in which the articles in question are articles of luxury. I do think—as I presume the late government also thought—that before you consent to a reduction of the duties—on French wines for example, that you should attempt to prevail upon France to permit hardwares and cutlery from Sheffield to enter her dominions, a greater advantage to this country than that derived under the existing system. Indeed, it would not, I believe, be satisfactory to the country if we were to reduce the duty at once on articles like wine—articles of luxury, used only by the wealthier classes, without making an attempt to procure from the grower of the wine some corresponding advantage to the people of this country. These were the cases in which we excepted certain articles from the operation of the tariff; and it is by withholding them that we may hope that negotiations—negotiations I am sorry to say too long pending—may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. But we cannot be fairly charged, by those who have been parties to pending commercial negotiations, with having reserved too many articles from the operation of the general plan of reduction imposed by the tariff, and reducing the duties upon them without continuing these negotiations—we excepted silk, and wine, and brandy. During the discussion upon the tariff no one proposed that we should at once part with all the advantages while negotiations were pending, which the duties on these articles gave us. [Viscount Howick contended that the operation of the tariff ought to have been made universal.] Such might have been the noble lord's views; but I am sure that the general sense of the House—I do not mean to include the opinions of every particular member of it; the general sense of the House was in favour of the reduction upon the duty of the articles referred to being reserved, until further progress had been made in pending negotiations. I certainly did not apply the tariff to the article of sugar—and I admit at once that there can be no article of greater importance to this country than sugar—no article with respect to which a reduction of price would be of more importance. But this I can with truth affirm, that it was no desire to protect great monopolies, which induced us to reserve the reduction upon sugar. Whenever you do deal with that article, I doubt whether you will not deal with it in a manner which will be for the advantage of the West Indies, as well as for that of the grower of foreign sugar. We reserved the article of sugar partly with the view of using it as an instrument for the purpose of effecting reductions in the import duties payable upon our produce in foreign sugar-growing countries; but much more on this ground, that we did not deem it right to give a free unlimited admission to foreign sugar, without any reference to the consideration as to whether it was the produce of free or of slave labour. I said this should be our ruling principle when I was in opposition; I maintained it last session in office, and I still adhere to it. Certainly you should, if it be in your power, attempt to make stipulations in favour, not only of the abolition of the slave-trade, but for the modification of slavery itself. You should attempt to obtain conditions with respect to the state of slavery before you grant the indiscriminate reduction of duty. I expressed this opinion last year and acted upon it, and I still maintain it; and considering the discussion in which this country was lately involved—considering the position it has maintained with respect to America—considering the principles which it has maintained with respect to France—I do say, that there never was a period when it was more important that this country should prove to the world that she did not relax, for the purpose of obtaining pecuniary advantage, those institutions which she formerly maintained. There has been a great disposition to charge this country with having being influenced to the suppression of slavery by the pressure of mercantile considerations; and it certainly would abate our moral influence, if we did lightly, for the sake of a free-trade in sugar, abandon the opportunity of making such a trade instrumental in ameliorating slavery in sugar-growing countries. I say no more on this point. When I was asked, at the beginning of the session, what particular article should be subjected to a reduction of duty, I declined to answer, on the ground that it was not fair to make such a selection, and to inquire into the intentions of government as to proposed changes at the very opening of the session. But, at any rate, we can see what has happened with regard to the timber duties. The opposition made to the change I proposed to those duties was, that I went much farther than her Majesty's late government, and that I was sacrificing a large portion of revenue in the hope of reducing the price of timber. We permitted colonial timber to come in at a mere nominal duty, and we greatly reduced the price of Baltic timber. But, says the hon. gentleman opposite, "you have done nothing for the consumer. You have merely lost a revenue, without reducing the price of timber." That is not the fact. There has been a great diminution in the price of timber. Sir, I quite admit that, in the present state of the country, it is not very easy to determine how far the reduction in price is referable to the diminished duty or the diminished demand; but that there has been a great reduction in the price of timber cannot be doubted for a moment. I hold in my hand a comparative statement of the prices paid for timber in the dock-yards, during the years 1841 and 1842. In 1841 Riga timber was £5 : 6 : 6d. a load; in 1842, after the 10th October, it was £4 : 2 : 6d. In the first year Dantzic timber was £5 : 4 : 9d.; in 1842, £3 : 18 : 9d. In deals there was no such difference, for the duty did not apply. In the first year Canadian red pine was £4 : 16 : 6d; in the second, £3 : 16 : 6d. In the first yellow pine was £4 3s.; in the latter, £3 1s. In the first year, Stockholm timber was £4 10s.; in the latter, £3 1s. Now, so far as an absolute reduction of price, it has unquestionably taken place to an extent at least equivalent to the abatement of the duty. I admit, as I said before, that the same causes may have influenced the depression of price in timber as those which operated in the case of other articles. But, says the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cobden), "you reduce the price of timber when there are no factories to be built;" as if there was nothing else in the world but factories. I don't undervalue the importance of factories; but to say that, when bridges, houses, and various other buildings are always to be constructed or repaired, no advantage is derived in the great reduction of the price of timber, simply because no additional cotton mills are required, is an argument which only indicates that the hon. gentleman's notion of commercial prosperity and the happiness of the nation all centre in the erection of cotton mills throughout the country. I think I can establish the importance of the alteration by the words of Mr. Deacon Hume, for there was no one article to which he attached greater importance than timber. He said:—"You have coal and iron cheap; make timber cheap too, and you have the three great elements of commercial prosperity."

And although factories are not building, and mill-owners have not derived any advantage from the reduction which has lately been effected in the price of timber, yet the hon. gentleman would find it very difficult to convince the great bulk of the community that they have derived no advantage from the diminution in the price of timber. We come next to articles of human subsistence. It is said we did nothing in the tariff respecting such articles, because, in order to conciliate the good will of our supporters we were afraid to touch them effectually. Why, we found cattle prohibited, and salt meat subject to high duties; we diminished the duties, and remitted the prohibition. But it is said that not the slightest benefit accrued from the reduction, or the abolition of the prohibition: that the change has not varied in the slightest degree the price of meat. If I retained the prohibition and the high duties, what would be said? How you would dwell on the importance of the traffic in meat and cattle, and charge me with obstructing the commercial prosperity of the country. But I reduced the duty on meat to an amount fixed at so moderate a rate, that you (the opposition) did not object to it, and I took away the prohibition from the importation of cattle, and now you say that the change has not been attended with the slightest advantage—that it is all a mockery and delusion. Sir, when that language is held with respect to those articles of subsistence, it leads me to think that you greatly overrate the advantages which you now say are to be derived from a free-trade in corn. Why, what said the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring) the other night? He did not say that we manifested any desire to sacrifice the permanent interests of the country for the attainment of political or party advantages. On the contrary, the right hon. gentleman proclaimed that we perilled the existence of the government by removing the prohibition on cattle, and that if it were not for the forbearance of the opposition, we should have been left in a minority, and been compelled to relinquish the reins of power. Well, according to the right hon. gentleman's representation, we are entitled to credit; for how could we have given a greater proof that we were bent on pursuing what we believed was for the public advantage, than to stake our existence as a government on the removal of this prohibition? And when the right hon. gentleman claims credit for supporting me on the reduction of duty, he ought at least to admit that we were not desirous of deferring to opinions in which we did not partake, or of sacrificing the public welfare for the sake of conciliating our supporters. Now, with respect to the corn-laws. I did certainly retain the principle of a fluctuating scale. It was said, when I proposed that measure, that it would be of no advantage in diminishing the price of corn. It was said that I was rendering the exclusion of foreign corn more strict by the addition of new towns in taking the averages. It was said too that the Bank of England would be exhausted of its gold in consequence of the adoption of the sliding-scale. But you cannot deny that there has been a great reduction in the price. Oh, but it is now said that it is entirely owing to the harvest. But you prophesied that the harvest would be an unproductive one. There is no doubt that it is very difficult to determine to what cause the fall of price is owing, but at any rate you cannot deny that there has been a considerable reduction. Now, take the prices—and you will see the reduction effected, no doubt, by the harvest as a main cause,—for the last six years. On the 2nd January, 1836, wheat was 59s. per quarter; in January, 1838, it was 52s. 4d. per quarter; in January, 1839, it was 78s. 2d. per quarter; in January, 1840, it was 68s. 5d. per quarter; in January, 1841, it was 61s. 8d. per quarter; in January, 1842, it was 63s. 1d. per quarter; and in January, 1843, it was 46s. 11d. per quarter. Now, it is said that the reduction in price is no benefit whatever. I confess that this is a most discouraging statement, when we compare such comments with the predictions indulged in before any alteration was made. Now, if ever a principle were maintained by the hon. gentlemen opposite, it was that the high price of provisions was the main cause of the depression of trade, and of the diminished consumption of articles of manufacture. A pamphlet was written by an hon. gentleman, an active member of the Anti-Corn-law League, which gave the price of corn and other articles of subsistence for some years past, and in which it was contended that twenty millions of additional capital was applied to the purchase of articles of food, and withdrawn from the purchase of manufactures; and the great evils of the country were attributed to the high prices of provisions. From some cause or other you have now a low price, and now the doctrine is, it does not matter a farthing what the price of provisions is—the great panacea is a free-trade in corn. Well, with respect to the objections to the new towns. I introduced them to prevent frauds. Some said I had a covert intention of increasing protection; some said that I should diminish the prices in the new towns, and raise the duty on foreign corn. What is the result? In twenty-five cases, with one exception, the price in the new towns has been higher than in the old. Thus I did take a double security against fraud without any increase of protection. I am charged with leaving the law in a state of uncertainty—with implying a secret reserve to alter the law next session. Now the fact is, a minister answers questions in his place in parliament under great disadvantages. A minister desires to give every information that he can on public concerns consistent with public duty. On the first night of the session the question was addressed to me—"Do you intend to alter the corn-laws this session?" My answer was—"I do not." Then it was said I had made a voluntary declaration that I would not alter them this session, but that I had made a reserve with a view to a succeeding session. Now, in these cases, much depends on the animus of the questioner. Of course the hon. gentleman who put the question to me was specifying the present session, and never thought of asking me—do you, in the course of the next or of any future session, intend to propose an alteration in the existing law? When the question was put to me, whether I contemplated any alteration in the present session, I answered frankly—I do not. To this some gentlemen immediately say—See in what state of uncertainty you leave the law. You, as minister, defer the course you mean to take. You will do nothing this session, but you do not say you will abide by your law. Abide! Sir, I do not undertake to say I will abide by any law, but I will say this—I do not now contemplate any alteration in the law; I see nothing in the experience of the last four or five months to induce me to take a different view of the question from what I did last session; but if I am asked whether I will undertake, whatever may be my experience, whatever may be the proof of failure that may force itself upon my conviction—I say, if after such proof and experience of failure, I am asked whether, in order to purchase support, I will make a stipulation to adhere to a law that shall have failed, I say at once that there is no support that I will consent to purchase on such conditions. In a matter of this kind, which cannot be considered to involve a vital question, which cannot be supposed to endanger the monarchy, for instance, or the union of the kingdom—in a matter of this kind, I say, I should be unworthy the station I hold, if, as a minister, I were to undertake to maintain the law one hour after I had become convinced that the public interest demanded its abrogation. If, however, this law is to be altered, what is the principle on which the alteration is to take place? If the noble lord brings forward a motion of this sort, and if the real object of that motion is to obtain an alteration of the Corn-laws, I have a right to ask the supporters of the noble lord what their real views are? If they succeed in this motion, they must be well aware that not one hour could elapse without their being called upon to make a full statement of their intentions. Does the noble lord mean to adhere unalterably to the principle of a fixed duty? See what taunts the right hon. gentleman, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, threw out against me, under an idea that I might not adhere unalterably to my own measure; yet what was the conduct of the right hon. gentlemen opposite with their own plan for the settlement of the Corn-laws? They first brought forward the proposition of a fixed duty, but before they even approached the introduction of their own bill, the noble lord declared that his views had undergone a change. We argued that a fixed duty was altogether delusive as a protection to agriculture, because in a season of great scarcity, or when corn rose to an average of 73s. or 75s., it would be found utterly impossible to levy the fixed duty. The noble lord, in proportion as he gave more consideration to the question, began to see that this was the case, and then the noble lord avowed himself ready to modify his own law in this respect, and declared that he was ready to abandon his fixed duty under a pressure of high prices. The noble lord, whose friends now demand that I, as minister, shall either abandon this law, or pledge myself to maintain it irrevocably under all circumstances, the noble lord himself, before he approached the introduction of his own bill, claimed, and justly claimed, for himself the privilege of modifying his views. He determined to retain the system of averages, and when wheat approached the price of 75s., he admitted that his fixed duty could not be enforced. And the noble lord was quite right to claim for himself this privilege; but I do say those who concede this privilege to the noble lord, ought not to be so strict in demanding of his opponents that they shall irrevocably adhere to a measure they have once adopted. Between the noble lord and ourselves there is, in point of fact, no difference of principle. The noble lord contends for the necessity of a protective duty. But then the noble lord contends also that a fixed duty would have the effect of establishing a regular trade in corn, and would have the effect of securing an active intercourse with the United States of America. Well, the noble lord vindicates a fixed duty of 8s., on the ground that the landed interest is entitled to protection, and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer calls upon us to settle the question. To settle the question! Does the right hon. gentleman really feel confident that a fixed duty of 8s. will settle the question? Does he feel confident that such a fixed duty will put an end to agitation, and lead to the immediate dispersing of the anti-Corn-law league? Why, this very night we were told by the hon. member for Salford, that a fixed duty of 8s. would be equivalent to a tax on corn of £20,000,000. This, I admit, was a very extravagant calculation; but supposing a fixed duty of 8s. to be in force, and wheat at 75s., if the hon. gentleman even approaches the truth, if he supposes the tax to be only one-half of his first estimate, if he calculates it only at £10,000,000 instead of £20,000,000, will any man tell me that it will not be the hon. member's intention to go on agitating the question till he obtain the repeal of the 8s.? My objection to a fixed duty is, that it presses with peculiar severity upon the consumer when corn is high, and it equally presses upon the producer when prices are low. I shall be told, indeed, that a fixed duty will lead to a greater regularity in the trade; but I say there are circumstances which make it impossible, under any state of the law, to calculate upon stationary prices for such an article as corn. Even in New York itself, when prices have in no way been influenced by a demand from this country, there have been as great variations in price, under a system of complete free-trade, as in England under the sliding-scale. The two noble lords opposite are agreed as to the amount of a fixed duty, but the noble lord, the member for Tiverton, would maintain it, not as a protection to agriculturists, but with a view to a revenue. If the noble lord the member for London is wrong, if the landed interest be not entitled to protection from the importation of foreign corn, if it be not necessary to restrict the importation of foreign corn for the purpose of preventing too great dependence on foreign supply, if those two positions be conceded, I will venture to say that a fixed duty of 8s. on foreign corn, for the purpose of revenue, would not be maintained for two months. Observe the noble lord, the member for Tiverton, denies that there is any necessity for protection; he would impose a fixed duty of 8s. on foreign corn for the mere purpose of gaining revenue. The noble lord cannot resist the inference, that if the landed interest have no need of protection, and if corn be a fit subject of taxation, corn that is the produce of your own country ought to be liable to taxation. He cannot resist the argument that the duty ought not to be one of 8s. on the importation of foreign corn, but 4s. on foreign corn, and 4s. on home-grown corn, the duty to be collected, for greater convenience, at the mill at which it is ground. The noble lord wishes to maintain a duty of 8s. for the purpose of revenue. What, then, would be the state of the case? You levy a duty of £5,000,000 on one species of corn which is your own produce—I mean malt. And would you levy a duty of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 on foreign wheat, and no duty whatever on home-grown wheat, if the landed interest be not entitled to protection? It is quite clear, you would in that case, be reversing the principle on which you proceed in the case of barley. You derive nothing from foreign grain in the article of barley. You derive your whole revenue from barley, the produce of your own country, and the noble lord would derive the whole of his revenue from wheat, the produce of other countries, and exempt wheat which is the growth of his own country from any part of the duty. Therefore, I think the noble lord's (Lord John Russell's) principle of vindicating his fixed duty, because the agricultural interest is entitled to protection, is, at least, a better ground to assume than that which is stated by his noble friend, who claims the duty on foreign corn for the mere purpose of revenue. The other alternative is the absolute and total abrogation of the Corn-laws. I must say I entertain firmly the opinion that if you were at once to give effect to your views, and permit the free and unrestricted importation of foreign corn, you would displace such a mass of productive industry in this country as would greatly aggravate the present distress. Seeing nothing in the experience of the working of the present law to induce me to change the views I expressed in the course of last session, believing that the application of a fixed duty would have no more tendency to settle this question than the retention of the present law, believing that the total repeal of the Corn-laws would be most injurious to the interests of this country, I cannot consent to the measures which are proposed as a substitute for the existing Corn-laws. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. F. T. Baring) who spoke last night with so much animation—a degree of animation which I have not witnessed in this House since the day that he detected a differential duty on colonial asses, charged the present government with having unsettled every thing, and settled nothing—that is to say, that we, who have so far at least reformed the commercial code of this country, that we have reduced the duties on raw produce, and the elements of manufactures to less than 5 per cent. in every case, the duties on half manufactured articles to 10 or 12 per cent., and the duties on manufactured articles to 20 per cent., that her Majesty's government have unsettled every thing, and settled nothing. The right hon. gentleman acquiesces in his present motion, which, although I am confident, is not brought forward by the noble lord with that view, yet clearly appears after the comments made on it by the noble lord's friend, the hon. member for Halifax and others, to be in effect, whatever it may be in intention, an implied censure on government for not having brought forward some other measure of extensive relief. Sir, nothing is so easy as to call for measures of relief, and to insist on government proposing an immediate relief for the public distress. I am afraid that at all times, and under all circumstances, governments are liable to such a demand; but it is much easier to make that demand than to comply with it; but I think it rather hard, that this charge of having unsettled every thing and settled nothing, should proceed from our predecessors in office. I should like to compare the course which the late government took in 1840 with the course I and my colleagues took in 1842. Sir, it is with unaffected regret that I enter into those party conflicts on a question of this kind. I wish most heartily and sincerely, that the right hon. gentleman had in this respect followed the example of the noble lord. I think these mere party topics are misplaced on a question of this kind, and on an occasion like the present; but when party attacks are made with great acrimony, there is no alternative but to defend one's self. In 1840, noble lords and right hon. gentlemen opposite were in possession of power. They now declare themselves the great, the uniform, the consistent advocates of the principle of free-trade, and maintain that they have always looked to the relaxation of commercial restrictions as the true foundation of national prosperity, and sometimes they charge us with being the servile adherents of the opposite system, while they are constantly drawing a contrast between the weak and inefficient measures of the present government and those which they themselves adopted when in possession of power. I will not take the measures which they attempted to bring under our consideration when they were in their last extremity. Every great sinner, if you judge of him when his end is approaching and he is greatly alarmed for his existence, when he makes vows of a better life, seems a moral man; if you were to judge of him from that period of his life only, you might think highly of his moral qualities, but the time to judge of his adherence to great principles is not when he is in the hour of dying, but when he has strength to give effect to his intentions. If as minister you had not strength to give effect to your principles, you might have given proofs of the sincerity of your conviction, by sacrificing power and place for the sake of adhering to them. I will not dwell, therefore, on the conduct of the late government in 1841, when there were significant proofs given that their tenure of power was very precarious; but I will go to the year 1840, when the indications of approaching dissolution were not quite so clear and certain, and I will compare the acts of the late government, in 1840, with the acts of the present government, who are said to have settled nothing and unsettled every thing. In 1840 there had been a continuance of severe distress—there had been a great suffering. That was the time to have declared to parliament that you looked to the removal of commercial restrictions for the restoration of prosperity. You say we admit the existence of general and severe distress, and yet we have done nothing in the course of the present session to relieve it. Why, you did the same in 1840. On the 16th of January, 1840, you put these words into the mouth of her Majesty:—"My lords and gentlemen—I learn with great sorrow that the commercial embarrassments which have taken place in this and other countries have subjected many of the manufacturing districts to severe distress"—

Words not very different from those which her Majesty has made use of in the speech of 1843. Now, what were the great measures of commercial relief which you brought forward in 1840? You charge us with the abandonment of principle in not carrying out our principles to their legitimate extent? What was the course you yourselves pursued in 1840? Look at the course you then took with reference to the article on sugar. It would appear from the language you now hold as if you had been straining every nerve, and making every sacrifice, for the purpose of obtaining the free admission of sugar. This was in no remote period—in 1840. The distress had then been of great extent and long duration. If you were so thoroughly convinced of the truth of your principles, 1840 was the time to assert them, and to maintain your opinions at any hazard. But the late Chancellor of the Exchequer tells me it is, above all things pernicious not to allow a reduction of duty on sugar—a great article of consumption. Who ever heard of such misconduct (exclaimed the late Chancellor of the Exchequer) on the part of a government? But what did you, the late government do, as to sugar? In 1840, a year of distress, after you had admitted the existence of the distress in her Majesty's Speech, a motion was made on the subject of "sugar," by the hon. member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart), and to this effect:—That the duties on foreign sugar should be reduced from 63*s.* to 35*s.* per cwt. There was an opportunity for the vindication of your principles. There was a duty of 63*s.* existing upon the importation of foreign sugar; and the hon. member for Dumfries proposed to reduce it to 35*s.* Why, he was vigorously opposed by her Majesty's ministers. On a division, the Noes were 122, and the Ayes 27; and this motion for the reduction of the sugar duties was negatived by a majority of 95. The tellers for the majority on that occasion were Mr. Tuffnell and Sir T. Troubridge. But what course did those who now call for the importation of foreign sugar take upon that occasion? Every one of the then ministers voted against the motion of the hon. member for Dumfries. Nay more, they assigned as a reason for so doing, that there ought to be a distinction between sugar the produce of free-labour, and sugar the produce of slave-labour; at least they urged that that was a most important consideration. True, they said, coffee and other articles are the produce of slave-labour; but there is a material distinction between the two articles, and we will not admit foreign slave-made sugar. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is now for settling the trade, rejected the hon. member for Dumfries' motion in 1840, though distress was pressing and severe, and the right hon. gentleman used all the influence of government against it. As far as language and argument can be depended upon, the speculators in sugar were at that moment led to suppose that the duties would be maintained. In 1841, however, when the pressure upon the government became very great, they themselves proposed a reduction of the duties on sugar, and charged their adversaries with indifference to the sufferings of the people, because they would persist in voting in 1841 as they had voted in 1840. Was that the way to settle trade? Was that the way to give confidence to colonial proprietors and merchants who trade in foreign sugar?—to resist in 1840, on grounds, which I admit, were not stated as permanent, but on grounds infinitely more uncertain than any thing which I have said respecting the corn-law—a proposition for reducing the sugar duties, and then, in 1841, to propose to reduce them yourselves? Do I complain of you for proposing that reduction? Do I deny you the right, if your views altered, and you saw reason to propose a change, to make it? No, I do not; but I do think that you ought to have some little toleration, and exercise some charity, before you make indiscriminate and acrimonious attacks upon your political opponents, much less obnoxious to them than yourselves? Well, but the corn-laws. You charge us with causing uncertainty about the corn-law. Who would not suppose, from the tenor of this debate, and the charges made against me, that hon. gentlemen were actually martyrs to the cause of corn-law repeal. To hear them talk, any one would believe that they had, during the last seven or eight years, been advocating an alteration of the corn-laws, as the one great panacea for the national distress. The question of the corn-laws was brought forward in the House of Lords in 1840. Uncertainty about the corn-laws! Does it add to certainty to make the corn-laws an open question? Does it add to certainty to have no opinion, as a government, on the subject? This is a question to which you profess to attach great importance. You say that it ought to be settled, in order that the public mind may be relieved, and the agriculturists know to what extent they may invest their capital: that a man who takes a lease of a farm for nineteen or twenty-one years may know what he has to depend upon. Is it consistent with such language as this, that during five or six years you permitted the corn-laws to be an open question? The question of the corn-laws was brought under the consideration of the House of Lords by Earl Fitzwilliam in 1840, and one member of the government voted for the noble Earl's motion. The Earl of Clarendon upon that occasion said:—"It would be untrue were he to say that he had any hope or expectation that their lordships would agree to the noble earl's motion, but he should still deeply regret a contrary decision, because negating the resolution would affirm that the present law required no change, and, therefore, admitted of no consideration."

There was the dictum of one of the ministers—he would be sorry to see the resolution negated, because that would imply there was to be no change in the existing law! Well, but the head of the government and the organ of the government—he who spoke the collective opinion of the cabinet on such a great question also addressed the House, and held this language:—"Indeed, upon the motion itself, as presented to the House by his noble friend, he had very little difficulty. For the noble earl proposed, that 'it was expedient to enter into an inquiry upon this subject.' Now, he (Lord Melbourne) was distinctly of opinion, that it was inexpedient."

Here is a mode of giving confidence to the agriculturists, and letting the men who take leases know what they have to depend upon. To think, after this, of my being condemned because I do not think it quite wise to pledge myself for ever to the maintenance of the existing law. Lord Melbourne went on to say:—"Yet he would guard himself against being supposed to pledge himself to maintain the existing duties. He had never so pledged himself, nor did he mean to do so. This was no question of stubborn principle from which he could safely pledge himself not to swerve; for considerations of various kinds of economy or of policy might arise, not only to justify, but to render necessary the adoption of a different course. Yet, under present circumstances, he did not think it wise for parliament to stir the question, as they would stir it, if they adopted the motion of his noble friend."

And then, in order, perhaps, to give confidence to the agriculturists, and to assure them that his government contemplated no change in the corn-law, Lord Melbourne pounced upon a declaration made by Mr. Van Buren, and quoted it in this manner:—"He could not dismiss from his mind the apprehension that it was unwise to rely entirely for the maintenance of a great portion of the population upon a foreign supply. In that opinion he had the support of Mr. Van Buren. The United States, with a great and yearly increasing population, with almost an unlimited amount of land which yet remained to be brought into cultivation, might be supposed to be in less danger than any other nation in the world; but Mr. Van Buren was of opinion, that it would be unwise to rely upon a foreign supply of food for the people of the United States. Mr. Van Buren was a sensible man, his opinion was entitled to great consideration; but this was not his opinion alone, but that of a great portion of the people of that flourishing nation. Mr. Van Buren was a great magistrate, and he (Lord Melbourne) entertained the greatest respect both for him and for the people over whom he presided; and he was justified in believing, that he would not have expressed such an opinion, if it had not agreed with the opinions of a great portion of the people of the United States."

In the very next year after Lord Melbourne had thus expressed himself, his government proposed a fixed duty upon the importation of corn, and now a member of that government, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, loads me with vituperation for the conduct I have pursued with respect to the sugar duties and the corn-laws. Will he allow me to ask him, who held the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Melbourne, how, with the opinions he now professes on the corn-laws, he could reconcile it to his conscience to sit quiet while the organ of the government, the First Lord of the Treasury, expressed opinions on that subject from which he so entirely dissented? What did the right hon. gentleman himself propose? Did he propose any measures of sound commercial policy in the year 1840? I ask the House and the country to compare what the late Chancellor of the Exchequer did with my tariff? The way in which the right hon. gentleman proposed to supply the deficiency in the revenue was by increasing the customs and excise duties, including the duty on all articles of raw produce 5 per cent., and by increasing the assessed taxes 10 per cent. That is the contrast between the financial measure of 1840 and 1842. The right hon. gentleman advanced the duty on every article of raw produce, the elements of manufactures—he increased the duty on wool and raw cotton; and now he is the man who accuses me of having settled nothing, and unsettled every thing. The right hon. gentleman appears to think that there is nothing in the motion of a party character, and that, if carried, the government might give effect to it. Surely the right hon. gentleman must know perfectly well, not only that the success of such a motion would paralyse the functions of government; but that, if it were to pass, no government, which had a proper sense of what was due to the honour of public men, of what was due to the welfare of the country, could carry on the public affairs after being subjected to such an implied censure on the part of this House. The success of the motion would be an implied censure on the government. You have not allowed the government the usual period for bringing forward its measures. We never denied you time to bring forward the measures you might consider necessary; but you would supersede us in the functions of the government by calling upon the House within a fortnight of the commencement of the session to take our functions out of our hands. You ask what we have done for the purpose of relieving the distress of the country? We have done other things, or, at least, attempted to do other things than the reduction of the Customs' duties. We have been in office now, I think, about fifteen or sixteen months, and I think we have a right to look back upon what has been effected during that period without any sense of shame. We have been successful in terminating two wars. The noble lord seems to deny it. Whenever the noble lord pleases to claim exclusive credit to himself for terminating the Chinese war, and to take that credit from the present government, then I tell the noble lord I shall be perfectly prepared to meet him on that point, and I will voluntarily supply him with any information he may require, and which it is in my power to give. However, if it be not owing to the wisdom of our measures, at least the noble lord will not deny that we have had the good fortune to bring to a successful termination two wars, which were absorbing the capital of this country in unproductive labour, and striking, as all wars must, a double blow, by consuming the resources both of this country, and of that with which we might be carrying on a commercial intercourse. Sir, we hope to effect a reduction in the estimates of the present year. We trust we shall be enabled to do this, and although the termination of these wars has not been so distant as to enable us to make all the reductions which ultimately parliament may expect, we hope we shall be enabled, in the course of this session, to present estimates in the three great branches of the public service—the naval, military, and civil—showing a reduction of £850,000. Thus we are at least beginning the process of reducing the estimates. For the last four or five years there has been a constant and progressive increase of the expenditure of the country, and a decrease in the revenue; and in the present session we shall, I trust, at least commence an alteration which will, I hope, lead to a continued series of diminished estimates. We have been enabled to reduce the military force in Canada between 8,000 and 4,000 men; we have attempted to open British markets to colonial produce; to diminish the duties on colonial produce in every case where it entered into competition with our own, and thus to make some advance towards treating the colonies as an integral part of the empire. Sir, we have laboured to effect, and I trust we have laboured successfully, to effect an adjustment of those differences with the United States, which had been for forty years in existence, differences which had only been exasperated by delay, and which differences were the main causes for apprehending a disturbance of the relations between the two countries. We tried to soothe those differences without any compromise of British honour. Sir, we also tried to soothe that unfortunate feeling of hostility towards England, which it has been my regret to perceive has existed in some part of the French nation. We are not responsible for the origin of that hostility, which has exhibited itself in various stations of life, and amongst different classes. But, Sir, at the same time that that feeling certainly exists, as I have stated, it is a remarkable spectacle for the civilized world that the two men who hold conspicuous offices—the most conspicuous offices in the governments of their respective countries—are the two men the most distinguished in each for their military achievements and their military fame. Those men have practised the art, and they have learned also the miseries of war in the fields of Toulouse and of Waterloo. They have stood opposed to each other in the field of battle—

—“Stetimus tela aspera contra Contulimusque manus.”

And it is a remarkable thing to see those men the best judges of the sacrifices which war imposes upon nations, are now exerting all their influence in the two countries to inculcate lessons of peace. It is a glorious occupation for their declining years. The life of each has been protracted beyond the ordinary term of human existence, and may God grant that the lives of both may be long preserved—that they may each, in his own land, exhort their countrymen to lay aside all national animosities, and enter into a more glorious and honourable competition for increasing the amount of human happiness. And, Sir, when I compare the conduct and example of these men, who have seen the morning sun arise upon living masses of fiery warriors, so many of whom were to be laid low in the grave before that sun should set—when I see them teaching lessons of peace, and using their salutary influence to discourage their countrymen from war; when I contrast their object with that of anonymous and irresponsible writers in the public journals, who are doing all they can to exasperate the differences that have prevailed, who misrepresent every action of two governments desirous of cultivating peace; who represent in France that the minister of France is the tool of England, and in England that the ministers of England are sacrificing the honour of England to a fear of France, I do trust that the example of these two illustrious warriors will neutralize efforts such as those to which I have referred, efforts not directed by zeal for national honour, but employed for the base purposes of encouraging national animosities, or promoting personal or party interest. Sir, we have effected these things, but do I plead that as any reason why the House should reject the motion before it? If you really believe that it will contribute to diminish permanently the distress, or to relieve the difficulties of the country, do I say that any regard for what the minister may have done, should be an obstruction to its success? No. I admit it ought not. You may approve of our foreign policy—you may think that we have laid the foundations of peace—you may hear with satisfaction that the public expenditure will be reduced—you may hope that all differences with the United States may not be adjusted, yet, that the principal causes of apprehension have been satisfactorily and honourably arranged; but still while you feel disposed to acknowledge these services, and to approve that conduct, if you believe that the adoption of this motion will have the effect of relieving the public distress, let no consideration—I say it with perfect sincerity to this side of the House, and it is unnecessary for me to say so to the other—let no consideration of party, no attachment to persons, no predilections in favour of particular men, interfere one instant with a vote which you conscientiously believe calculated to diminish distress, to lessen privation, to lay the foundations of the commercial prosperity and permanent welfare of the state.

An amendment by Mr. Ferrand was withdrawn. The House divided on the original motion:—Ayes, 191; Noes, 306; majority, 115.

AFFGHAN WAR—VOTE OF THANKS.

FEBRUARY 20, 1843.

The paragraphs of her Majesty's Speech in reference to the events in Afghanistan having been read—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose, and spoke as follows:—Sir,—The motion with which I shall conclude the observations I have to make will be in precise conformity with the notice which I gave the other day. It will be that the thanks of the House be given to the governor-general of India for the ability and judgment with which the resources of the British empire in India have been applied in support of the military operations in Afghanistan; and that the thanks of the House be given to the general officers who immediately conducted those operations, and to the other officers of the army, for the ability, skill, and perseverance displayed by them, and their indefatigable zeal and exertions throughout the late campaign. The motion will also signify our grateful acknowledgments and high approbation of the valour and patient perseverance displayed by the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, both of the European and native army, during the whole of that campaign, and for their gallant behaviour upon every occasion in which they came into contact with the enemy. I consider all I have to do on the present occasion is to establish the fact that the operations in Afghanistan were of sufficient public importance to warrant me in calling upon the House to support the motion with which I shall conclude, and that the several parties, both civil and military, to whom my motion refers, did perform those services and did exhibit those qualities for which it is proposed that the thanks of the House should be given to them. In conformity with all usage in bringing forward motions of this kind, I shall studiously abstain from any reference to the matters of merely a political nature. I shall not call in question the policy of the original advance into Affghanistan, nor shall I attempt to vindicate upon this occasion the policy of the withdrawal of the troops from it; and if in the course of my address one word shall fall from me which shall have a tendency to provoke a discussion upon merely political grounds, or which shall place the conduct of one person in invidious contrast with that of another, I declare beforehand, that the word so falling from me will be at variance entirely with the intention with which I rise to address the House, and I therefore make for it, if it shall fall from me, this preliminary apology. Sir, I feel great difficulty in addressing the House upon this subject. I feel that no address that could be made to them could weaken the impression which must have been derived from the perusal of this volume. There is something of romantic interest cast over the whole of these operations. There is something in the remoteness of the region—in the wild and savage grandeur of the scenery—in the undisciplined, desperate, and ferocious valour of the enemy, and the deadly precision with which they used the rude implements of war of which they were possessed. There have been such dreadful disasters, partaking rather of the character of phantasms and of hideous dreams than of the reality of life; such brilliant successes; such instances of devotion to the public service; of desperate fidelity in the face of overwhelming numbers. There is again the unhopd for delivery of the whole of the prisoners, as if a gracious Providence had conduced to "succour and provide for the desolate and oppressed, and show pity upon the prisoner and captive." I say all these things do constitute an interest upon the perusal of these volumes, the details of them written at the time from the scene of action—the hand that had wielded the sword guiding the pen that described them—all these things I say, constitute an interest which can only be weakened by any such address as I can offer to the House upon this occasion. The details of the transactions in question commence with the autumn of 1841. It is necessary, as I am to propose a vote of thanks to the governor-general of India, Lord Ellenborough, for the ability and judgment with which he prepared the resources of the British empire in support of these operations, that I should state to the House, as clearly as I can. [Lord Palmerston: prepared?] I do not say "prepared," but with which Lord Ellenborough "applied" the resources of the British empire. It is necessary, I say, as I propose that the thanks of this House should be given, where I consider they are most justly due—to the governor-general of India—that I should recall to the recollection of the House the precise position of affairs when Lord Ellenborough assumed the government of India up to the end of October, 1841. The aspect of affairs at Cabul was, upon the whole, of a pacific nature. I will try as fairly as I can, in giving an account of the state of affairs, to quote the expressions made use of by the late governor-general, or by Sir W. M'Naghten in his account relative to the state of affairs in Cabul. The priesthood and chiefs of clans and their military retinue were dissatisfied with the influence exercised by the British government, but still there was no indication from which there was reason to apprehend either universal discontent, or the hazard of general outbreak or insurrection. So far from it, that the 20th of October had been fixed on by Sir W. M'Naghten as the day on which he should depart from Cabul, handing over his diplomatic functions to Sir A. Burnes, proceeding to Bombay, for the purpose of taking on himself the civil government there. About the middle of October, a rebellion broke out against the British authorities, on the part of certain chiefs of the Ghilzie tribes; that rebellion was attributed to two causes; the first is the withholding of certain payments, to which they considered themselves entitled, on account of the keeping open of the passes; that certain allowances, which were made to the Ghilzie chiefs for that purpose, had been in part withheld; secondly, making the Ghilzie chiefs responsible for the robberies that had been committed by the eastern Ghilzies. In consequence of that, in October the passes between Cabul and Gundamuk were seized, and the military communication between Cabul and British India was intercepted. Sir R. Sale was ordered to force the passes. He left Cabul with three regiments—viz., the 13th queen's regiment, the 35th, and 37th native infantry. The 37th regiment, which accompanied him part of the way, was subsequently recalled to Cabul. On the 11th November, after experiencing very great obstruction in the passage, Sir R. Sale reached Jellalabad with six days' provisions only, and surrounded, in fact, by all the armed population of the district. On the 7th of November, at Cabul our countrymen were attacked on every side. I am trying as far as I can in making these preliminary recitals to use the exact expressions, of course, the most accurate, the most fair to all parties, used in reciting them in the volume. Sir Alexander Burnes and his brother were both murdered. At the same time, a district north of Cabul, called Kohistan, broke out into insurrection, and Captain Woodburn, with a party of 108 invalids, who were proceeding from Ghuznee to Cabul, was cut off, and the whole of the party accompanying him were murdered. Accounts also reached Cabul that the disturbances extended to between seventy and eighty miles south of Ghuznee. It became necessary for Lord Auckland, who was then administering the Indian government when the accounts reached Calcutta of the state of affairs at Cabul, to determine what course it was most consistent with the public interests that he should take. Lord Auckland, writing on the 2nd of December, recommended that a strong force, not less than from 10,000 to 12,000 men, should be ready to be concentrated between the Sutlej and the Jumana, and he also desired that an additional force should be placed in Peshawur, in order to provide for any contingencies that might arise. On the 3rd of December, Lord Auckland, before he heard of the military disasters at Cabul, expressed his opinion. He says:—"It would be vain to speculate upon the issue of the contest at Cabul; but, in the extreme event of the military possession of that city, and the surrounding territory having been entirely lost, it is not our intention to direct new and extensive operations for the re-establishment of our supremacy throughout Afghanistan."

That was written when Lord Auckland had heard of the first insurrection of the Ghilzies, of the massacre of Sir W. M'Naghten and Sir Alexander Burnes, but not of the disasters which befel the army under General Elphinstone. At this time Sir R. Sale was at Jellalabad, and an attempt was made to relieve Sir R. Sale by a detachment of four regiments under the command of General Wild, who was ordered to force the Khyber pass, and to rescue, if possible, Sir R. Sale from his position, and to give every aid that such additional force could give. Lord Auckland, on the 19th of February, had heard of the failure of General Wild to force the Khyber pass, and on the receipt of that intelligence he expresses himself in the following way in respect to our policy in Afghanistan:—"Since we have heard of the misfortunes in the Khyber pass, and have become convinced, that with the difficulties at present opposed to us, and in the actual state of our preparations, we could not expect, at least in this year, to maintain a position in the Jellalabad districts for any effective purpose, we have made our directions in regard to withdrawal from Jellalabad clear and positive, and we shall rejoice to learn, that Major-general Pollock will have anticipated these more express orders by confining his efforts to the same object."

That was on the 19th of February. Lord Auckland said, in the same despatch, to show that he was not regardless of the state of the prisoners at Cabul:—"The painful situation of the officers' families and European and native soldiers, who are prisoners in Afghanistan, engages our most anxious thought, and any measures which we can adopt with fair and honourable prospect of advantage for their comfort or release will be eagerly adopted by us."

On the 2nd of February Lord Auckland had desired that a commanding force should be concentrated at or near Peshawur. It will be remembered, that at this time—at the beginning of February—in addition to the force then supposed to be at Cabul labouring under very great difficulties, there was also the force at Candahar under General Nott. The fortress of Ghuznee was also occupied by a British force, and another fortress (Khelat-i-Ghilzie) was occupied by Captain Craigie and a small detachment. On the 10th of February orders were given by Lord Auckland to General Nott as follows:—"Events will, in every probability, have determined your course of proceeding long before the present letter, or any communication founded upon the letters of the 28th and 31st ult., can be in your possession. But he thinks it now right not to omit the chance of distinctly informing you, that it is his desire that you should, without reference to the terms of the extract of the despatch of the 28th ult., act solely so as may best, in your judgment, secure the paramount object of the safety of the troops placed under your orders, and may uphold, at the same time, the honour of the British arms."

Now, I have stated, as fairly as I can, the position of Lord Auckland, and the orders which he issued—the orders for the withdrawal to Jellalabad, the discretionary order to General Nott, and the assembling of a large force of 10,000 or 12,000 men between the Sutlej and the Jumna, and also the care which he took that the British honour should be maintained, while every thing that was possible was to be done to secure the comfort and the safety of the troops. Those were the arrangements made by the late governor-general previously to his retirement. I now come to the opinion of the commander of the forces upon the then state of affairs. Sir Jasper Nicolls, in his communication of the 24th of January, recites an interview which he had had with Mr. Clerk, who had been our resident at Lahore, a gentleman in the civil service of the government of India, of the most distinguished ability and the highest order. In the course of the interview Mr. Clerk impressed upon Sir Jasper Nicolls the great advantage of re-establishing the British arms in Affghanistan, and if military operations permitted, to recover possession of Cabul. Sir Jasper Nicolls, however, entertained these opinions at that time with respect to the state of the army:—"Admitting the undeniable force of this argument, I am greatly inclined to doubt that we have at present either army or funds sufficient to renew this contest. Money may, perhaps, be obtainable, but soldiers are not, without leaving India bare. Shortly before I left Calcutta, there were at least 33,000 men in our pay in Affghanistan and Scinde, including Schah Soojah's troops, but not the rabble attached to his person. How insufficient that number has been to awe the barbarous, and at first disunited tribes of Affghanistan and Scinde, our numerous conflicts, our late reverses, and our heavy losses fully prove."

I think it is quite clear, then, that the opinion of the late governor-general and of the commander of the forces was adverse to any advance on Cabul from the side of Jellalabad; that he thought they ought first to release Sir R. Sale from his position, and that he did not contemplate attempting, during that year, the re-establishment of British supremacy in Cabul, at least, not from the side of Jellalabad. And who, sir, I will ask, is prepared to blame Lord Auckland for the discretion which he then exercised, and the decision to which he then came? It is easy, indeed, for us to be military critics at a small expense, seated in this comfortable chamber, with a full knowledge of all the subsequent events, and rejoicing at present successes—with no responsibility upon us, such as rested on the governor-general—the responsibility not merely of forcing a passage to Cabul against any enemy that might oppose our army, but first to provide for the interests and the security of the vast empire, the safety of which was entrusted to his care. It was necessary for the governor-general to look at the indications of hostility on the side of the Burmese empire—on the side of Scinde—and to remember the withdrawal of British troops from India to take part in the operations in China. Recollecting these facts, I am far from blaming Lord Auckland for the view he took of the position of affairs. Before we take upon ourselves to pronounce an opinion adverse to his policy, we must place ourselves in his position, with an army dispirited by reverses—we must have his intimate knowledge of the circumstances; above all we must have his responsibility. Viewing the transactions thus, I must say, I do think Lord Auckland was exempt from blame in contemplating the withdrawal of the troops from Affghanistan. What, too, was the position of the troops at Candahar? I am looking at this question, not with regard to its policy, but in a military point of view, and I am taking into consideration the circumstance which must have weighed upon the mind of Lord Auckland. The communication was intercepted; the army of Candahar was 549 miles from the Indus; and between the army and that point there was also interposed the Bolan pass. What was the position of the army at Cabul? The army at Cabul was 540 miles from Ferozepore, the nearest town of British India, and the whole of the Punjaub had to be traversed; and this too, at a time when, it must be well known to many hon. gentlemen, a feeling and a spirit prevailed among the Sikh troops not the most favourable to such a movement. They must recollect that between Jellalabad and Cabul there was the Khyber Pass; that for a distance of 153 miles out of the 540, there was a country exceeding in difficulty, in respect to military communication, any other country on the face of the globe. Another fatal reverse such as that which had taken place at Cabul might have had the most prejudicial effect, for disasters of that kind were not merely doubled, but acted with a force infinitely increased, by repetition. I do say, then, that Lord Auckland, in my opinion, acted wisely in collecting the forces within British India, and taking time to deliberate as to what policy should be pursued. When the vote of thanks was proposed in this House to Lord Auckland, though I differed from that noble lord as to certain portions of his policy, yet, considering that that noble lord was fairly entitled to the public acknowledgments for the zeal which he had manifested in preparing and directing the resources of India in aid of the military operations in that country, I gave to that vote, so far as Lord Auckland was concerned, the support which I thought it deserved—to which I thought the noble lord entitled, and I have seen nothing since that time in the conduct of Lord Auckland, up to the time of his quitting India, with respect to those military operations, which makes me desirous of withdrawing the opinion I then expressed. However, that was the condition of affairs when the present governor-general succeeded to Lord Auckland. The first letter which Lord Ellenborough wrote on the subject of the policy which should be pursued is dated March 15, 1842. That despatch contained the precise views of the governor-general, and in it is the following passage. The paper I am about to quote is No. 200, and is at page 167 of the book. Lord Ellenborough goes on to say:—"Whatever course we may hereafter take must rest solely upon military considerations, and have, in the first instance, regard to the safety of the detached bodies of our troops at Jellalabad, at Ghuznee, at Khelat-i-Ghilzie, and Candahar, to the security of our troops now in the field from all unnecessary risk, and, finally to the re-establishment of our military reputation by the infliction of some signal and decisive blow upon the Afghans, which may make it appear to them, to our own subjects, and to our allies, that we have the power of inflicting punishment upon those who commit atrocities and violate their faith; and that we withdraw ultimately from Afghanistan, not from any deficiency of means to maintain our position, but because we are satisfied that the king we have set up has not, as we were erroneously led to imagine, the support of the nation over which he has been placed. But, while the facts before us justify the withdrawal of our troops from Afghanistan, and the refusal of all further assistance to Schah Soojah, they are yet not such as to make it consistent with our reputation to give our future support, as is suggested by Major Rawlinson, to Schah Kauram, and to make over Candahar to that nominal ruler of Herat, even were it consistent with prudence to engage in a new speculative enterprise beyond the Indus, which might render it necessary for us to retain, at an enormous cost, a large body of troops in the difficult country between that river and Candahar, for the purpose of maintaining in the country so made over to him a sovereign personally incapable and for many years unknown to its inhabitants, otherwise than by the fame of his degrading vices. We are of opinion that it would be erroneous to suppose that a forward position in Upper Afghanistan would have the effect of controlling the Sikhs, or that a forward position above the passes of Lower Afghanistan would have the effect of controlling the Beloochees and the Scindians, by the appearance of confidence and of strength. That which will really, and will alone control the Sikhs, the Beloochees, and the Scindians, and all the other nations beyond and within the Indus, is the knowledge that we possess an army, perfect in its equipment, possessed of all the means of movement, and so secure in its communications with the country from which its supplies and its reinforcements are drawn, as to be able at any time to act with vigour and effect against any enemy. In war, reputation is strength; but reputation is lost by the rash exposure of the most gallant troops under circumstances which render defeat more probable than victory; and a succession of reverses will dishearten any soldiers, and, most of all, those whose courage and devotion have been mainly the result of their confidence that they were always led to certain success. We would, therefore, strongly impress upon the commanders of the forces employed in Afghanistan and Scinde the importance of incurring no unnecessary risk, and of bringing their troops into action under circumstances which may afford full scope to the superiority they derive from their discipline. At the same time, we are aware that no great object can be accomplished without incurring some risk; and we should consider that the object of striking a decisive blow at the Affghans, more especially if such blow could be struck in combination with measures for the relief of Ghuznee—a blow which might re-establish our military character beyond the Indus, and leave a deep impression of our power, and of the vigour with which it would be applied to punish an atrocious enemy—would be one for which risk might be justifiably incurred, all due and possible precaution being taken to diminish such necessary risk, and to secure decisive success. The commanders of the forces in Upper and Lower Affghanistan will, in all the operations they may design, bear in mind these general views and opinions of the Government of India. They will, in the first instance, endeavour to relieve all the garrisons in Affghanistan which are now surrounded by the enemy. The relief of these garrisons is a point deeply affecting the military character of the army, and deeply interesting the feelings of their country; but to make a rash attempt to effect such relief, in any case, without a reasonable prospect of success, would be to afford no real aid to the brave men who are surrounded, and fruitlessly to sacrifice other good soldiers, whose preservation is equally dear to the government they serve. To effect the release of the prisoners taken at Cabul is an object likewise deeply interesting in point of feeling and of honour. That object can, probably, only be accomplished by taking hostages from such part of the country as may be in, or may come into, our possession; and with reference to this object, and to that of the relief of Ghuznee, it may possibly become a question, in the event of Major-general Pollock's effecting a junction with Sir Robert Sale, whether the united force shall return to the country below the Khyber Pass, or take a forward position near Jellalabad, or even advance to Cabul. We are fully sensible of the advantages which would be derived from the re-occupation of Cabul, the scene of our great disaster and of so much crime, even for a week, of the means which it might afford of recovering the prisoners, of the gratification which it would give to the army, and of the effect which it would have upon our enemies. Our withdrawal might then be made to rest upon an official declaration of the grounds upon which we retired as solemn as that which accompanied our advance; and we should retire as a conquering, not as a defeated power; but we cannot sanction the occupation of an advanced position beyond the Khyber Pass by Major-general Pollock, unless that general should be satisfied that he can, without depending upon the forbearance of the tribes near the Pass, which, obtained only by purchase, must under all circumstances be precarious, and without depending upon the fidelity of the Sikh chiefs, or upon the power of those chiefs to restrain their troops, upon neither of which can any reliance be safely placed, feel assured that he can, by his own strength, overawe and overcome all who dispute the Pass, and keep up at all times his communication with Peshawur and the Indus; and we would caution Major-general Pollock, and all the officers commanding the troops in the field, not to place reliance upon, or to be biassed by, the representations of native chiefs, who may have been expelled from their country in consequence of their adherence to us, and who will naturally be ready to lead us into any danger by operations which may have the possible effect of restoring them to their former possessions."

Sir, it is evident from this letter, that Lord Ellenborough's main objects were, to relieve the garrisons, to rescue the prisoners, and to re-establish the military supremacy of the British arms, if even only for a time, in Cabul and Affghanistan; but that he did not contemplate a permanent occupation of Affghanistan. On the 15th of March, 1842, those were the objects and this was the policy which he contemplated. Those objects have been accomplished, and the policy has practically been carried out. I am quite aware that in the period that elapsed between the 15th of March and the successful result of those operations which he then contemplated, Lord Ellenborough did at one time take a different view of the policy of Indian affairs; and that he issued the order of the 19th of April to General Nott to withdraw from Candahar. But under what circumstances did he issue the order of the 19th of April? Here again, as in the case of Lord Auckland, I will call on the House to bear in mind the responsibility devolving upon the governor-general contemplating the fatal consequences that might arise from a repetition of such disasters as those which had but lately befallen our troops. On the 19th of April, Lord Ellenborough strongly recommended, and, indeed, directed General Nott to withdraw from Candahar, to rescue, if he could, the garrison of Ghuznee, to destroy the fortifications of Kelat-i-

Ghilzie, and to retire within the British frontier. When he gave this order on the 19th of April, he had just received intelligence of the fall of Ghuznee—had just received an account that Colonel Palmer, who commanded at Ghuznee, had found, or considered it to be impossible to maintain his position, and that he had surrendered Ghuznee to the force by which it was then besieged. At the same time, Lord Ellenborough received intelligence of the failure of General England to advance through the Bolan Pass for the purpose of assisting General Nott at Candahar. Thus, on the day that Lord Ellenborough wrote that letter, he had received information of two signal failures at two different points in the attempt made to relieve the post-up garrisons in Afghanistan. Brigadier Wilde, with four regiments, had been driven back from the Khyber Pass; and General England, with a considerable force, had failed in forcing a passage through the Khojuk Pass, which lies between the Bolan Pass and Candahar. What were the letters, which at that very time, almost on that very day, General Pollock and General Nott were writing to Lord Ellenborough? It was on the 19th of April that he gave his directions to General Nott to withdraw from Candahar. He could not be correctly informed of the actual state of the armies in Afghanistan at that particular time. He knew that Ghuznee had surrendered. He knew that the passes between the Indus and Candahar had not been forced by General England, but that that general had met with discomfiture. He knew, also, the feeling that prevailed amongst some of the regiments of the army which was commanded by General Nott. These were the accounts which he received when he gave his orders of the 19th of April, written respectively by General Nott and General Pollock. General Pollock, writing from Jellalabad, on the 20th of April (the day after the issuing of the order), says:—"I have already stated my views with regard to the Khyber Pass. I have also shown, that from the system of supplying carriage-cattle, I have not the means of moving, and the country around cannot supply my wants. To establish dépôts or strong posts at intervals on the road between this and Cabul, would so reduce the numerical strength of this force, that by the time it reached the capital, it would be too weak to effect the desired object. For several marches, no forage is procurable. Even if we had carriage, the conveyance of forage would so increase the number of animals to be protected, that I should much doubt our being able to convey them in safety; and, I confess, after the treachery we have experienced, I could have no confidence in any promises of support from an Afghan; he might engage to lay in forage at intervals, for the express purpose of leading us into a difficult position, and then glory in having served his own cause by bringing us to the verge of destruction. The devastation of a few villages in our vicinity, with all the grain and forage, would be a small matter in the eyes of an Afghan, if he could thereby destroy our force, and such a measure would assuredly go near to effect it. I have maturely considered the question of our advance by this road to Cabul, and I confess that I see too many difficulties to warrant our risking such a course. The force I have the honour to command, if well supplied, is ready to march anywhere, and if I could have advanced by the route of Candahar, our success would be certain."

This was written on the 20th of April. General Nott, of course, not being aware of the order that was written on the 19th of April, gives, on the 18th of April, this account of his position at Candahar:—"In the event of field operations, the deduction of these 3000 men would leave me scarcely 4000 troops, including this cavalry to oppose the enemy in the field, and to guard a long train of provision and carriage cattle; and, however distant the service from this important magazine, every particle of food must be carried with the force; thus crippling and retarding all its movements. The troops and establishments at Candahar are four months in arrears, and there is not a rupee in the treasury; nor can money be borrowed. We have no medicine for the sick and wounded; and in the event of much service in the field, I fear we should run short of musket-ammunition, although I have contrived to have a considerable quantity prepared from old and damaged powder; frequent application has been made to the authorities in Sinde, during the last four months, for treasure, ammunition, stores, medicines, and particularly for cavalry, but no aid whatever has been afforded. I want draught and baggage-cattle to enable me to move; but without money, in a country like this, I can neither purchase nor hire them. I have no cattle for moving even three regiments; during our field operations of last month, both officers and men marched without tents. Under these circumstances, my difficulties were certainly great; but although I consider it to be my duty to state these facts, the government may rest assured of my best and unremitting exertions to carry into effect its views and instructions, and to uphold the reputation of our arms, and the honour of my country."

[Mr. Mangles: Read the next paragraph.] General Nott continues in these terms:—"Perhaps it is not within my province to observe, that, in my humble opinion, an unnecessary alarm has been created regarding the position of our troops in this country, and of the strength and power of the enemy we have to contend with. The enemy cannot face our troops in the field with any chance of success, however superior they may be in numbers, provided those precautions are strictly observed, which war, between a small body of disciplined soldiers, and a vast crowd of untrained, unorganized, and half-civilized people, constantly renders necessary."

I really do not wish to introduce a word that should reflect in any way upon those by whom Lord Ellenborough was preceded. The order of the 25th of February, recalling the previous orders, was issued by Lord Auckland, not by Lord Ellenborough. I do not wish upon this occasion to introduce any thing that may have the appearance of reflecting upon any part of Lord Auckland's conduct. I have stated what my impressions are with respect to the course pursued by Lord Auckland, and it is my wish not to introduce a word that might savour of party character, or bear the appearance of the slightest degree of injustice to those to whom I am politically opposed. General Nott continues,—“True, the British troops suffered a dreadful disaster at Cabul, and it is not for me to presume to point out why this happened, however evident I may conceive the reasons, and the long train of military and political events which led to the sad catastrophe.”

The hon. gentleman might challenge me to go on with the next sentence. What does General Nott say in that passage of his letter:—"Had I been reinforced with a single regiment of cavalry, I feel convinced that I could long since have tranquilized or subdued the rebellious feeling in the provinces dependent upon Candahar, and that a very few additional troops from Sinde, to garrison this extensive and important city, would have set me free from my present difficult position, and have enabled me at this moment to have been on my march to Ghuznee and to Cabul; but although near six months have elapsed since the outbreak at that city, no aid of any kind has been sent to me; and the circumstances I have now detailed, still confine me to this post and its immediate vicinity.”

I really do not think it necessary or expedient to proceed with the quotation of passages of this nature. What I say is this, that these reports of the 18th of April and the 20th of April, from the respective commanding officers with regard to the state of the two armies, upon the efficiency of which our only hope of embarking in successful operations against Afghanistan depended, coming in addition to the accounts of the surrender of Ghuznee, and the failure of General England to force the Khojuk Pass, in my opinion vindicates the policy of the order given by Lord Ellenborough, under the impression that then existed on his mind on the 19th of April—that order being substantially to this effect:—"Do not, in the present inauspicious aspect of affairs, incur the great risk of advancing upon Cabul. General Pollock tells you that he cannot advance—that he cannot support you." I say that with the impressions which existed upon Lord Ellenborough's mind, it was true wisdom to give the order of the 19th of April, and that he deserves the commendation of this House for having given it. And he says most justly in another despatch:—"True it is, that I might conciliate public favour by directing an advance in the midst of these difficulties, but if by an act of precipitation of that kind, I were to compromise the safety of our empire in India, I should never during my existence cease to upbraid myself for refusing to take the responsibility of delaying the march of the troops.”

I can hardly think it would be necessary for me to convince any gentleman who has read through these despatches—who has seen the devotion to the public service manifested by Lord Ellenborough in respect to provisioning the army, to detain the House at any greater length to show, nay, I should almost feel ashamed if I were to make any further endeavour to show, that upon that ground Lord Ellenborough is justly entitled to the expression of public thanks. What did Lord Ellenborough do with respect to provisioning the army? On the 16th September he says,—“Every possible effort has been made to supply Major-general Pollock's force with carriage, and to provide for the expected wants of Major-general Nott's force, when it joins the army in the Cabul valley. In the ten weeks ending the 8th of September, there have been purchased 7,653 camels, and 5,026 mules and ponies; 1,265 Bringaree bullocks have been hired, and 1,000 camels; and I have reason to think that 1,500 more Bringaree bullocks have been hired at Peshawur, making in all 16,444 animals. The purchases of camels continue, and I have directed that every mule may be procured which can be deemed fit for service. I am satisfied that I shall have the entire concurrence of your committee in the opinion I have expressed to the commissary-general, that the army must be supplied, cost what it may; and that it is better to have a thousand animals too many, than a hundred too few. The losses of animals, however, must of necessity be so large that I have no hope that all my efforts will do more than provide for the absolute requirements of the retiring army. Camp equipages, clothing, shoes, medical and other comforts, are to be forwarded by these animals; and I trust the army will feel that it incurs no suffering which could have been obviated by the paternal care of the government."

Look, Sir, at the range from which it was necessary to obtain these supplies. Look at the exertions necessary in the course of ten weeks, to procure 10,000 beasts of burthen; and do not forget how the country out of which they were procured, had been exhausted by previous exertions of a similar nature. Do not forget that it was a field from which you could hardly hope to draw fresh supplies for a new emergency. What is the calculation of Major Todd, who inscribes the work he wrote to Lord Auckland? Major Todd states, that the loss of beasts of burthen between November 1838 and the same period of 1839, was not less than 32,000. Therefore, when you estimate the extent of the exertions which it became necessary to make, in order to procure a supply of 16,500 beasts of burthen, you must not forget that the loss sustained in that way by the operations of 1838 and 1839 amounted, according to the highest authority, to not less than 32,000. I feel most confident, therefore, that this House, whatever its opinion may be upon points of policy, will recognise the claim of Lord Ellenborough to a public acknowledgment, "For the ability and judgment with which the resources of the British empire in India have been applied in support of the military operations in Afghanistan."

That it will bear in mind the despatch of the 15th March—that it will bear in mind the objects which Lord Ellenborough contemplated on assuming the government of India, as he did amidst a great depression of popular feeling, and with a picture of most forbidding aspect—that it will bear in mind that his object was to relieve every garrison in Afghanistan, to release every prisoner, to re-occupy Cabul, and to prove to India and the world the supremacy and invincibility of British arms in that quarter of the world—that it will bear in mind that every object so contemplated was, within a period of eight or ten months, completely realised; and that Lord Ellenborough had the satisfaction of seeing the army, a portion of which had left the British frontier dispirited and full of fearful forebodings, return to the banks of the Sutlege full of spirit, joyous, triumphant, and in a state of the greatest efficiency. I feel too much confidence in the generosity of this House to believe, that any consideration, that any difference in political opinions, could influence it in refusing a just acknowledgment of public services, upon the ground on which I now ask for the acknowledgment to Lord Ellenborough. And I must take this opportunity of cautioning the House, although I know that this night's comments upon Lord Ellenborough's policy, or comments upon his conduct, will not influence it, when we are meeting upon this neutral field for the purpose of considering the claims of a public man to public thanks, on account of his conduct in support of great and important military operations—yet I feel it necessary to caution the House against the introduction of comments which, however just or true they may be believed to be by those who make them, may yet, in fact, be the occasion of producing most unfounded impressions against the parties towards whom they are directed. Ample opportunities will be afforded on other occasions, for any comment that hon. gentlemen may wish to make on any part of Lord Ellenborough's policy and conduct. An hon. gentleman has to-night given notice of a motion on one part of Lord Ellenborough's policy; but I think I can demonstrate to the House the impropriety of inferring that every thing it hears to the prejudice of Lord Ellenborough, is necessarily true. The other night the noble lord opposite (Lord John Russell) made some comments upon the conduct of Lord Ellenborough with respect to the public servants in the employ of the East India Company. The noble lord was particularly severe upon the conduct of Lord Ellenborough to a gentleman of the name of Amos. The noble lord said that that gentleman had been employed in the instruction of her Majesty—that he was a gentleman of the highest character, of great attainment, and great qualification—that that gentleman went from this country a few years ago with a high character for legal acquirements; but that, well known as his attainments were, and high as he was known to stand in the estimation even of her Majesty, one of the first acts of Lord Ellenborough (as the noble lord was informed) was to insult Mr. Amos in such a manner as to induce that gentleman to throw up his situation. I am certain that, even if the noble lord were justified in making that assertion, you would not allow it to operate with you upon the present occasion; but I mention the circumstance to show you the necessity of waiting till you have all the evidence before you, before you lend an ear to any statements of this nature. It cannot be denied that a most unfavourable impression was made with respect to Lord Ellenborough by the statement to which I have referred. I do not say or suppose that it was the intention of the noble lord to produce such an impression, but such undoubtedly was the effect of his statement. He stated that Lord Ellenborough took the first opportunity of treating this gentleman of high attainments with such marked insult as to compel him to relinquish his situation. I was quite sure that the noble lord would not advance anything of a kind so calculated to prejudice a political opponent, acting under a deep responsibility at a great distance from home, and without the power of reply, unless he were perfectly convinced of the accuracy and truth of what he was asserting. My confidence in the noble lord's generosity satisfies me upon that point. But for the purpose of inculcating upon the House the necessity of pausing before it leaps to conclusions upon these ex parte statements, I will read a letter which has been put into my hands since the noble lord's statement was made, and which the writer leaves me at liberty to use. It is a letter from the wife of Mr. Amos, who, having read in the public papers a report of what had passed in this House writes, on the 12th of February, as follows:—

“ST. IBBS, HITCHIN, February 12, 1843.

“My dear Sir—You probably may have noticed in Lord John Russell's speech on Thursday last, that he asserted that Mr. Amos resigned his appointment in Calcutta in consequence of having been insulted by Lord Ellenborough. Now, as there is not a word of truth in this statement, I think it right to contradict it, at least amongst Mr. Amos's old and valued friends. When he went out to India five years ago, Mr. Amos always intended to resign in 1843, and I am sure nothing would induce him to remain at Calcutta another year; now that all his family are here; his children just springing into manhood, and requiring all a father's care and example. As to Lord Ellenborough's conduct, it has been one of unvaried politeness and civility. I believe they were mutually pleased with each other; and when Mr. Amos wrote to Lord Ellenborough in the autumn, when he was up the country, saying it was his intention to resign, Lord Ellenborough replied, that he was extremely sorry to lose so very agreeable a colleague. I hope you will excuse my troubling you with this long note, but I could not feel easy until I had done so.

“MARTHA AMOS.”

A more convincing proof cannot be offered of the injustice which you must commit, if you permit vague assertions of this kind—assertions incapable of proof, but believed to be true by those who make them—to influence you in withholding from Lord Ellenborough that which I believe, in common with the highest authority in the world, to be most just, and due on account of these military operations. So much for Lord Ellenborough and for Lord Ellenborough's claim to public thanks. I hope I have most strictly kept my word, and avoided all reference to mere political matters. With respect to the claims of the gallant officers, under whose directions these exploits have been performed, I am perfectly convinced, that upon that head there can be no difference of opinion. It is impossible to read these details of service

—it is impossible to read the accounts of General Pollock—of General Nott, and of General Sale, without being inspired by all those feelings which are connected with the honour and military glory of our country. I am sure the House will excuse me, if, with respect to each of these officers and their claims upon public gratitude, I make some remarks. I begin with General Pollock. General Pollock took the command of the force intended to rescue General Sale early in the month of February. He arrived at Peshawur on the 5th of February, 1842. He had, then, of course, heard of the failure of Brigadier Wilde. On the day that he arrived at Peshawur, he found that in Brigadier Wilde's brigade there were not less than 1,000 sick. The day after he arrived he went to the camp at once. He found that the number of sick in the camp, on the 12th of February, was 1,800 men. What was the course he pursued? On the day after his arrival, postponing every other concern, he visited all the hospitals, and saw all the surgeons with a view of ascertaining from them, if possible, the cause of this sickness. He says—and these things do him honour—this is the way to inspire confidence, this is the way to show that you are not merely contemplating the means of obtaining the thanks of parliament by brilliant exploits, but that you are attending to the comforts of your men; this, I say, is the way to inspire confidence, and I mention these things for the honour of the distinguished man by whom they were performed—I would even rather dwell upon them than upon his military success, because they are, in truth, the elements of future success. This, I repeat, is the way to inspire confidence. General Pollock, writing on the 12th of February, says, "I shall visit their hospitals frequently, and by adding in any way to their comforts, show that I feel an interest in them." General Pollock adds, "There has been some unpleasant feeling amongst them, which I hope has entirely subsided." He had heard of the dejection which prevailed amongst some of the Sepoy regiments. What was the course he took? He saw every officer; he visited the regiments; he determined not to act with harshness towards the men. Not calling them to courts martial, he depended upon the influence of reason with them, and in the course of a very short time, he succeeded in completely re-establishing the confidence which had been so deeply shaken. The Sepoy regiments were for a time depressed by the expected difficulties of the Khyber Pass—when they found some of their countrymen coming from Cabul with dreadful stories of the cruelty to which they had been exposed—when they declared their readiness to meet any enemy in the open field—when they said, "We will advance to Jellalabad for the rescue of General Sale, but we tell you fairly that the idea of advancing to Cabul presses upon our spirits." I hope the House will not think too harshly of these men, when it considers the noble manner in which they retrieved their character. If we wanted any thing else to add to the interest of these scenes, it would be found in their association with the ancient history of the world. I was struck by the recollection, that it was in the self-same region, and in the midst of similar scenes, that one of the greatest of ancient conquerors, 2,300 years ago, was displaying his power, and encountering the same difficulties that for a time depressed the spirit and damped the courage of our Sepoys. And I was struck by the account given by the Roman historian of the dejection which prevailed even in the ranks of the Macedonian phalanx, when they had to encounter and overcome the difficulties of the same terrible region—to cross the very same rivers, to force the very same passes. This is the speech attributed to Alexander, and which the historian tells us he found it necessary to address to the gallant military force which accompanied him. He found it necessary not to punish but to address them. He did so in these words:

"Date hoc precibus meis et tandem obstinatum rumpite."

He observed that the passage of these rivers of the Punjaub, and the accounts of the formidable character of the enemy, had shaken the confidence of his troops. Wherefore he says:

"Ubi est ille clamor alacritatis vestræ index? Ubi ille meorum Macedonum vultus? Non agnosco vos milites."

He addressed them in vain. The historian says,

"Quumque illi in terram demissis capitibus tacere perseverarent."

He then said to them,

"Itē reduces domos; itē deserto rege orantes. Ego hic à vobis desperatæ victoriæ, aut honestæ mortis locum inveniam."

These were the words which Alexander addressed to his fainting troops. Amidst these very rivers of the Punjaub—amidst these very Affghan passes, Alexander pursued a course similar to that which at another period was adopted by another military commander—he attempted not by severity—not by enforcing the rigid rules of war, but by reasoning with his men to revive their drooping spirits; and he succeeded. If the Macedonian phalanx needed such an address from the mighty conqueror who led them, let us not judge too harshly of our sepoy, if in the midst of similar difficulties they yielded for a moment to a sense of depression. Now, what were the military services of General Pollock? He forced the Khyber Pass by a series of operations carried on from the 7th to the 16th of April. He reached Jellalabad on the 16th of April, although in the Pass 10,000 men had been opposed to him. He remained with General Sale for a time; then advanced towards Cabul, reached Gundamuck in August, and on the 8th of September defeated the Ghilzies. On the 8th of September he was met at Tezeen by Akhbar Khan, with a force of 10,000 men, on the very field of action where lay the bodies of those who had been massacred with ferocious cruelty, and gross breach of faith—on that very spot, General Pollock, aided by General Sale, was completely successful in vindicating the honour and invincibility of the British arms, and on the 16th of September General Pollock entered Cabul, the British flag was hoisted on the Bala Hissar, and the national anthem of "God save the Queen," resounded through the streets of the re-captured city. In whatever point of view his services is regarded—whether as relates to his conduct in the field, his judgment, his discretion, or the happy skill with which he revived the drooping spirit of his soldiers—I think the House will unanimously award to General Pollock the highest distinction which a military man can receive, and record their public acknowledgment to him for his gallantry and perseverance in the face of such serious difficulties. With respect to General Nott, I think that no one can have read the letters written by him in the course of the severe trial to which he was exposed, without finding in that correspondence internal evidence that he must be a man highly deserving of public confidence. General Nott, when the insurrection at Cabul broke out, occupied Candahar, and under his command were the inferior stations of Ghuznee and Khelat-i-Ghilzie. On the 7th of March a powerful force was collected around Candahar. General Nott left 2,600 men in the garrison, and marched out to attack the enemy, who were collected under a prince of the name of Suftur Jung. He came up with them on the 9th, and defeated them; and he states this remarkable and most creditable fact, that during a march of five days, he being weak in cavalry, and the enemy having 6,000 horse, such was the discipline and steadiness of the troops, that not one camel was taken, and not a particle of baggage was missing. On the 29th of May, Ackbar Khan having effected a junction with Prince Suftur Jung, General Nott, who was then reinforced by General England, left General England in command of the city, and advanced to attack the enemy. On that day the Ghazees had 8,000 men occupying a strong position, and 2,000 men guarding the Baba Wullee Pass and the road leading to their camp. General Nott was again completely successful. Whilst he was carrying on these operations an assault was made upon Khelat-i-Ghilzie. A captain was in command there, whose name ought to be mentioned, Captain Craigie. The force under his command consisted almost exclusively of sepoy. He was attacked by two divisions of 2,000 men; but the attack was repelled by the discipline and steadiness of the small band which he commanded. These are the men, captains and lieutenants—you cannot include their names in the vote of thanks—but these are the men, and I will mention their names, who are to constitute our future commanders; and I know that although they cannot be included nominally in our vote, yet that it will be gratifying to them, humble as their rank may be, to know that when these thanks are proposed, our gratitude is not exclusively confined to those who were actually at the head of our armies. General Nott, availing himself of the discretion that was given to him, moved from Candahar on the 10th of August; on the 30th he defeated Shumshoodeen Khan, about twenty-seven miles from Ghuznee; on the 6th of September he took Ghuznee and destroyed the fortifications; on the 17th of September he was within five miles of Cabul, and a few days after he effected a junction with General Pollock, who had reached that place. Notwithstanding he had been ordered to evacuate Candahar, in consequence of the disastrous intelligence which had reached the Governor-general, still, during six months of adverse fortune and complete silence, that brave man's gallant spirit never quailed. It was painful to him to think of retiring; he thought of nothing but of retrieving the honour of the British name; and I do not confine my admiration of General Nott merely to his military prowess and skill, but I say that the mind which conceived the expressions contained in the letter addressed by him to General England are proofs of a noble spirit equal to any emergency, and command the highest acknowledgments on the part of a grateful country. In that letter, written also on the 18th of April, 1842, after the failure of General England, he says:—"The troops at Candahar are four months in arrears, and we have not one rupee in the treasury. In the event of much field service, we should run short of musket-ammunition; and we are without medicine for the sick and wounded. I think it absolutely necessary that a strong brigade of 2,500 men should be immediately pushed from Quetta to Candahar with the supplies."

And, further on, he observes:—"The people of this country cannot withstand our troops in the open field. I am well aware that war cannot be made without loss, but I yet hope that British troops can oppose Asiatic armies without defeat; and I feel and know that British officers should never despair of punishing the atrocious and treacherous conduct of a brutal enemy. I feel obliged to you for pointing out the many difficulties attending our position, but you are well aware that it is our first and only duty to overcome difficulties, when the national honour and our military reputation are so deeply concerned. Nothing can be accomplished without effort and perseverance. In reply to the last paragraph of your letter of the 10th instant, I have only to observe, that I have not yet contemplated falling back; without money, I can neither pay the long arrears due to the troops, nor procure carriage for field operations."

I say, considering all these circumstances—considering the separation of that man—the silence of six months which had occurred, and the failure of General England—that the man who wrote that letter is a man of whom this country may be justly proud—that his name will be treasured in the memory of his country, and that this letter will be one of its most honourable records. And when Lord Ellenborough offered to General Nott the option of deciding upon the route of Ghuznee and Cabul, I think that the letter which General Nott wrote in answer, after fully considering all the advantages and disadvantages of an advance or a retreat, and stating that he had made his mind up neither respecting an advance or a retreat, but that if an opportunity offered, he would make decisive efforts to re-establish the British name and authority in India—I think that such a letter is a worthy companion to the letter of the 18th of April, addressed to General England. The letter is No. 416 in the printed papers, and is dated Candahar, July 26, 1842. After all the abhorrence which the treachery and cruelty of the Affghans towards our troops must naturally have excited in the minds of the British in India, this letter contains the most honourable testimony, not merely to the intellectual, but to the moral character of General Nott. Amidst all the difficulties he had to contend with, and all the provocations he had received, he writes—"I am most anxious, notwithstanding the conduct of the Affghan chiefs, that our army should leave a deep impression on the people of this country of our character for forbearance and humanity."

I am sure the House will excuse my taking up its time, if, on a subject so deeply interesting to our feelings, I am desirous of leaving upon record the sense which the country entertains of the services rendered to it by these men. It is impossible that, having mentioned the names of Pollock and Nott, I should omit the mention of another name, and the services rendered by another gallant man—Sir Robert Sale. From the day he occupied Jellalabad to the day on which he advanced triumphantly to Cabul, his operations were distinguished by the most indomitable spirit of valour, endurance, and devotedness to his country's honour. Although with a force far inferior in numbers to those under the other generals, yet never were deeds more glorious to the character of the British arms achieved than were those which, during the period of ten months that intervened between the occupation by Sir Robert Sale of Jellalabad on the 11th of November, 1841, to the 7th of September, 1842, when he advanced leading his small but illustrious army to meet their brethren in arms at Cabul, were achieved by that gallant band. General Sale took possession of Jellalabad on the 11th November, 1841. He came there surrounded by thousands of hostile people. He says, in one of his letters, that he occupied Jellalabad with only two days' provision. In his march from Cabul, choice was given to him either to return to Cabul or to go on to Jellalabad, and he most wisely determined to go to Jellalabad. When he got there he found the walls of the city, 2,800 yards in circumference, and all the ramparts, entirely ruined, the parapets thrown down, the bastions destroyed, and the fortifications, for upwards of 400 yards, entirely dismantled. From the extent of the destruction of the walls, it was impossible for a man to show his face in consequence of being totally without any cover. In the course of that same day, the place was surrounded by 5,000 insurgents; on the next day General Sale heard of the failure of Brigadier-general Wilde, while at the very same moment a considerable portion of Shah Soojah's troops, under General Sale's command, had shown indications of a doubtful character, so that he was obliged to part with them. Amidst all these difficulties and privations, the men laboured with such a degree of cheerfulness and devotion, that in the early part of February they had succeeded in re-establishing the defences. Three of the gates were retrenched, and a ditch, ten feet in depth and twelve feet in width, was dug entirely round the town, the men handling the sword at one time and the pickaxe and spade at another; they completed the parapets, raising them six or seven feet, so that by the 16th or 17th of February, the troops were exulting in the success of their operations, and contemplating with joy the completion of their defences and the strength of their powers of resistance. On the 19th of February, 1842, there was an earthquake, which utterly destroyed every thing. By that shock, all that had been done, besides three parts of the town itself, was destroyed, and that gallant army had the mortification to see that, by the visitation of one night, all the results of their past labours had vanished. Within the space of little more than a month, a hundred shocks occurred within the hearing of the town. But, undismayed by this reverse, the troops renewed their labours, and repaired the ruined walls, and never for one moment did they abate in their exertions except upon the approach of the enemy, when it became necessary for those gallant men to attack and repulse them. Ackbar Khan, flushed with success, advanced from Cabul, and arrived before Jellalabad. The earthquake took place on the 19th of February, when all the works and three parts of the town were destroyed. On the 21st and 22nd of February, General Sale attacked Ackbar Khan; and from that time to April, he and his troops were kept in a state of apprehension, and, though not actually engaged, they were constantly on the watch, in order that they might be prepared to resist the attack of Ackbar Khan. General Pollock was, during this, making every exertion to relieve General Sale and the troops at Jellalabad. On the 7th of April, General Sale heard the firing of guns in the camp of Ackbar Khan. It was rumoured, that the firing was on account of the failure of General Pollock making his way through the Khyber Pass. General Sale had reason to believe, that it was either on that account, or else an indication that Ackbar Khan intended to withdraw. General Sale, therefore, determined to attack Ackbar Khan, who had the command of 16,000 troops, while General Sale's force only amounted to 1,800. The attack was made, and it was entirely successful; the enemy were routed; and although the enemy bore the attack with great courage, the valour of the British troops was triumphant, and victory was the consequence of their enterprise. And that victory would have been almost a cause of unqualified rejoicing, if it had not been purchased at the cost of the life of one of those gallant spirits who have shed increased lustre on the British name, at the cost of the life of Colonel Dennie, who led the British troops against the enemy, and succeeded; but that success was dearly purchased by the sacrifice of his own life. It was a loss, however, in some degree consoled for by the glorious manner of it, and which has been described by a spirit as excellent as his own, who, in offering consolation to his family and friends, says,—“True it is he has lost his life, but he lost it on the field of battle, and in the hour of victory.” That is the consolation which Sir Robert Sale offers to the friends and family of the brave Colonel Dennie. I wish it had been otherwise. I wish it had been possible that either Colonel Dennie's life could have been spared, or that he might have been consoled in the hour of death by the knowledge, that on account of his noble bravery and of his high character—having no other interest or influence than the just influence and interest which such courage and devotion as his ought always to command—the Queen had signified her own special and personal wish that Colonel Dennie should have been one of her own aides-de-camp. On the 16th of April, 1842, General Sale was relieved by General Pollock. On the 20th of August, he advanced towards Cabul, and on the 18th of September, he witnessed on the Beymaroo Heights the victory of Cabul. We are now acknowledging military services; but I never should excuse myself if, in mentioning the name of Sir Robert Sale, I did not record my admiration of the character of a woman who has shed lustre on her sex—Lady Sale, his wife. The names of Sir Robert and of Lady Sale will be familiar words with the people of this country. I hold in my hand a memorandum of events which occurred in the neighbourhood of Cabul, from the 7th of November, written by Lady Sale, and a document more truly indicative of a high, a generous, and a gallant spirit I never read. There was an officer at that time at Cabul who stood in the relation of son-in-law to Sir Robert Sale—his name was Sturt. He held no higher rank than that of lieutenant, and died young; but he lived long enough to establish also a name which will long be remembered. Will the House permit me to read an account which, writing to her husband, Sir Robert Sale, she gives of his merits. She says,—“Sturt was sent by the general with a message to Ackbar Khan; he was stabbed in four places—his face, his shoulder, his arm, and in his side.”

This was on the 4th of November. She says,—“Sturt is able to speak; his wound in the shoulder is worse; he is weak, but his side is not so bad. The lungs are uninjured; his face wound is near the corner of his eye. He was struck on the bone with such force that he was stunned for a moment.”

On the 6th of November, two days after he received his wounds, Lady Sale writes,—“Sturt insisted, weak as he was, on going to the general, as there was no engineer there but himself. The general gave him leave to do as he pleased.”

On the 7th of November, she says,—“Sturt's wounds are doing well, but he overworks his strength. He cannot yet open his mouth. His tongue has greatly suffered, and all nourishment is given with a spoon. He is out all day. The soldiers lead him about. Last night, he did not go to bed till one o'clock, and then he was awakened up just afterwards, the general requiring his assistance.”

Who, that reads this, can fail to express his admiration at such noble conduct? His death is thus described by Lieutenant Eyre. He says, speaking of a certain attack made by Ackbar Khan—“Providentially the whole escaped, with the exception of Lady Sale, who received a slight wound in the arm. The rear-guard, consisting of her Majesty's 44th and 54th Native Infantry, suffered severely; and at last, finding that delay was only destruction, they followed the general example, and made the best of their way to the front. Another horse-artillery gun was abandoned, and the whole of its artillerymen slain. Captain Anderson's eldest girl, and Captain Boyd's youngest boy, fell into the hands of the Affghans. It is supposed that 3,000 souls perished in the pass, amongst whom were Captain Paton, assistant quartermaster-general; and Lieutenant St. George, 37th Native Infantry; Majors: Griffiths, 37th Native Infantry, and Scott, her Majesty's 44th; Captains: Bott, 5th Cavalry, and Troup, brigade-major, Shah's force; Dr. Cardew, and Lieutenant Sturt, engineers, were wounded, the latter mortally. This fine young officer had nearly cleared the defile when he received his wound, and would have been left on the ground to be hacked to pieces by the Ghazees, who followed in the rear to complete the work of slaughter, but for the generous intrepidity of Lieutenant Mein, of her Majesty's 13th Light Infantry, who, on learning what had befallen him, went back to his succour, and stood by him for several minutes, at the imminent risk of his own life, vainly entreating aid from the passers-by. He was at length joined by Serjeant Deane, of the Sappers, with whose assistance he dragged his friend on a quilt through the remainder of the pass, when he succeeded in mounting him on a miserable pony, and conducted him in safety to the camp, where the unfortunate officer lingered till the following morning, and was the only man of the whole force who received Christian burial. Lieutenant Mein was himself at this very time suffering from a dangerous wound in the head, received in the previous October, and his heroic disregard of self, and fidelity to his friend in the hour of danger, are well deserving of a record in the annals of British valour and virtue."

It is but just, Sir, that the name of Lieutenant Mein should be mentioned with honour in the House of Commons. I shall not regret having noticed his generous act, since it has called forth so general and generous an expression of sympathy towards that brave and good man; for these are the instances, (and proud am I to know that there are many of them) of a generous devotion and fidelity displayed by the British soldier when engaged in the arduous service of his country. I am thankful for the attention which the House has paid to me. I do trust that I shall have convinced this House, previously prepared, I am sure, to embrace the conviction, that all parties concerned in these military operations, for the services they rendered to their country, are entitled to the gratitude and thanks of this House. It is impossible to contemplate these services without feeling proud of the British name. When we recollect what was going on in another quarter in that portion of the world, that while we were thus vindicating the honour of the British name in the north-west of India, we were conducting with consummate skill, at a great sacrifice, and with complete success, military and naval operations in China, it is impossible to contemplate the events in Asia in the year 1842, without being truly proud of the conduct and courage of our countrymen. I am willing to believe that these unquestionable proofs of the military reputation of England—of the United Kingdom—notwithstanding the long interval of peace, stands as high as it did during the excitement of the war, and I would fain hope that the decisive proofs which we have given, that our energies and military virtues are unabated, will constitute a great additional guarantee of continued peace. But if they fail doing that, and if in the maintenance of the national interests, or the vindication of the national honour, it shall be necessary to rouse those exertions, and to make them on a more extended scale, then I feel the utmost confidence that these gallant exploits are a proof that every interest of England will be maintained, and that English honour will be vindicated, in whatever quarter of the globe it may be infringed or violated. The right hon. baronet, in conclusion, moved the following resolutions:—

"That the thanks of this House be given to the right hon. Lord Ellenborough, Governor-general of the British possessions in the East Indies, for the ability and judgment with which the resources of the British empire in India have been applied in the support of the military operations in Afghanistan.

"That the thanks of this House be given to Major-general Sir George Pollock, G.C.B.; to Major-general Sir William Nott, G.C.B.; to Major-general Sir John M'Caskey, K.C.B.; to Major-general Sir Robert Henry Sale, G.C.B.; to Major-general Richard England, and the other officers of the army, both European and Native, for the intrepidity, skill, and perseverance displayed by them in the military operations in Afghanistan, and for their indefatigable zeal and exertions throughout the late campaign.

"That this House doth highly approve and acknowledge the valour and patient perseverance displayed by the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, both European and Native, employed in Afghanistan, and that the same be signified to them by the commanders of the several corps, who are desired to thank them for their gallant behaviour."

Motion agreed to nem. con. and it was ordered that Mr. Speaker transmit the resolutions of the House to the Governor-general of India, and that his lordship be requested to communicate the same to the several officers referred to therein.

THE NEW POOR-LAW.

FEB. 23, 1843.

Mr. Walters moved a series of resolutions condemnatory of the existing mode of administering relief, and calling upon the House to demand such a reconstruction of the existing system as would make it conformable to Christianity, sound policy, and the ancient constitution of the realm.

Sir ROBERT PEEL:—The hon. and gallant officer (Mr. Borthwick) says it is a misapprehension to suppose that the present law is founded on the act of Elizabeth, and challenges us to enter into a comparison of one act with the other. Now, Sir, I will accept the challenge of the hon. and gallant officer, and I will endeavour to show to him, as I think successfully, that the present law is not, as he appears to think, at variance with the law of Elizabeth; and if I shall succeed in proving this, I think I shall render it somewhat difficult for the hon. and gallant gentleman to vote for the resolutions of the hon. member for Nottingham, which he calls upon the House to support as being in consonance as well with the law of Elizabeth as with true Christian principles. By the terms "the ancient constitution of the realm," I think I understood the hon. member rightly to mean, not our form of political government, but the rights confided and guaranteed to the poor of this country by the act of Elizabeth. Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to what were the particular enactments of that law. The hon. and gallant gentleman who spoke last, would lead the House to suppose that there was something particularly tender, something extremely merciful and benevolent, towards the poor in that statute. [General Johnson: No! no!] No! no! Sir, the hon. and gallant gentleman challenged a comparison between the new law and the statute of Elizabeth. Did he not say, that in the new law we had departed from that statute, and that the poor now ceased to possess those rights to which by that statute they were entitled? I am sure I state the hon. and gallant gentleman's arguments correctly. The same arguments were put forward by speaker after speaker in this discussion; and when I am about to accept the challenge thrown out by the hon. and gallant gentleman, he interrupts me. It has certainly been assumed, that the legislature of the present day have subjected the poor of this country to hardships from which they were exempt at more remote periods of our history. Now let us see what was done in respect to the poor in the reign of Elizabeth. I am not now contending, that if there were hardships in the reign of Elizabeth, that is a reason why they should continue now. I am only dealing with the positive statement, that the present law is much more harsh in its operation than the law of Elizabeth, and my object will be answered if I disprove that statement. See what was enacted with respect to cottages in the reign of Elizabeth. The legislature wished, as far as possible, to discourage the construction of cottages, and of habitations for the poor; and, accordingly, a law was passed, prohibiting the erection of any new cottage unless the builder of the cottage attached to it in fee simple four acres of ground. The legislature, moreover, provided, with respect to all cottages actually existing at the time, that none of them should be inhabited, unless they were inhabited by a game-keeper for the protection of deer, or by a shepherd for the protection of sheep, that shepherd having no family; and, also, that all such previously existing cottages should be inhabited by one family only, and that that family should not be allowed to increase its numbers. Is it not quite clear, that the condition of attaching four acres of land in fee-simple to all cottages that were thenceforward to be built, was intended as a prohibition to the building of cottages? And yet such a reservation was made and enacted by the 31st of Elizabeth. I now come to speak of the 43rd of Elizabeth. What did that law enact? Why, this; that overseers should be enabled to put to work all poor persons who were able to work, but who had no occupation, and were incapable of maintaining themselves. They were enabled to put those persons to work, at the parish expense, at the manufacture of flax, hemp, and iron. Nothing is said respecting the mode in which they were to work. There was no prohibition to employing them in workhouses. There was no obligation, but, at the same time, there was no prohibition against their being so employed. The overseers were at liberty to find them employment at their own homes. Work was the test of poverty, and the condition upon which relief was to be afforded. With respect to the impotent poor, the overseers were empowered to take them from their homes, and place them in something corresponding to a workhouse. All the blind, the lame, and the impotent, so far from being left at home, were placed at the mercy of the overseers. The overseers were empowered to purchase houses, and place them in those houses, while they were compelled by the enactments of the 31st of Elizabeth, to prevent more than one family from occupying each cottage existing previous to that act. An exemption, however, was made in respect to parish cottages, in which the overseers were authorised to place as many families as they pleased. Then what were the merciful enactments of the 31st of Elizabeth, respecting children, and what the power given to overseers under that act? Why, this, that whenever they determined that certain parties were unable to maintain their children, they were empowered to take those children from their parents, and bind them apprentices. But that is not all: they might take the children of any person whom they thought incompetent to maintain his family, and bind the man child, as he was called, in any remote part of the kingdom, where he would be required to work for another person—for how long, think you? until he had attained the age of twenty-six years; while, in the case of the female child, she was to remain an apprentice, severed from the bosom of her family, and removed from the protection of her parents, until she had reached the age of twenty-one years, or until she was married. Now, taking the present law as a whole, I must say, that it is much more merciful. Would you tolerate, now, that the overseers of a parish should be enabled to take the children, not of persons receiving relief, but of any persons whom they might consider unable to maintain their children, and dispose of those children in the manner I have described, through a fear that they might become a burden to the parish? Do you tolerate, now, that children should be torn from their parents, by the authority of the overseers, and by the same authority, be sent to Cornwall or to Northumberland, and there bound apprentices until they are twenty-six years of age, or in the case of females, until they are married? There is no obligation on the overseers, by this act of Elizabeth, to employ persons for whom work was found in any particular house, and so the act continued—but it did not continue to the date of the new Poor-law. Hon. gentlemen have assumed that with the new poor-law originated the workhouse test, in lieu of the labour test; but, so far from that being the truth, 120 years ago, in the 9th of George I., owing to the gross abuses which had arisen out of the mode of employing the poor in parishes, owing to the great expenses which were incurred in those parishes, and to the charges connected with the manufacture of hemp, flax, and iron—in 1722, owing to those abuses, another act was passed which enabled the overseers to provide a house, wherein the able-bodied poor should work, and which expressly enacted that in case an able-bodied poor man refused to work within that house, he should forfeit his entire claim to relief. That act applied the workhouse test in lieu of the labour test. Upon the combined operation and experience of those two acts, the 43rd of Elizabeth and the 9th of George I., the latter act having been passed 120 years ago, founded on the gross abuses of the overseers in vestries, purchasing the articles I have named, and giving them out to the poor without accounting for the profits, if profits there were, and on the gross misapplication of the public funds, that act having been the first act which applied the workhouse test in lieu of the labour test, and having been so continued until the new Poor-law—upon the experience of these two acts, and upon the principle which the latter had already established, was the question dealt with by the government, and the new Poor-law enacted. In consequence of the inconvenience of having the management of the poor confided to individual parishes, another principle was adopted by the 9th of George I., and followed in the present Poor-law—that of enabling parishes to unite for the purpose of having common workhouses wherein to employ the poor. I think I have succeeded in showing that the present law, as regards the workhouse test, is not a new law, and that it is not, as it is said to be, at variance with the constitution of the country—if by the word “constitution” we are to understand ancient laws which have been continued for the maintenance and benefit of the people. The resolutions now before the House also appeared to assume that the existing law is founded strictly upon certain suggestions which were offered for the consideration of the government. It is absolutely necessary that a government, before it matures any plan, should seek for, and should procure suggestions. I will venture to say, that no great measure has ever passed without the aid of such suggestions, which were afterwards considered and put into shape. But is it fair, even if those suggestions come into another person's possession in the most legitimate way, that one suggestion should be taken, and it should then be assumed that they had been acted upon by the government? Suppose, however, it should turn out that the suggestion has been rejected. Can any one be so unjust as to say, that a suggestion offered to the government and rejected

—which the government refused to adopt—is it not too much to ask the House of Commons to resolve that the suggestion so rejected is that on which the measure of the government is based? In the first place I object, even if an hon. member were in possession of memoranda or a draft presented for the consideration of the government, to produce any such paper, because it would be very prejudicial to the preparation of great measures if that House should consent to recognise the principle that all the private information on which it is founded or acquired during the preparation should be produced. But it is said the paper was printed. Why, to be sure it was printed. When fourteen or fifteen gentlemen meet together to consider a long or elaborate paper, it is usual to have it printed for their use, but although it was printed, it was considered as confidential as if it had been written. From nothing could greater inconvenience arise than if papers of a confidential nature, containing suggestions, whether they were adopted or, as in this case, not adopted, should be called for and produced. Let me take an instance from private life of the draft of a settlement or of a covenant returned unapproved of, could any thing be more unjust than to implicate a man in the contents if it were rejected by him? With regard to these resolutions, it is declared that the recommendations alluded to,—“Applicable alike to every class of the poor, and enjoining the indiscriminate reduction of their physical comforts to the lowest endurable point, are shown, by the subsequent orders and practice of the Poor-law Commissioners, to form the real, though unavowed basis of the present system of Poor-law relief.”

That is to say, that the refusal of out-door relief forms the basis of the present law. Now my right hon. friend the secretary for the home department (Sir James Graham) has shown that during the last year 221,000 persons has received in-door relief, and 1,207,000 persons have received out-door relief. How is it possible, then, to say that the suggestion to put down out-door relief is the basis of the existing law, when five out of six cases of relief under it are cases of out-door relief? How can it be said that this law is more severe than the Poor-law in any other country? I will venture to assert, it can be demonstrated that each poor person thus relieved received more, in reference to the riches of the country—a much larger sum—than persons in the same situation in any other country on the face of the earth. I am not now speaking of the law expenses, of the expenses incurred in the construction of the poor-houses, or of the interest to be paid for the money necessary for such construction; I am speaking of the money exclusively applied for the relief of the poor. In the year 1842, the number of 1,429,000 persons received relief, 221,000 in the work-house, and 1,207,000 out of the workhouse. The sum appropriated for this relief was £4,036,000. (On an average of three years 1,309,000 persons had been relieved, and the sum of £3,887,000 had been distributed. Why that was nearly £3 a-head received by each poor person. If you take into consideration the condition of the paupers in the other countries on the face of the globe, and made an allowance for the difference of wealth, he doubted whether in any country the poor received more. I am surprised to hear the speech of the learned gentleman the member for Cocker-mouth (Mr. Aglionby); I have seen him upon several occasions rise above party considerations, and vote according to the dictates of his own mind. When I heard the learned member's speech, and his intention to vote for these resolutions, my surprise was so great I could scarcely express it. The hon. member may measure the extent of my respect for him by the extent of my surprise. The hon. member said he had voted for the Poor-law; he approved of the principle on which it was founded; he had expected from it great good; the hon. member said, that, upon the whole, he had not been disappointed—that upon the whole it had performed the object for which it was enacted—it had tended to increase the comfort and elevate the condition of the poor. If the hon. and learned member had said that, as a bill was to be introduced to remedy any defects in the law, he would give notice of his intention to vote in favour of the remedies for all those defects, he could have understood the hon. member. [Mr. Aglionby had meant to say so.] The hon. and learned gentleman has taken every opportunity of supporting the Poor-law, his opinion was that its operation had been beneficial; he had not been disappointed upon the whole, although in some cases he found errors; he found that the condition of the poor under the operation of the bill had been good; and then he said he would give his vote for a resolution declaring that,—“The suffering already caused by the partial enforcement (of the principles), and the amount of out-door relief, in spite of them, still administered, show their provisions to have been at once cruel and impracticable."

And not only this, but the hon. member went the length of voting in the last resolution that,—“It is expedient to demand such a reconstruction of the existing system as shall make it conformable to Christianity, sound policy, and the ancient constitution of this realm.”

A man who denounces the law altogether ought to vote for these resolutions; but that an admirer of the law, that one who thought it had been beneficial in operation and tended altogether to the improvement of the condition of the poor, should give his vote for resolutions which condemn the law, and demand its total and complete repeal, recollecting, at the same time, what had been the uniform practice in former times, does fill me with complete surprise. Does the hon. member not think that he will damage a law, which, speaking generally, has been beneficial in its operation, and that upon the whole it has increased the physical comforts of the poor? As we have got a law of this kind, let us take care how we denounce it as not conformable to Christianity. I have still confidence, however, in the hon. and learned member to believe that he will not oppose the law, which, on the whole, has worked well, and will not vote with the hon. member for Finsbury, who denounces the law altogether. The hon. member for Finsbury, full of the milk of human kindness, began his speeches with charges and imputations. He said that it was most unparliamentary—nay, more than that, that it was unjust to establish an inquisition, and to judge of men, not only by their conduct, but to dive into the recesses of their hearts, and then impute motives to them; and in a few minutes after he went on to say, that whoever drew up these suggestions, recommending such a system as the present, were fiends in human shape—were heartless monsters—were, but I cannot—I really cannot—follow the hon. member; I break down altogether in the attempt. The hon. gentleman may say that those charitable motives ought only to influence us in reference to members of parliament, and that as those suggestions were not drawn up by members of parliament, it was not contrary to usage, or uncharitable, to impute motives to the authors of them. But the hon. member himself dealt rather uncharitably even towards members of parliament opposed to his views; he proceeded to make charges against me with respect to certain declarations of mine on the subject of the Poor-law; he charged me with desiring to gain support at the period of a general election by denouncing the Poor-law, and yet having in office supported that law. He made no exemption whatever, and put an erroneous construction on what I said respecting the commissioners. I gave the same support to the law when out of office that I have given since, and at the general election I said, that although I admitted that parts of the Poor-law required amendment, and that I should be willing to listen to any improvements that might be suggested for the benefit of the poor, I had not changed my opinion respecting the commissioners, and could not therefore ask my constituents to support me on the supposition that I would take a different course upon the subject of the Poor-law from which I had hitherto taken. In fact, I made precisely the same declaration to my constituents at the two last elections, and it is therefore rather hard to be accused of holding one language in office and another when out of office. And so the hon. member for Finsbury, forgetting the charitable construction which he would have others put upon his motives, said that those who had declared for repeal, if their opinions remained the same, ought to vote for repeal. But I have heard very few indeed say that they would not support the principle of the Poor-law, while they at the same time insisted on its amendment and modification. The hon. member for Nottingham said that nothing could be more ridiculous than for any man merely for the sake of consistency to vote in favour of a measure of this kind if once he was honestly convinced it had failed. I readily allow that any man who could say, that although he was convinced that this law was expensive and obnoxious in its operation, and unsound in principle, yet that through a mere regard to consistency, or party motives, or through a desire to take a more active part in public life, he would vote against the dictates of his conscience and give it his support—I readily allow that such a man must be base indeed, and that such a course would be as unwise as it would be unjust. We should come to a decision on the question in accordance with our own conscientious convictions, and not from the influence of any clamour that might be raised against it. Nothing can be more easy than to raise a clamour against any particular law for the relief of the poor. I can conceive, with respect to persons in that condition of life which might possibly make them, under adverse circumstances, applicants for Poor-law relief, that an argument more calculated to excite their passions could not be used than that which had been used by the hon. member for Nottingham. The hon. member says that the blacks in Jamaica drive their gigs and drink their champagne. But the House must bear in mind that those blacks are now free labourers, and entitled to all the privileges of free subjects, and the mere circumstance of their colour being black makes no difference. Suppose that a portion of the blacks do drive their gigs and drink champagne—and their number I presume must be limited—still they must pay for these things, and they earn their money by the sweat of their brow. But the hon. gentleman says (and I suppose him now addressing a collection of 5,000 persons), “True it is, I cannot give you gigs to drive about in, or champagne to drink; but what a miserable law it is which prevents me giving you, not champagne, but the ancient, constitutional drink of the country—ale?”

The hon. gentleman says, the law is to be impeached, because it does not give an adequate supply of the ancient constitutional beverage of the country to the poor. Now, it seems always to be assumed that there is a large existing fund applicable to the Poor-law relief; but whence is that fund derived? From taxation. On whom does the taxation fall? Let us never forget those who are a little elevated above pauperism, and who, being fixed to their places, cannot move—the small farmer, the retail shopkeeper, and the artisan, who determine to derive no relief from the Poor-law, because they are inspired with a love of independence, which we ought to cherish. These men support their families by the sweat of their brow; and they say, “We must contribute to the relief of the poor; but give us security that the money is not misapplied—give us security that it is not appropriated to the support of idleness; and when we cannot afford ale for our own families, we cannot find ale for those who won't work.” A law that gives them that security is a just law. Let the House take the whole of the circumstances into consideration, and contrast the operation of the present law with the operation of the law under which the overseers supplied the means of maintenance to the poor, and, being bakers and dealers in flour and articles of subsistence, charged, as I can show, 40 per cent. advance on the articles so supplied. I must say that the poor man, elevated above dependence, and struggling against the necessity of applying for Poor-law relief, but being bound to contribute towards the fund for the relief of the poor out of his scanty means, has a right to say, “Let the accounts be fully examined; let the money be duly and properly applied, and let no overseer or parish-officer make use of this Poor-law system, not for the purpose of relieving the poor, but, as they carry the bag, for the purpose of putting their hands into the bag for their own benefit.” But now it is proposed that, without substituting any other system, and without the proposition of any new law—for we are left in uncertainty as to whether or not we are to return to the old system, and as to the principles of any new system which the hon. gentleman may deem it right to recommend—we should agree to a resolution which implies that the existing law—though no particular parts of it are specified—is “not conformable with Christianity, sound policy, and the ancient constitution of this realm.” I do hope that the House of Commons will be cautious how they pass a resolution specifying what is or what is not conformable with Christianity. This is a dangerous topic; and I hope that those who moot the question of the principle of the present law, or the substitution of another law, will content themselves with moving for the repeal of the law, without involving the House in a discussion on abstract questions. Above all, I trust with respect to a law which, as long as it continues in operation, ought to have the sanction and support of the legislature, that this House will not, in consequence of vague resolutions like the present, offering no practical measure, do any act calculated to raise an outcry against the existing system, and to paralyze every man whose duty it is to administer the law, thereby leaving this country in the worst of all states as regard legislative measures, namely, with one system condemned and in operation, and no practical substitute proposed.

On a division, the numbers were: Ayes, 58; Noes, 126; majority, 68.

SUPPLY—STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

FEBRUARY 24, 1843.

On the Order of the Day being read for going into a Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates, Mr. Hume and Mr. Williams called the attention of the House to the immense amount of the estimates for this year, and to the alarming amount of destitution existing in the country, and implored the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) to apply adequate remedies before it was too late.

SIR ROBERT PEEL had listened with attention to the speeches of the hon. gentleman opposite, and he thought, that many points which they had discussed, would have been much better deferred till the estimates were under consideration. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Williams) had postponed his observations with respect to the civil, the superannuation, and the naval and military pension lists, until the estimates were brought specifically before the House, a much better opportunity would have been given for affording explanations on the points to which he had referred. But the House must not take it for granted, although the hon. gentleman stated, that he had bestowed much time on his calculations, and was convinced of their entire correctness, that the compliment which the hon. gentleman had paid himself was entirely deserved. The hon. gentleman said, "Look at the amount of the estimates for civil superannuations in 1818, and compare them with those of the present year; see what an increase has taken place;" but the hon. gentleman should know, that a very great proportion of that increase was caused by the reductions which had been made in the civil establishment. In 1830, the Duke of Wellington's government made considerable reductions in the civil establishment; and, subsequently, similar reductions were effected by the governments of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne. But the hon. gentleman must be aware, that it was impossible to effect such reductions without making provision for the parties who were thereby displaced. The hon. gentleman must know, that it might be perfectly consistent with sound economy, and with practical permanent reduction, to exhibit an increase in the amount of civil superannuations. The hon. gentleman said, "I have gone through these estimates; I have compared them with the estimates of former years, and I find an enormous increase in the amount of naval pensions." That was true; but when the hon. member compared the estimates for the present year with those of a former year, he should bear in mind, that at the former period, Greenwich Hospital possessed large funds applicable to naval pensions, of which it was now deprived, and that, consequently, that House was called upon to supply the deficiency. The hon. gentleman said, "Look at the immense amount which is given to the widows and orphans of officers; I cannot conceive what is the reason of this." He begged to inform the hon. member, that the increase to which he alluded had been made in conformity with the recommendation of a parliamentary committee; and he would advise the hon. gentleman not to be too eager in future for the appointment of parliamentary committees. He would advise the hon. member to place more confidence in the executive government with regard to the effecting of retrenchment, and not to refer matters of this kind to parliamentary committees; for his (Sir R. Peel's) experience had shown him that the members of such committees, under the influence of the kindest motives—from a feeling of sympathy towards the friends and relatives of the gallant defenders of their country, were prone to say, "Let us be liberal; compare these services with civil services;" and the result was an increase in the estimates. He would tell the hon. member what had taken place, within his own experience, with regard to the pensions of the widows and orphans of officers. Formerly, the funds for providing pensions for widows and orphans were mainly supplied by the contributions of naval officers, which produced, he believed, a sum of more than £100,000. It was, however, considered unjust that naval officers should be taxed to furnish a fund for this purpose; and a parliamentary committee said:—"It is not fair to levy contributions for supplying pensions for these widows and orphans upon the officers; we, therefore, recommend parliament to abolish this system, and to undertake themselves to provide means for the payment."

That recommendation might or might not be a just one; but the circumstance showed that parliamentary committees were not always favourable to reductions in expenditure, and it accounted for the increase in the estimates under this head, which had so much surprised the hon. gentleman. A comparison had been made between the charge in the year 1791, for naval, military, and ordnance services, with the charge for the present year; but the hon. gentleman had totally admitted the fact, that in the first case the estimate was only for Great Britain; in the present day it was the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The hon. gentleman said that the constitutional practice of the House was not to vote the supplies until the ways and means were before parliament. He apprehended that the constitutional practice had always been to vote the supplies before they voted the ways and means, and that parliament never sanctioned the principle that they should impose taxes in the first instance, without knowing what the exigencies of the public service were; but that, on the contrary, they should first determine what amount the public necessities required, and then supply the means. Neither of the hon. gentlemen had made any motion on this occasion. Of that he did not complain, though no one was less disposed to undervalue the matters to which they had called the attention of the House. The hon. gentlemen the members for Montrose and Coventry must both excuse him for saying, without meaning to express any doubt as to the importance of the matters which they had pressed upon the attention of the House, for no one could be less disposed than he was to undervalue the subject which they had spoken on that evening, that finding they had not had an opportunity in the four or five nights last week that the subject of the distress of the country was debated, of making their speeches on that question, they had taken that opportunity of delivering them. But he hoped that the effect of the hon. gentlemen's speeches would not be to raise a general discussion, and he would not follow the hon. gentlemen through the whole of their speeches, because he thought that the House would be unwilling to go fully into the subject on the present occasion; but if he were so to follow the hon. member for Montrose he thought he could prove to him that his assertion that the consumption of tea had fallen off was not correct; he thought he could prove to him also, that the consumption of tobacco had not fallen off. He thought, moreover, he could prove to him that there was no reduction in the consumption of coffee. The fact was, as the hon. gentleman would remember, that there had been a reduction of duty on coffee, and consequently a smaller amount of duty paid did not necessarily indicate a falling off in the amount of the articles consumed. The hon. member for Coventry (Mr. W. Williams) also, he thought, had come to some erroneous conclusions on some important points, but the most important matter that the hon. gentleman insisted on was this, that the House ought first to ascertain what was the amount of the revenue before they proceeded to vote the estimates. It was quite true that a private individual might do something like this with advantage; it might be possible for him to find accurately the state of his yearly income, and reduce his expenditure accordingly by retrenching superfluities; but in a great country like this such a course was wholly impracticable; the amount of expenditure must necessarily depend on a variety of considerations, and the amount of revenue which might be required in any year could not always be made to depend even on considerations of the distress of the country; something must depend on the state of the relations of this country with other powers; something must depend on the likelihood of war,—something must depend on the necessity of supporting the power of maintaining ourselves on a suitable footing with regard to the force kept up by other countries; and the fact was, that if the House, acting on this principle, were to reduce the expenditure so as to admit of a reduction of revenue, they might speedily find themselves in a situation in which they would be led into increased expenditure. In the year 1822 they reduced the expenditure, but that reduction the hon. gentleman would find led to increased expense. By reducing the military force they had found it was necessary to increase the expense under that head; for it became necessary in consequence to increase the amount of military pensions, and altogether there was a greater expense. Differing, then, from the hon. gentleman on several points, with many of the principles of the hon. gentleman he fully agreed. In the present state of the country especially there was every disposition on the part of her Majesty's government to make efforts to accomplish a reduction of expenditure; but still, looking at all the circumstances of this country, and the situation in which it stood with respect to foreign powers, he said, that supposing the produce of the income-tax should show at the end of next year a material increase of revenue, it would be unjust to calculate upon it as if permanent, intended as it was for present purposes. Under the pressure of taxation which was felt in this country that would be unjust—he said under the pressure of taxation as felt in this country, for he did not agree with the noble lord, that taxation pressed on no country so little as on this. On the contrary, he was confident that the pressure of taxation was the cause which made us unable to undertake many invaluable improvements, incapacitated us from making those sudden and prompt exertions which the exigencies of the state might require. But, however this might be, he must say, that when the House looked at the estimates of the present year, they must have reference, not to the years 1791 or 1822, but to the situation of the country at present; for they could not make reductions in the military and naval establishments with the ease some gentlemen among them did. It was perfectly true that two great wars had been brought to a happy conclusion; but it did not necessarily follow that parliament could reduce at once the naval and military establishments to what they were before those wars began, or to what they were in 1822 or 1791; they must look not merely to the desirableness of an immediate reduction of the expenditure, but at the very great distance at which those wars had been carried on. Take the case of China. It was quite true that the termination of the war with China would relieve the country from all the expense that was necessary to keep up an active state of hostilities; but although a treaty had been agreed to, the House should remember that it had not yet been ratified by the emperor of China. In carrying on hostilities with a country so remote and so powerful as that, it might not be consistent with sound policy to loosen too soon the hold we have upon China. We had concluded a peace with China upon our own terms by the exercise of great valour, great perseverance, and also he was confident by the exercise of great forbearance, convincing the public mind of China that we were not the barbarians they described in their public proclamations. He believed that the people of China were surprised by the conduct of our troops. This he inferred from the apathy of the people when they discovered we were not subject to the charge of being that barbarous race which we had been represented to be. But the House must bear in mind that the Emperor of China had objected to sign the treaty until her Majesty Queen Victoria had signed it. Her Majesty had done so, and it had been sent out to the Emperor, but it had not yet been ratified. He therefore thought there would not be much difference as to the policy they should pursue, in not evacuating the possessions they had obtained there, altogether for a reliance on the forbearance or good faith of the Emperor of China. That he conceived was a competent reason, although the war had been brought to a most successful conclusion, which it must be a satisfaction to be able to maintain with good-will and amicable feeling towards the Emperor of China, why this country should continue to keep a considerable force in the Chinese Seas. He thought the hon. gentleman would not dispute this. [Mr. Hume: I did not say a word about China, I spoke of Syria.] He was only mentioning the case of China, to show that it did not follow that, because in 1842 the war with China had been brought to a successful issue, therefore in 1843 the expenditure of the country could be reduced to what it was before that war commenced. But he thanked the hon. gentleman for having mentioned Syria, for he (Sir R. Peel) conceived it was a strong point in favour of the argument which he was then urging. The hon. member said, that last year we had on the coast of Syria, in the Mediterranean, fifty ships of war, and that we had since reduced them to forty; and the hon. gentleman asked why this was done? For some reason or other, we had such confidence in the sound sense and good feeling of the French nation generally, that we were not disposed to consider the ravings of the newspapers as the expression of the public sentiments. We knew that the French government, and the thinking portion of the nation, were desirous to remain on good terms with us. The newspapers, whatever might be their power, were not always the organs of the national will. There was a great commercial community growing up in France, which would ultimately constitute the public of that country, and would have the power of making its opinions and sentiments known and understood independently of the agency of the newspaper press. However important newspapers might be as auxiliaries in supporting and vindicating the honour of their country, yet they were not at all times to be regarded as the exponents of a nation's feelings.

But we had confidence in the good sense of the community of France, and, without disputing about whether one country or the other had forty sail or fifty sail in the Mediterranean, we were convinced, so long as the good feeling existed between the two countries, whether one or the other chose to keep up a greater or less force, they might depend upon it, it would not increase the danger. Nothing was gained by maintaining an undue amount of force without necessity, and he believed that there was that progress of sound opinion in France, that if any party could for a moment create a war, for the mere purpose of indulging a spirit of military bravado, or of unjust aggression, there would be raised throughout Europe a feeling of indignant resistance at its injustice, more formidable than had ever before been known. He was now speaking of Syria, and did not wish to introduce any party considerations: but he might say that he hoped by the end of this year, instead of ten line-of-battle ships, and fifty sail, there would only be four line-of-battle ships, and twenty-five sail of our ships altogether in the Mediterranean. That, he apprehended, would be deemed a pretty considerable reduction. He trusted, too, that the French government, attending only to the true interests of the people, would, like us, see that every expenditure on warlike preparations which were not necessary to the protection of the country was only, as it were, so much dead loss. The reductions this year upon the naval, military, and ordnance estimates were not less than £832,000; the number of men reduced in the navy would be 4,000; but the House would be aware of the necessity of keeping a strong force in China, where its presence might be still necessary. He must observe that any increase of late years had been in conformity with the wishes of the House, and it was at no period consistent with sound policy or real economy to reduce the military, and still less the naval force of the empire, below a certain standard. Not long since, there were threatening appearances, both in the United States and in Europe, which induced parliament to think that the estimates ought not to be reduced. In the army, the reduction would, he believed, be not less than 5,700 men, but he did not recollect whether that was the precise number. At all events, the estimates were considerably below that of last year. The House might depend upon it, that finance committees were not proper judges of the general necessities of a state. Those must be left to the executive government, although he admitted that finance committees might be able to give a sound opinion as to particular diminutions of expense upon isolated points. What ought to be the amount of force for the protection of the interests of the country, must, after all, remain a question for the decision of the executive government. The members of the cabinet must know far better than any finance committee the state of our relations with foreign countries, justifying an increase or a diminution of our establishments. The reduction in the ordnance department was, he believed, £257,000; and in the whole, as he had stated, the saving this year would be £832,000. The hon. member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) had admitted, that the demand in the shape of estimates was less this year than last, and in the natural candour of his mind, he would be compelled to give ministers credit for a considerable saving of the public money. The hon. member had unquestionably given a very fabulous and imaginary account of the preparation of estimates. The hon. member had asserted that they were not prepared at the Treasury, but by the different departments. Now, if the case were so, great credit was surely due to the departments for having reduced the estimates by the amount of £832,000 in their own expenditure. The tendency of departments was naturally the other way, and unless some control was exercised over that natural tendency, they found great difficulty usually in making material reductions. But the fact was, these estimates were subjected to great control. The departments had first made them out; then the Treasury, knowing what was the state of the revenue, subjected them to a severe scrutiny. He believed that that course had been pursued in former years by former treasurers, and he could assert distinctly that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had devoted the greatest attention to the consideration of the estimates. He deeply lamented the state of the revenue; he lamented its inadequacy, and must bear his testimony to the desire of every member of the government to reduce the estimates to the lowest possible amount. It was necessary to look at the state of the force in various parts of the world, and not to run any unjustifiable risk by unduly lessening our naval and military force. He thought that matters of detail on these subjects could be better discussed when the estimates were regularly before the House, and every information would then be willingly afforded.

The House, after a short discussion, went into committee, several votes were agreed to, and the House resumed.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF SITTING IN THE CABINET.

FEBRUARY 27, 1843.

In reply to some remarks by Lord John Russell, in reference to the Duke of Wellington's position in the cabinet—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he apprehended that there was no constitutional rule against the tenure of a seat in the cabinet by the Commander-in-chief. There were instances in which the Commander-in-chief had formed part of the cabinet, and of these, the case of Marshal Conway, to which the noble lord had referred, was one. It was true, that in recent times there had not been a Commander-in-chief in the cabinet. Sir David Dundas and Lord Hill were not political characters, and it was not remarkable that they, considering their occupation, should not have had a seat in the cabinet. In the case of the Duke of York, it was not probable that a prince of the blood, holding the relation that he did to the throne, should have a seat in the cabinet. As far as constitutional analogy was concerned, he did not see any reason why the Commander-in-chief, in the same way as the Master-general of the Ordnance, should not be allowed to hold a seat in the cabinet. The Duke of Wellington, whilst he was Master-general of the Ordnance, had always held a seat in the cabinet. He presided over the whole of the concerns of that department of the army, and no one thought that the tenure of that office was a reason why he should not hold a seat in the cabinet. Take, again, the instance of the Admiralty. The authority which presided over the whole of the naval service, and superintended the whole of the promotions in the navy, the first lord of the Admiralty, was not excluded from a seat in the cabinet; nor were the lords of the Admiralty disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. Lord Hill, to the great regret of the government, had on account of growing infirmities signified a wish to retire. For some time he had retained his high office rather in accordance with the wish of the government than his own desire, but at last he had been compelled to resign. It then became the duty of the ministers to advise her Majesty as to who should fill the post. Under the circumstances, he (Sir Robert Peel) had not the slightest hesitation in recommending to her Majesty, that he who had so often led the armies of this country to victory, should now be placed at their head. Whatever even might be the general custom, he appealed to the House whether, in this particular case, the whole course of the conduct of the Duke of Wellington, when in command of the army, rendered it in the least probable that political motive would influence him? He (Sir Robert Peel) had thought that the Duke of Wellington was most eminently qualified for the office of Commander-in-chief; but such also was his sense of the high qualifications of that noble Duke for civil as well as military services, that he (Sir R. Peel) should have thought it highly disadvantageous to the country if the military services of the Duke of Wellington had been secured at the expense of his resignation of a share in civil councils. It was quite true that formerly her Majesty's ministers had entertained the opinion, that the holding of the office of first lord of the Treasury and of Commander-in-chief by the same individual was open to objection. The painful duties of both those offices were more than human strength could sustain. But it was entirely a different question whether the offices of first lord of the Treasury and Commander-in-chief could be united, and whether a peer like the Duke of Wellington, not holding office, but having a seat in the cabinet, should hold the command of the army and yet retain his seat. He (Sir R. Peel) did not know whether the Duke of Wellington retained his general opinion with regard to the union of the offices of first lord of the Treasury and Commander-in-chief, but he (Sir R. Peel) claimed for himself the whole responsibility of the late proceeding. At the same time, the unanimous opinion of the cabinet was conveyed to the Duke of Wellington, that it was desirable for the public service that he should accept the command of the army, and at the same time retain his seat in the cabinet. The whole responsibility for that advice fell upon him (Sir R. Peel); and he believed that the Duke of Wellington had taken that course which was in unison both with the public feelings and the public interests.

The House then went into committee.

WAR WITH AFFGHANISTAN.

MARCH 1, 1843.

Mr. Roebuck brought forward the motion of which he had given notice, for the appointment of "A Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances which led to the late hostilities in Affghanistan, and to report the evidence and their observations thereon."

SIR R. PEEL said—Sir, there are two questions—amidst some that are not immediately connected with the main point at issue—there are two more immediately connected with it, which have been brought under the consideration of the House in the course of the present discussion—the one, whether or no the expedition undertaken by the Governor-general of India was consistent with sound policy; and the other, whether it is fitting for the House of Commons to appoint a select committee for the purpose of inquiring into the policy of that expedition. These two questions I consider to be not necessarily connected with each other. I entertain, and have entertained from the first, strong doubts as to the policy of the expedition into Affghanistan. When it was first mentioned in the speech from the throne, I intimated my doubts. From the first period of the session, I said in very strong language, that I thought the adoption of Shah Soojah, without a perfect conviction that his promotion to the throne would be in conformity with the feelings and wishes of the Affghan people, would be very much like, although the scene was different—but would very much correspond with the policy of the adoption of Charles X., and the attempt to force him upon the reluctant people of France; and I said that I did not think the change of the scene, the one operation taking place in Asia, and the other in Europe, made any very material difference in the policy of the measure. With more prophetic wisdom, my noble friend, the Duke of Wellington, predicted that you would succeed in your military operations, but warned you that your difficulties would only begin when your military enterprises were successful; and therefore, Sir, it must not be implied, if I find myself unable to support the motion brought forward by the learned gentleman, that my refusal to support it is an abandonment of my former opinion as to the policy of the original course. Subsequent events have, I think, confirmed the original apprehensions that were entertained. Even if I conceded that the conduct of the Russian agents justified your suspicion, and justified the adoption of active measures against Affghanistan, still I must contend, with respect to undertaking the support of Shah Soojah, under the impression that his accession to the throne would be popular among the Affghan people, that subsequent events proved that impression upon that point to have been erroneous. Shah Soojah had no root in the affections and predilections of the people of that country. In the letters which have been published of the late Colonel Dennie, to whose gallantry I bore a willing tribute the other evening, that gallant officer said, with reference to the force with which he had been left, and which was called Shah Soojah's, "What a farce it is that it should be called Shah Soojah's, when it is entirely composed of Hindoos, and there is not a single Affghan in it!" I think, therefore, that even if I conceded, for the sake of argument, that your suspicions of Russia were well founded, I should still doubt the policy of undertaking the support of a prince who did not possess the affections of his people, and by separating your army from their resources—placing them at a distance of nearly 600 miles, where they were separated from those resources by passes over which you had no command, and where you were entirely dependent upon money to gain those who guarded the passes—and subsequent events have confirmed the doubts which were expressed from that side of the House as to the policy of the expedition. I retain the opinion I before declared, but I consider that question to be perfectly distinct from the question, whether as a member of the government, possessing the confidence of her Majesty, I should think it expedient to lead the influence which a government naturally exercises, to appoint a select committee for the purpose of inquiring into the policy and justice of a great operation undertaken four years ago. [An hon. member, "Oh, oh!"] I should be glad to receive some more intelligible, though not more audible intimation of dissent. I do not know the grounds of the dissent, but probably the hon. gentleman will take an opportunity of explaining them. In considering the question whether I shall assent to a select committee, I shall discard every other consideration than this:—"Is it for the interest of the Crown, whose servant I am, but above all, is it for the public interest, that this inquiry should now be entered upon?" I cannot exclude, on this occasion, the consideration of what is due to the usage of parliament, and if I find that in all the contests of parties, and all the motions of this nature, we adhere to usages, and do not forego them unless under some urgent considerations of public interest, and that if we did we should excite continual dissension, what principles, I ask, should now make me depart from them? Foreign policy has on many occasions been subject to contention. When, indeed, did parties exist, without finding some part or other of the foreign policy of their opponents to condemn? In the revolutions of governments which have taken place, it never has been the usage for any government, on taking possession of office, to use all its power and its influence in this House to bring under investigation the acts of its predecessors. It never has been the custom of the House, and it would not be just now to establish such a precedent. That does not shut out considerations of public interest; but the power of the government is not to be employed against their predecessors in office on mere party considerations. I shall not be influenced, therefore, by party considerations in the vote I mean to give. I might make use of the motion for party purposes. The gentlemen opposite complain of the conduct of the present Governor-general of India, and we are threatened by a motion against him, which I might anticipate by taking advantage of the present motion. If I were influenced by party considerations, I might support the motion of the hon. and learned gentleman for a select committee, and retaliate for the attack on Lord Ellenborough, by promoting the attack on Lord Auckland. But I disclaim being influenced by any such feeling. It is not parliamentary usage for the ministers who command a considerable majority in this House, who have access to all the secrets of office; it is not customary for them to employ their political power in condemning the policy of their opponents. I do not forget what occurred in 1840. I was in opposition, when it was proposed that papers connected with the subject should be laid on the table. A motion was then announced by my right hon. friend, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and I remember that we were influenced in relinquishing that motion, because we would not express any doubt of the success of our military operations beyond the Indus. But our opinion and judgment of the policy, which we then explained, remain the same. If, however, we made no motion of censure on this policy when in opposition, can I be less reluctant now we are in power, now that we are made wiser by events, to call for the opinion of the House on the policy of our predecessors? Sir, when the thanks of this House were voted to Lords Keane and Auckland, the military and civil directors of the war, and when this House consented to vote a grant of money by way of pension to the former of those noble lords, I then, though I fully acquiesced in the public acknowledgments of the House, nevertheless hesitated in giving my sanction to the direct vote of the public money for the purposes to which it was sought to be applied. I must say, that some of those who are to-night the loudest in reprobating the principles of the war, were at that time the loudest in expressing approbation of it. I remember, Sir, that the chief opponent of my views upon one of those occasions, was no less a person than the seconder of the motion now under consideration. When I cautiously made a reserve as to the general policy of the war, and objected especially to the grant of money, the hon. member for Montrose approved of the policy, and also assented to the appropriation of the money. [Mr. Hume.—The policy was not the question.] If I were trusting to my general impression, I might doubt the correctness of my recollection; but I must bring the hon. member to book. Opening a volume of the Parliamentary Debates, the hon. member cannot surely deny that he approved of the policy. [Mr. Hume.—I don't deny it.] Oh! very well; then I have done [cries of "Read, read!"]—Certainly I'll read. This is all stated, you know, in a good humoured way. I don't know where to find the sentences, I'm sure; but I suppose I shall find them somewhere in the climax. We usually find the strongest points in conclusion of a speech. Here is a passage, "I am of opinion that the result of the expedition will go far to strengthen the British power in India." [Mr. Hume.—Oh! read on, read on.] Very well!—I will now read a passage from the beginning of the hon. member's speech, "Having seen the lamentable results of inefficient arrangements, I think the greatest credit is due to the British authorities."

Oh! but he goes further than that: here's another passage—"I think the conduct of Lord Auckland is marked by the greatest wisdom."

Then here's another; now, what will the hon. gentleman say to this?—"I believe that it is an expedition more likely to be beneficial to India than any which has previously taken place."

[Mr. Hume. Read on.] So I have struck the hon. gentleman above and below, and in the middle, and I hope he's satisfied. But I quote this to justify myself in saying, that I have from the first, expressed my distrust of the policy of the expedition, though I am now opposed in objecting to this inquiry to those who formerly gave it great praise. Sir, if the hon. member formerly believed the expedition was so satisfactory, and now votes for the present motion, I am justified in affirming that I shall deal unfairly, and act differently from my conduct when in opposition, were I now to consent to the proposed inquiry. Nothing is more easy than to talk of the House of Commons as the great inquest of the nation—nothing is more easy than to talk of its unlimited power, to inquire into all the actions of men in office, and of its duty to investigate and punish all abuses. But where are the limits to such inquiries? Shall I inquire as to the policy of the Syrian war—as to the effect of our bombardment of St. Jean d'Acre, and as to the effect our conduct on that occasion had upon our relations with France? [Mr. Hume: You ought.] I ought—the hon. member says I ought—and having acquiesced in that inquiry, "as I ought," I shall of course have my acquiescence pleaded as a reason for granting the other committee. We shall have therefore a separate committee on the Syrian war; and I will tell you what this will end in—it will end in transferring the executive government from the Crown to the House of Commons. Because, observe—if on every point of questionable policy this House is to have a committee of inquiry—if such committee is to have the power of sending for persons, papers, and records—if it is to ransack every public office for official documents, and summon every minister of the Crown to give evidence before it, why, the practical result must be, that the executive government will be suspended. Yes, the hon. member for Montrose says, truly enough, that if I grant one committee, I ought to grant another. Of course, the having granted these committees, I may expect that another member will come down and say, that the arrangements under the American treaty are prejudicial to our interests, and that we must have a committee of inquiry on that subject. Having granted the first two committees, I could not refuse the third, and of consequence, I must hand over the executive government to the committees of the House of Commons. Am I then, as a servant of the Crown, and the guardian of the prerogatives of the Crown, rejecting all party considerations, and considering only what would be for the interest of the Crown, to assent to this motion? My opinion is, that I ought not, and on that ground I shall resist it. The hon. gentleman does not accuse any person of dishonest or corrupt motives; it is only a question of public policy of a doubtful nature. The hon. gentleman says, that the papers laid on the table do not give a fair representation of the policy pursued in regard to Afghanistan. It was said last year by a noble friend of mine in another place, that he thought the volume of papers published, did supply sufficient materials to enable us to judge of the policy in question. I agree in that opinion, though all the papers were not granted, and that the late ministers in the exercise of their discretion, which must at all times be exercised by every servant of the Crown, did make a selection of papers; I must say that I think that volume does contain a sufficient account of the motives of the individuals, on whose opinion the invasion of Afghanistan was judged to be politic and necessary. In 1840 I contended against that judgment, and that policy, as explained by subsequent events, is certainly not justified. Perhaps, more papers might be called for, and if more papers were called for, which I hold to be a more legitimate mode of proceeding—though I must say that my noble friend the President of the Board of Control said that there was no reason to suppose that any documents had been withheld—but if a motion were made for more papers, that would be a more proper course of proceeding than the motion now before the House. Though I might not be disposed to acquiesce in any such motion, not thinking it necessary, it certainly would cause less inconvenience to the House, and be less injurious to the public, than the committee it is now proposed to appoint. Now, what must be the course pursued in that committee? There must be an inquiry as to the conduct of Russia. The defence of the government must be the conduct of Russian agents, and that the state of relations with Russia justifies the measures of provocation then adopted, and which entitled them to consider those measures as necessary to their defence against Russia. It would then be necessary for the committee fully to investigate all the grounds of suspicion or offence, taken against Russia. But then, if you were to do full justice in this committee, I do not see how you could refuse to hear what Russia had to allege in reply. Russia might admit that she was fully justified in adopting such proceedings in Cabul, that in the state of her relations at that time, she was justified in having an agent there, as she had a just cause of complaint against you for having an agent in Circassia, that these things justified her in retaliating upon us, at the north west frontier of Asia. That justification might be made; but then, I ask, would the public interests be advanced by thus re-opening forgotten quarrels. What are our relations with Russia at the present moment? I trust we have laid the foundation for increasing our commercial intercourse with that country. We do trust that the benefits derived from this first step in the relaxation on the restrictions on commerce will induce Russia to proceed further? When these friendly relations between this country and Russia are extending, let us offer no impediment to the increase of our commercial relations with it. But what has been the conduct of Russia on the north-west frontier? Surely, if her designs had been hostile against this country, the time to have exhibited them would have been when Russia had heard of what had been the issue of our first advance on Afghanistan. When she had heard of the destruction of the garrison at Cabul, when she heard what was the position of our troops in Ghuznee and Candahar, then, if Russia had any hostile feelings against this country, that was the time for taking advantage of your disasters, and the most favourable means of doing so was by encouraging Persia to advance for your defeat. The whole course of Russia has been the reverse of this. So far from being unfriendly, she was not even passive, she was not indifferent; but, in the midst of your disasters, Russia, I must say to her honour, and as a proof of her friendship, did every thing to mitigate your misfortunes. She offered the best advice to Persia, and to every tribe in the neighbourhood of Afghanistan. In a recent instance too, where two subjects of this country were exposed to outrage—when they were treacherously murdered at Bokhara—the influence of Russia, persevering in the most friendly feelings towards us, was employed. Every species of remonstrance—every kind of inducement—was offered to save the two gentlemen from destruction. It is for the public interest to continue this friendly intercourse, and, taking it for granted that the feeling is sincere, to encourage it. Which I ask, would it be most for the public interest, to take that course, or to enter upon an investigation into the conduct of Russia on the north-west frontier in 1838, and to condemn Russia for acts which in the present state of her relations, she repudiates; but which, under different feelings, she might have felt herself justified in adopting? I do think that the prerogative of the crown would be prejudiced by a committee of inquiry, and by such an investigation as that now proposed. It is my opinion that the interests by an inquiry—in which the point of defence must mainly turn on the hostility that at the time was exhibited by Russia—the public interest could not be advanced by entering upon such an inquiry. We have here no great calamity to avenge. We have vindicated the honour of the British arms, on the scene of their former disasters. Our relation with Afghanistan—our unfriendly relations with Afghanistan—are closed. We are not called upon, as in the year 1840, to take steps for the purpose to avenge our disasters. The insult has been avenged. The credit of our arms has been re-established. I do say, then, that considering all these points, my counsel to the House—and I hope it is a counsel the House will be inclined to take—my counsel, influenced solely by what I believe to be the public advantage, my humble, my respectful counsel to the House, is not to risk the disturbance of our present most friendly relations with Russia. I believe that those relations will be continued and maintained. My earnest advice is, that you may not do that which may prove fraught with great danger. You ought to take care too and establish no precedents which may be a check upon the future usefulness of public servants. It is of the utmost importance to obtain from public servants communications which they can make with perfect confidence. You are not to judge of their communications by events. They are bound to give what may appear conflicting arguments—the considerations for and against—the public servant is bound to state the arguments for or against a certain course of policy, and a very nice consideration can alone determine the balance. Yet what will be the consequence, if these frank statements are to be revised by a hostile committee of the House of Commons? The public servant is invited to state frankly his views to the government, and it exercises its judgment as to the publication of papers. You, for instance, call for copies or extracts of these papers. Thus you admit, that the government may have a discretion; that it may be justified in withholding some of them from your knowledge. Now, the committee appointed for the purpose of conducting what has been called a judicial investigation may not be disposed to listen in the same manner to the reasonableness of this discretion that a House of Commons does. It may consider that from a judicial committee no documents should be withheld. For all these considerations, I conclude by entreating of the House not to give its sanction to a proceeding which I have so frequently before referred to—not to permit the just prerogative of the Crown to be transferred from the executive to a committee of the House of Commons; and by so doing, to open new quarrels, and disturb relations which are of the most peaceful and tranquil character.

On the division the numbers were:—Ayes, 75; Noes, 189; majority against the motion, 114.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

MARCH 8, 1843.

In the adjourned debate on Mr. Fox Maule's motion—"That this House immediately resolve itself into a committee, to take into consideration the petition of the commission of the general assembly of the church of Scotland, and the matters therein contained"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—The general opinions I entertain on this most important subject have been so fully explained by my right hon. friend and my learned friend, and, I must say, by the noble lord the member for the city of London also, that it will not be necessary for me to trespass at any length on the patience of the House. At the same time, I could not permit a discussion of so much importance to close, and give a silent vote on it. In the course of the debate, warnings, in the most friendly spirit I admit, have been given her Majesty's government not to underrate the real character of the crisis which is approaching, or to credit reports that the danger apprehended is of little importance. I rise to address the House under no such impression. I believe the crisis to be most important. I believe the danger to the church and to the true interests of religion to be extremely great. I conceive nothing more unsatisfactory than the present state of the public feeling in Scotland on this subject. With respect to the effect on the church in diminishing the efficiency of that great instrument of good, and disturbing the social comforts and peace of the people no one can be more impressed with the evils of the present state of things than I am. Looking at the points admitted by the late lord advocate of Scotland, I feel that a concurrence in the present motion would have a tendency to unsettle the authorities and the constitution. If decrees are issued from the courts of law, and if these decrees are to prove of no effect, it is evident that the operation of the law becomes paralysed. This is a state of things not provided for by the law. If a church established by the law and founded upon statutes becomes at variance with the law and interrupts its operation, what must be the result? Such a state of things could never be contemplated by the law, which always recognises in itself a power to carry its decrees into effect. Sir, I feel the fullest sense of the importance of this subject, and the magnitude of the evils which threaten from it. Nobody can feel more strongly that the cause of morality and religion has been zealously promoted by the church of Scotland. I have been personally brought into contact with it in the administration of public affairs. The right hon. gentleman said that the power with which I was entrusted was exercised satisfactorily. At the time I exercised that power, I had an opportunity of observing the worth of the ministers of that church, and the importance and value of the establishment, and the impression then made has not been effaced by any thing which has occurred in the interval. A great principle, however, is involved in the proposition before the House. The right hon. gentleman does not ask us to go into a committee for the purpose of proposing a bill for the settlement of the question. If that had been the right hon. gentleman's object, the government might, as far as they could consistently with the preservation of the rights of the Crown, respecting patronage, have been disposed to aid him. When I say consistently with the rights of the Crown respecting patronage, I mean this, that if the right hon. gentleman had proposed any measure affecting patronage which the ministers of the crown felt it their duty to object to, in my opinion we should not have been justified in giving the consent of the crown to the introduction of such a measure, merely for the purpose of enabling the right hon. gentleman to have it discussed. The Ministers of the crown, in giving the consent of the crown to the introduction of a measure, imply their approbation of its principle, and Ministers ought not to give a mere constructive consent, with the intention of afterwards opposing the measure, merely for the purpose of permitting it to be discussed. I apprehend that the right hon. gentleman's object in submitting this motion is to submit to the consideration of the House the claims of the Church of Scotland. That was the construction put upon the motion by my hon. friend the Member for Morayshire, and in that construction the right hon. gentleman entirely acquiesced. My hon. friend told the House that unless they were prepared to assent to the principle of the claims put forward by the Church of Scotland, they ought not to accede to the motion for a committee. The right hon. gentleman assented to the proposition thus advanced by my hon. friend. I tell the House that to go into a committee for the purpose of making some proposal either at variance with the claims of the Church of Scotland, or falling infinitely short of them, would be practising a delusion, and would not relieve us from any of our embarrassments. The right hon. gentleman moved for the printing of certain papers, and presented the petition for the commission of the General Assembly, and he founded his motion upon those documents. That I understood to be the case from the right hon. gentleman himself, from the late lord advocate, and from the hon. member for Renfrewshire, all of whom adopted the opinions of the Church, and declared that the motion was brought forward in conformity with them. I am not wrong in putting that construction on the motion. I am sure that the right hon. gentleman is above the paltry course which is sometimes pursued in a case of great difficulty and admitted embarrassment, of proposing to go into a committee for the purpose of consideration, in the vain hope that the committee may be able to devise some means of extricating us from the difficulties of our position. [Mr. F. Maule: Hear.] The right hon. gentleman says, that he is above having recourse to that expedient. The House of Commons, therefore, leaves the admission of the right hon. gentleman to me. He tells me, now that I am speaking—and no one, therefore, can be deceived—that he does not intend to be a party to what I have justly called a paltry course of proceeding, and will call upon the House to go into committee merely in compliment to the Church of Scotland. The question before us to-night is simply this—is the claim put forward by the Church of Scotland such a claim in principle as the House of Commons ought to recognise? It is on that ground, and on that only, that I refuse my assent to the proposal of the right hon. gentleman. I refuse my assent to the proposal of the right hon. gentleman, not because I would refuse to legislate if I saw an immediate and satisfactory solution of our difficulties. I reserve to myself the entire power of legislating on the principles that I think consistent with the constitution, and on the principles of English jurisprudence, and the right hon. gentleman must not infer, because I refuse my assent to the appointment of a committee, on the grounds proposed by him, that therefore I mean to imply a refusal to legislate at all upon the subject. The question the House has to determine is, whether it can give its assent to the principle for which the Church of Scotland contends. I, for my part, cannot do so. I find in the papers before us two proposals made by the Church of Scotland. One is for the abolition of patronage; the other is for the definition of ecclesiastical and spiritual power and authority to be given to the Church in ecclesiastical matters; to determine the construction of statutes, and, in cases of doubt, as to whether the matter in dispute be ecclesiastical or civil; to determine, according to the expression of the right hon. mover, within its own sphere, whether it have authority to decide or not. I see that the claim, in respect to patronage, according to the explanation of the Church, rests on different grounds from the claim for authority to decide in spiritual cases. In their answer to the letter of my right hon. friend, the Secretary of the Home Department, the Church states that the abolition of patronage is not an essential condition to the continuance of the Church's connection with the State. At the same time, however, the Church urges the abolition of patronage on very strong grounds, not only of policy, but of right. It is stated to be opposed to the discipline of the Church of Scotland, as set forward in the earliest statutes; that it was abolished by the Scotch Parliament in 1649, and 1690, and was restored by the act of the British legislature in 1712, and that such restoration was opposed to, and was a breach of, the regulations of the Act of Settlement, the Act of Conformity, and the Act of Security. I wish to speak of the Church of Scotland with the greatest deference and respect; and if in examining any of the positions which the Church has taken up, I should speak with the freedom which is necessary in conducting my argument, I hope it will not be considered inconsistent with the feelings by which I declare myself to be actuated towards the Church. I must say, that if I have ever seen any prospect of a satisfactory settlement of this most difficult and embarrassing question, such a glimmering of hope has arisen out of the spirit and temper which have pervaded this discussion. I think the Church of Scotland must be convinced, that there is no disposition on the part of the House of Commons to deprive it of any privilege which is essentially necessary to its efficacy as an establishment. It must be evident that we are not influenced by temper. There has been no reference to angry expressions which may have been used in the course of this long-continued contest. There has been an oblivion of all party feeling; an abstinence from all exasperation. Whatever may be the issue of this motion, the discussion has been conducted on both sides of the House in the temper and spirit befitting the nature of the subject, and its great importance. I am sorry to be compelled to dissent altogether from the position taken by the Church of Scotland, with respect to the abolition of patronage. Respecting the abolition of patronage there is a question of right and a question of policy. First, on the question of right, the Church asserts that "patronage in the appointment of Ministers is opposed to the discipline of the Church of Scotland, as set forth in her earliest constitutional standards." Now, there is no foundation for that assertion. The statutes passed in early times for establishing the Church of Scotland did not recognise as essential to the existence of the Church the abolition of patronage. Patronage was co-existent with the Presbyterian establishment from a very early period. What says Lord Moncrieff—a man who from his hereditary connection with the Church of Scotland is entitled to the highest deference on a question of this nature? Lord Moncrieff, who was the author of the Veto Act in the General Assembly, said, "One thing is certain, that patronage has existed consistently with the constitution of the Presbytery in the Church of Scotland for the long period of which we have been speaking, and consistently with the constitution of the Church in any other respect."

That was the opinion of Lord Moncrieff with respect to patronage. I need not refer to statutes. The statute passed in 1567, which was acquiesced in by the Church, expressly recognised the preservation of patronage "in the hands of the just and ancient faith." The Church may say, that it does not attach much weight to statutes after its public declaration on that subject; but I will defer to the public declaration of the Church—a declaration made previous to the first statute of 1567. "The views of the Church," (says Lord Meadowbank,) "were fully developed in the answer of the General Assembly to a message from the Queen in the year 1565, read by the Lord Justice-Clerk; but to which, as the foundation of the statute of 1567, I beg again to direct the attention of your lordships:—'Our mind is not that her Majesty, or any other patron, should be deprived of their just patronages, but we mean, whensoever her Majesty, or any other patron, do present any person into a benefice, that the person presented should be tried and examined by the judgment of learned men of the Church, such as are the present superintendents, and as the presentation unto the benefice appertains unto the patrons, so the collation by law and reason belongs to the Church; and the Church should not be defrauded of the collation no more than the patrons of their presentation; for otherwise, if it be lawful to the patrons to present whom they pleased, without trial or examination, what can abide in the Church of God but mere ignorance?'"

That is the opinion of the Church in 1565 with respect to it. They state that they do not wish to interfere with the rights of patronage, but they pray for the right of examination and collation as belonging to the Church. The General Assembly next states that patronage was abolished in 1649 and in 1690. It was not abolished in 1649 or 1690, for in the one case the patronage was given to the Kirk session, and in the other instance it was conferred upon the heritors and elders of the parish. The right of a congregation to elect a minister was never admitted by the Church of Scotland, either by statute or by any recognised act of the Church. With respect to its being an infringement of the Act of Security or of the Act of Union, it is hardly necessary to discuss that point; but, if insisted upon by the Church, repeal the act of Anne, and if the claim was then made valid, they would be obliged to act upon it. I have as yet heard nobody insist in the course of this debate upon the abolition of the act of Anne as being inconsistent with the privileges of the Church. Now, with respect to the policy of abolishing the law of patronage, I cannot acquiesce in it upon that ground. Lord Moncrieff thought the actual abolition of the law of patronage would involve a serious detriment to the Church of Scotland—that learned person was decidedly opposed to its abolition, and he discussed the various authorities who might be called upon to exercise right of presentation if patronage was abolished. Lord Moncrieff took the case of the Kirk Session, and pointed out circumstances so objectionable that it would be impossible to transfer the right to them. He discussed the point as to the transfer of the right to the heritors and elders of the parish, and he after consideration thought them unable to exercise the right; and, next, he discussed the more important proposal, namely, that this right should be transferred to the people, and he urged the strongest objections against making the choice of a minister depend upon popular election. I never could assent to the proposal that the communicants, or heads of families, or any description of people should have the absolute right, by a majority, of electing the ministers of the Church. There is no analogy between the election to civil offices and the election to the performance of spiritual functions vested in a minister of the Church. It is perfectly proper, that with respect to civil rights, and where the person chosen is to be the protector and guardian of civil interests, the people should enjoy the irresponsible power of electing whom they pleased; but the analogy does not apply to the choice of a minister. The duty of a minister is to teach, to admonish, and frequently to perform unpopular functions; and to establish that relation between a minister and his flock, which would be established if you make him dependent upon the popular voice, would be to degrade the office of the minister, and to deprive him of all chance of being useful in his sacred calling. Therefore, upon the double ground of there being no denial of the right to appeal, and with the gravest doubts as to the policy of abolishing patronage and making the appointments of ministers depend upon popular election, I cannot assent to the proposition of the Church, that patronage is a grievance, and that it is the duty of parliament to remove that grievance by the repeal of the statute of Anne. To the other proposals of the Church, namely, that the Church should have the power of placing its own construction on the statutes of the realm, and that parliament should define the bounds of civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, that claim I am not disposed to grant. I hold it to be impossible to define beforehand the bounds of ecclesiastical and civil jurisdiction. There is no such definite demarcation between them as makes it possible to draw the line. If it were attempted, it would dissatisfy both the Church and the civil courts. How impossible would it be to say where the line should end—how much must be left to the varying accidents of futurity; and hence, having failed to draw the line, the same questions must arise. We all admit, that to the Church belongs the exclusive jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters. I admit it, and I admit that in all quiet times questions of dispute will not arise. They have however arisen, unfortunately arisen, in consequence of the perseverance of the Church, after the decision of the House of Lords, in supporting what is called the Veto Act of 1834, and still more by the violent and tyrannical act by which the Church deposed those ministers who, having taken the oath of allegiance, considered it to be their duty to obey the laws of the country, and proceeded with great forbearance to yield obedience to the supreme civil tribunal of the land. Upon those ministers there had been no imputation cast. They objected to Mr. Edwards, the presentee, and it was not until the House of Lords had decided that the Veto Act was an illegal assumption of authority, that these men determined to obey the law as laid down by the supreme tribunal. I have read the judgment of Lord Cottenham. There is, I believe, no imputation upon that judgment, either on account of intemperance of language or the extent of the principle adverse to the Church; and after reading that judgment, I must say, that if any authority in this country is at liberty to say, that the decisions of the House of Lords are not to be obeyed, and that the principle laid down is not to be obeyed, then there is an end to the connection between Church and State, and if it be carried to the full extent, there will be no security for the civil power itself. Having taken the oath of allegiance—having yielded obedience to the Church, then when the act of the Church is declared to be an illegal assumption of authority, these deposed ministers had yielded obedience to the law of the land, as pronounced by the highest tribunal, and thus became liable to be visited with the severest penalties—they are pronounced contumacious by the Ecclesiastical Court—they lose their station in the State—they are deprived of their civil rights, and thus, in return for their allegiance to the Crown, the Crown can give no protection to its subjects. Look at the situation in which these men so deposed by the Church have been placed. They are men educated for the ministry—their whole prospects in life depend upon their continuance in the position in which their talents and virtues have placed them. The Church court determines, that in consequence of their deference to the law they shall be deprived of the right of officiating, and other ministers are sent into their respective parishes. I believe the Church prevents them administering baptism; and, under all these circumstances, have they a right to the stipend? The civil court has the right to leave the stipend to them, the Ecclesiastical Court has the right to prescribe the duty to be performed. Under the one authority the late minister may remain in the Manse, and enjoy all those advantages, and under the other authority another minister comes in and performs all the spiritual functions; but is it clear he can maintain his right to the stipend? This is not a mere claim to the stipend; his office is one with which the most important duties are connected, and if he is not allowed to perform those duties, what, I ask again, is to become of the stipend? But that is not the only question, nor the most important. It is the degradation of character to which these men are subjected that most affects me, and for what offence is this penalty to be inflicted upon them? Merely for having yielded to the laws of their country that obedience which it was their duty to yield to them. This is not now a mere speculative position. At this very hour the Veto Act is maintained in full force, and the men who obey the decision of the House of Lords render themselves, by so doing, liable to the severest persecution. Contemplate the case of a man in such a situation, with the popular feeling running against him, and in doubt whether he ought to obey the courts of law or the General Assembly of the Church, and I do maintain, that even in the times that preceded the Reformation, the Church of Rome never laid claim to a greater power than that involved in the claims now set up. I draw a complete distinction between the Veto Act as passed by the Assembly of the Church before and after the judgment of the House of Lords. I should be the last to question it, because, in 1835, I, being then the minister, proposed a vote for church extension in Scotland, notwithstanding the passing of the Veto Act. I viewed the passing of that bill with no undue prejudice. I saw that great exertions were making by the Church to supply the spiritual wants of the people of

Scotland—the necessity was very great, and the ministers of the Church zealously applied themselves to provide increased means of spiritual instruction for the increased population of the country. I have always admired the character of the Scottish clergy; they are not merely learned men, but the extent to which they combine great theological acquirements with the most active and assiduous discharge of parochial duties—the manner in which they visit the poor, and perform all the ministrations of their sacred office, impressed me with the greatest respect for them individually, and as an establishment. I did not hesitate, therefore, in 1835, notwithstanding the passing of the Veto Act, in conjunction with the government of that day, to recommend to Parliament a grant of public money for the extension of the Church of Scotland. But the moment the House of Lords, after great deliberation, determined that the Veto Act was illegal, the question, in my opinion, assumed an entirely new character, and not only did I think that the church, by the repeal of that act, would have made a becoming concession, but I was of opinion that, by taking that step, they would enable parliament to take the measures that would be most consistent with the rights of the church and the civil liberties of the people. The opinion of the right hon. and learned gentleman, the late lord advocate, was stated fully on this subject; but I beg you to remember that when you are discussing this claim of right on the part of the church, it is not a mere speculative assertion of abstract right; but at this moment the Veto Act is in force, and the ministers who observe the law are suffering the penalties of their obedience. Therefore, I apprehend that it is the best friends of the church who must most of all lament this decision. I think there is in this House a very unanimous feeling—I must except the hon. member for Renfrewshire—but there is a very general impression that the best course the church could have adopted would have been to suffer the House of Lords to determine the question, and to defer to their decision. I cannot think that the church was justified in referring to the dicta of other churches; the question is, what was the judgment of the authorised tribunal, the sentence of the court appointed by the public to entertain and decide questions of that nature? In that judgment, I must think that there was nothing inconsistent with the rights of the church; it was merely to this effect, that the civil rights of a subject of the Crown had been prejudiced by the act, that the court had a right to take cognizance of his complaint, and that in a matter where a right was at stake, they had the power of redressing a grievance sustained by a subject of the realm. I cannot, therefore, admit the justice of the claim urged by the church, or the policy of attempting to define civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Read the earlier statutes, when Catholicism was the established religion of the State, before the Reformation. Look at the statute of Westminster, and the long series of acts passed from the reign of William the Conqueror to that of Henry VIII., and you will find these conflicts between the civil and ecclesiastical authority arising in this country. They have arisen in every country on the face of the earth; and it has been found utterly impossible for the legislative authority to define beforehand what is the line of demarcation between civil and ecclesiastical authority. The church asks permission, if I understand the matter rightly, in cases of spiritual authority, first, to put its construction on the statute, and then to determine within its own sphere whether the matter be ecclesiastical or civil. What was the expression of the right hon. gentleman opposite?—"They claim independent and exclusive jurisdiction within their own sphere."

Why, Sir, we are all ready to admit the rights of the church to this; but, if their sphere be doubtful; if the boundaries be uncertain; who shall determine the sphere—who shall ascertain those boundaries? There is no difficulty as to the purely ecclesiastical question. I will venture to say, if the civil tribunals attempted to control the church in a matter purely spiritual, there would at once be an intervention on the part of parliament to control the tribunals. There cannot be a question as to that; but a doubt arises where the boundaries are imperfectly defined. With whom, then, shall rest the decision? Can there be a doubt that it must rest with the tribunal appointed by the legislature to decide the question—the court of law? The right hon. gentleman says there may be co-ordinate jurisdictions. I think the noble lord has shown what would be the consequence of co-ordinate courts enforcing their decrees with respect to the institution of ministers. The civil court might give the stipend, while the ecclesiastical courts refused to grant the power of administering the sacraments; and he has clearly shown that it would amount to a severance of Church and State, and end in something approaching to anarchy. Such a system could not exist. There is a complete distinction between a church that is voluntary and independent and one that is established by the State. Take the case of the Roman Catholics, or any of the Protestant Dissenters in this country, who are not connected with the State by way of establishments; their rights, so far as voluntary jurisdiction is concerned, is quite supreme, and we do not attempt to interfere with it. Those who choose to submit to it, in consequence of their connection with any such denomination, have a perfect right to do so; but if a church chooses to have the advantage of an establishment, and to hold those privileges which the law confers—that church, whether it be the Church of Rome, or the Church of England, or the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, must conform to the law. It is a perfect anomaly and absurdity that a church should have all the privileges of an establishment—I do not speak merely of the stipends, but of all the privileges which a connection with the State bestows, and yet claim an exemption from those obligations which, wherever there is an establishment—must exist on its side with reference to the supreme tribunals of the country. No doubt can exist with respect to the state of the law, in the case of a dispute arising between a church established by the law and some other party or body; it is impossible to suppose that the termination of that dispute should be transferred to any other authority than the chief tribunal of the country in which it should arise, subject to an appeal to the House of Lords. I shall say no more on this subject; I have attempted to show why I cannot acquiesce in the demands of the church, either that the spiritual and civil jurisdiction should be defined beforehand, or that in case of a conflict arising, the determination of the dispute by the construction put on the statute should rest with the church. The noble lord appealed to me; there are many reasons for refusing to assent to the proposal of the right hon. gentleman. He has a right to make this proposal; the church has a right to make an appeal and ascertain whether the House of Commons is inclined to acquiesce in its own construction of its powers. I cannot acquiesce in that construction. I consider that a great principle is involved in this discussion. If I thought peace could be maintained—if I thought that the rights of the subject could be maintained by acquiescence in the demands of the church—such is my sense of the pressing evils I see, that I should be tempted to make the experiment; but my firm belief is that these claims, if admitted on the part of the Church of Scotland, cannot be limited to their present extent, or confined to that church. Principles are involved in the question which, if relinquished by the House of Commons on the present occasion, they must be prepared to carry further. I must, therefore, refuse my assent to the motion of the right hon. gentleman. The noble lord says, he hopes I will make no declaration, on the present occasion, which shall preclude the government from attempting to make an amicable and satisfactory adjustment of this most difficult question by legislation, when a proper opportunity shall arise. I shall most certainly avoid any such declaration. I trust I have discussed the question with temper, and I shall avoid making any statement, or giving any pledge which may tie up the hands of the government, and prevent them from availing themselves of any opportunity of settling this question when the opportunity shall present itself. My firm belief is that, consistently with Presbyterianism, consistently with the ancient claims of the church, consistently with the just rights of the church, a settlement may be effected—I do not say consistently with the present claims of the church, I do not know whether the present temper and feelings of men's minds in Scotland is favourable to the attempt—but of this I am sure, that, looking at the original statutes—looking at the original claims of the church, I greatly doubt whether there is any room for doubt as to the meaning of the law; and if there should be, if a declaratory act should be required, in my opinion it might be passed by parliament, and the rights and discipline of the church may be most strictly maintained. I wish to confine myself, on the present occasion, to the discussion of the resolutions. I know there is nothing so unwise as a premature exposition of the measures of legislation which may be thought necessary. My right hon. friend has declared the principles on which the government are ready to attempt legislation on this subject. I will not be betrayed by the right

hon. gentleman into any further explanation on this subject. The noble lord has stated, that in his opinion it would not be consistent with the original claims of the church, or with sound policy, to give to the parishioners, or to any portion of the people, the right to urge merely unfounded and capricious objections to the settlement of ministers. At the same time, with regard to what power might be given to the parishioners to state the various grounds of objections which might fairly be urged concerning the unfitness of a particular minister to be settled in a particular parish, I should be acting contrary to my present intention were I to enter into the minute examination of a question of so much interest. My object is merely to declare that, by refusing to enter into this committee, I refuse on the express ground that I see no prospect of being able to acquiesce in the views of the right hon. gentleman, or the measures he might propose. But I do not, therefore, mean to imply that the government would refuse to legislate in this matter, if they observed a prospect of a satisfactory settlement. I wish most earnestly that the Veto Act and all the impediments arising out of it were removed; but at the same time I do not think it would conduce to an amicable settlement to absolutely insist upon their removal. I think it better to say, that if an opportunity should arise, her Majesty's government would avail themselves of it, for the purpose of endeavouring to effect an adjustment. I hope that no members of this House will vote for entering into this committee merely for the purpose of relieving themselves from personal responsibility. I trust they will consider the issue put by the right hon. gentleman, which issue is, whether the claims of the Church of Scotland shall be acquiesced in or not, and that he has made a motion founded on those claims. My belief is that there is abroad in this country, in Scotland, and in many other countries—and I rejoice to observe it—after a long series of religious indifference, a full conviction of the evils that have arisen from a neglect of religious duties, and that there is a spirit alive founded upon that conviction. But I earnestly hope that there will not be combined with that spirit a desire to establish a spiritual supremacy above the civil tribunals of this country, but that, on the contrary, every effort will be made to reconcile an increased religious activity, an increased attention to religious duties, with due deference to the established law of the land. But, of this, Sir, I am confident, that if the House of Commons is prepared to depart, either in Scotland or in England, from the principles upon which the Reformation was founded—principles which are essential to the maintenance of the civil liberties of this country—whether or not the claim be preferred on the part of the Church of Rome or of the Presbyterian Church—nothing but evil could arise from the establishment of an ecclesiastical domination in defiance of law; although those who advocated such a system might allege divine authority for their mission, and might clothe their assumption and their claim of extraordinary power with a conscientious religious zeal—a religious zeal which could not, however, be tolerated, if it went to the arrogation of a power to be relieved from civil authority—such an assumption, and such a claim, I say, could not be acceded to without the utmost ultimate danger, both to the religious liberties and civil rights of the people of this country.

Mr. Fox Maule having replied, the House divided: Ayes, 76; Noes, 211; majority, 135.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S PROCLAMATION.

MARCH 9, 1843.

Mr. Vernon Smith, at the conclusion of an elaborate and powerful speech, submitted the following motion to the House:—"That this House, having regard to the high and important functions of the Governor-general of India, the mixed character of the native population, and the recent measures of the Court of Directors for discontinuing any seeming sanction to idolatry in India, is of opinion that the conduct of Lord Ellenborough, in issuing the general orders of the 16th November, 1842, and in addressing the letter of the same date to all the chiefs, princes, and people of India, respecting the restoration of the gates of a temple to Somnauth, is unwise, indecorous, and reprehensible."

SIR ROBERT PEEL. The terms of the resolution, and the character of this debate, must have convinced the House that the insinuations indulged in by some hon. gentlemen the other night, when I opposed the motion of the hon. and learned member for Bath, that there was some compromise between the government and gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, are entirely unfounded. I should consider I had acted most basely and dishonourably if I had been a party to any such compromise. I gave my vote against that motion, because, after having had the opportunity for four years of challenging the conduct of the late government when it was a government, I thought it would be contrary to all precedent that I should bring the influence of a new government to bear upon those who no longer held office. I thought also that disclosures might take place which would not be for the public benefit, and on that ground too I opposed the motion. But I will not elaim from any one member his vote on the present occasion as compensation for the assistance, if assistance it was, which I gave in opposing the motion of the hon. member for Bath. Let the present motion stand upon distinct grounds, and let hon. gentlemen at this side of the House believe that they will never find me disposed to enter into any such disgraceful compact as was insinuated. The noble lord says,—“Dispose of this motion, and then we will come forward and challenge inquiry into the general conduct and policy of Lord Ellenborough.”

I remember very well, when in Ireland many years ago, hearing of rather a strange occurrence which took place in the Court of Common Pleas in that country. During the progress of a case which occupied the attention of the court—the late Lord Norbury was on the bench—two learned counsel, differing very much from the general character of their countrymen, which is one of kindness and urbanity, continued abusing each other after a very violent fashion for a considerable time, evidently looking to and expecting the interference of the judge. “Gentlemen,” said Lord Norbury, “take care—be upon your guard; the court will not interfere!” From that moment the two combatants ceased to abuse each other. I can tell the noble lord if he do not take care, that I will not interfere—I tell him, if he complains of injustice when his friends again assail him for his conduct, I will, when he is called upon to come forward in vindication of his conduct, retire from this House, and leave him to fight the battle for himself. The noble lord may depend upon it that I will not render him any assistance more serviceable than that of his friend Shah Soojah; but that if he too peremptorily compels an inquiry, he shall not say that I, by my presence, have subjected him to any injustice, or any imputation. The noble lord entered into an elaborate vindication of Lord Auckland. If he challenges inquiry, I will tell him on what terms I require a vindication; but the noble lord made a slight slip—and slight slips sometimes unwittingly indicate the real workings of the conscience. The noble lord asserted, that if Lord Auckland did contemplate retiring from Afghanistan, that such a course on the part of the Governor-general would have been disgraceful in the extreme; and then recollecting himself, informed us that he meant not Lord Auckland, but Lord Ellenborough. The noble lord defended his Governor-general, and I am about to prove that Lord Auckland required all his defence. True, the noble lord says, that Lord Auckland did meditate a retirement; that he was about to leave India; and that he, therefore, did nothing but collect a large force for his successor. What a defence for a Governor-general! Suspend his operations for four months, in so critical a position of affairs! What, on such a question as the relief of Jellalabad, was the Governor-general to suspend all operations for four months? and all this that he might not embarrass his successor. What an imputation upon a Governor-general! But I can prove that the defence of Lord Auckland, set forth by the noble lord, is utterly unfounded. While the noble lord, in a boastful tone, repeated the question, “Who was the man who meditated the retirement from Afghanistan?” I could have told him, but I said no more, because I was afraid of compromising the British troops and British interests. I had then in my possession a letter from Lord Auckland, his own Governor-general, showing that he was the author of the retirement. On the 3rd of December, 1841, Lord Auckland writes, and compare this with the speech made by the noble lord last year, and about the close of the session, when in the same boastful tone, which he would now reprehend, he asked me, and in a taunting manner, “What man first contemplated retreat from Afghanistan?" I will read the passages of that letter, and it will be proved that Lord Auckland intended to retire from Afghanistan, because he knew that our position was no longer tenable. The Governor-general said that it was in vain to speculate upon the issue of the contest. He did not know all our disasters, he only knew of the murder of Sir W. M'Naghten and Sir Alexander Burnes. He was not aware of the extent of the calamities by which 17,000 British subjects met an ignoble and a disgraceful death. How can the noble lord charge with disgrace any Governor-general for contemplating retreat from Afghanistan? He was then in possession of this very letter - from which I will now read a passage—which will go to show that the noble lord's defence of his Governor-general, for contemplating the retreat, in order that he might leave unfettered the hands of his successor—is without foundation. Why did Lord Auckland want to retreat from Afghanistan? On the 3rd of December, 1841, Lord Auckland says,—“These accounts exhibit a most unfavourable state of affairs at Cabul, but they do not lead us to alter the views and intentions which were stated in our yesterday's despatch.”

You will observe that the noble lord had an impression as to the state of things in Afghanistan. Lord Auckland says,—“That it would be vain to speculate upon the issue of the contest at Cabul; but in the extreme event of the military possession of that city, and the surrounding territory, having been entirely lost, it is not our intention to direct new and extensive operations for the re-establishment of our supremacy throughout Afghanistan.”

Now mark the following passage, and mind that the present Governor-general has now been taunted with cowardice, for what the late Governor-general here deems a public duty, the retirement from Afghanistan. In another passage of that letter, the late Governor-general says:—“We can scarcely contemplate in such case, that there will be any circumstances or political objects of sufficient weight to induce us to desire to retain possession of the remainder of that country, and, unless such shall be obvious as arising from the course of events, we should wish our military and political officers so to shape their proceedings as will best promote the end of retiring with the least possible discredit. Of course it will be desirable that this retirement shall be deliberate, and the result of arrangements that will leave some political influence in the country.”

Such was the state to which the policy of the noble lord had reduced us. And what, in such a state of things, was the greatest hope of the Governor-general? That he “might retire with the least possible discredit;” and, “of course, it would be desirable that this retirement should be deliberate, and the result of arrangements that will leave some political influence in the country.” But the great object of the Governor-general was the retirement, and to bring back that native army of which the gallant spirit of Nott said, that he would undertake with 1,000 sepoys to counterbalance 5,000 Afghans. This was the state to which the policy of the noble lord had reduced us. The greatest hope of the late Governor-general was to retire with the least possible discredit:—

Fallere et effugere est triumphus.”

Lord Auckland had sent the original directions to Major-general Pollock as to the situation of the force; and then, on the 19th February, having since heard of the misfortune at the Khyber Pass, he thus writes to the secret council:—“Since we have heard of the misfortunes in the Khyber Pass, and have become convinced that with the difficulties at present opposed to us, and in the actual state of our preparations, we could not expect, at least in this year, to maintain a position in the Jellalabad districts for any effective purpose, we have made our directions in regard to withdrawal from Jellalabad clear and positive, and we shall rejoice to learn that Major-general Pollock will have anticipated these more express orders by confining his efforts to the same object.”

That letter was written within one week of the arrival of Lord Ellenborough in India—that letter shows that the relief of Jellalabad was abandoned—that letter shows that Lord Auckland did not, during the year 1842, contemplate the effectual and efficient restoration of our position in Afghanistan. I ask the House whether I have not proved that the noble lord's defence of Lord Auckland has not failed? And if Lord Auckland did not contemplate a return to Afghanistan, is it not too much to blame Lord Ellenborough for the retirement? Lord Ellenborough, acting upon a full sense of his public duty, thought that the safety of the British arms required the abandonment of Afghanistan. The noble lord opposite denies that the whole triumph of a Governor-general's policy is to be set or ought to be set against any individual act. Have the noble lords never had to deal with a Governor-general of whose individual acts they have disapproved? Did the Earl of Durham never issue a proclamation of the policy of which noble lords opposite had reason to doubt? Did the noble lord think it fair at that time towards Lord Durham, whose general conduct he approved, to select an individual act in order to condemn and degrade the Governor-general, whose acts, upon the whole, he believed to be beneficial? No. The noble lord then held a different language—he then spoke in terms of truth and justice with respect to their own Governor-general. See how the position of a man alters his views! The noble lord said in August, 1838,—“When the time comes, I shall be prepared—not, indeed, to say that the terms or words of the ordinances passed by the Earl of Durham are altogether to be justified—but I shall be prepared to say, that looking at the conduct of the Earl of Durham as a whole—that, believing him to be animated by the deepest zeal for the welfare of his country—believing this, I shall be ready to take part with him—I shall be ready to bear my share of any responsibility which is to be incurred in these difficult circumstances.”

Then the consideration was not to be restricted to the particular act; but when acting under great difficulties, and with the greatest zeal for the welfare of the country, the general conduct was to be set off against the particular act, and the noble lord remonstrated against the injustice and iniquity of bringing disgrace upon a man for a particular act, when his general policy was approved. And the noble lord then laid down this principle—a principle applicable to all times and to all circumstances—the noble lord in the same speech observed,—“I do think that no invective—that no sophistry—that no accumulation of circumstances—that no bitterness of sarcasm, accompanied by professions of friendship, and thereby attempting to disguise, but not, in fact, disguising, the petty and personal feelings which are at the bottom of all these attacks, will in the least degree affect the noble lord against whom they have been levelled, but that he will have deserved well of his country, well of his sovereign, and well of posterity.”

Let these general principles then prevail even among those who, seeing the general tenor of Lord Ellenborough's conduct, have held him to be entitled to the respect and to the acknowledgment of public gratitude which you have given him for contributing to relieve this country from the disasters which had befallen it—let the consideration of his general conduct prevail even amongst those who question the policy of the individual act. The noble lord opposite (Lord Palmerston) says, we ought to confine ourselves to the views contained in this particular proclamation. I protest against being fettered by any such narrow restrictions. The policy of that proclamation depends upon the circumstances in which Lord Ellenborough was placed. And what were those circumstances? The moment he set foot in Madras, what intelligence met him till the day he arrived at Benares, what a succession of events took place, calculated to disturb the firmest mind, and to infuse apprehensions into the breast of the boldest man. It has been said the cry in England was, “What next?” That was a question which Lord Ellenborough had to put to himself for four or five days after his arrival. He lands at Madras on the 15th of February, presuming at the time that his predecessor had secured the admirable position so frequently spoken of in Afghanistan. He lands at Madras, after a four months' voyage, in necessary ignorance of all that had occurred in that interval of time, and to his astonishment he hears of the insurrection at Cabul. He receives tidings that Sir William M'Naghten and Sir Alexander Burnes, the envoy and representative of the British government, had been murdered; that the city was in a state of insurrection, and that doubts were entertained as to the security of the British army. What next? He arrives at Calcutta, and there hears of the orders of his predecessor to hasten the evacuation of Afghanistan, for the noble reason of inflicting as little discredit as possible upon the British power. He repairs to Benares, and there he hears the tremendous news that not only you had lost power in Afghanistan, but that you had so depressed the spirits and shaken the confidence of the native army, that General Pollock gives this melancholy account in a letter to Colonel M'Gregor:

—“It must, no doubt, appear to you and Sale most extraordinary that, with the force I have here, I do not at once move on; (God knows it has been my anxious wish to do so, but I have been helpless. I came on a-head to Peshawur, to arrange for an advance, but was saluted with a report of 1,900 sick, and a bad feeling among the sepoys. I visited the hospitals, and endeavoured to encourage by talking to them; but they had no heart. I hoped that when the time came they would go. On the 1st instant the feeling on the part of the sepoys broke out, and I had the mortification of knowing that the Hindoos, of four out of five native corps, refused to advance. I immediately took measures to sift the evil, and gradually a reaction has taken place, in the belief that I will wait for reinforcements; this has caused me the utmost anxiety on your account—your situation is never out of my thoughts; but having told you what I have, you and Sale will see at once that necessity has kept me here. I have sent five expresses to hurry on the first division of the next brigade; it consists of the third dragoons, a troop of horse artillery, first light cavalry, the 33rd native infantry, and two companies of 6th native infantry, all fresh and without taint. I verily believe, if I were to attempt to move on now, without the reinforcement, that the four regiments implicated would, as far as the Hindoos are concerned, stand fast. Pray, therefore, tell me without the least reserve the latest day you can hold out. If I could, I would tell you the day when I expect the reinforcements, but I cannot. I may, however, I believe with safety, say, that they will arrive by the end of this month. The case, therefore, now stands thus—whether I am to attempt, with my present materials, to advance, and risk the appearance of disaffection or cowardice, which, in such a case, could not again be got over, or wait the arrival of a reinforcement, which will make all sure—this is the real state of the case; if I attempted now, I might risk you altogether; but if you can hold out, the reinforcements would make your relief as certain as any earthly thing can be.”

And what next? On the 17th of April he hears of the failure of General England to force the Kojuk Pass. On the 18th of April he hears that Ghuznee has fallen. The question which Lord Ellenborough must have put to himself was, what next? My noble friend had to contemplate the retirement from Afghanistan. He thought, taking a comprehensive view of the matter, that our permanent interests required the withdrawal. After the decisive proof that the king which we had set up had taken no root in the affections of the Afghan country, after he found that the army which we had sent to Afghanistan was separated from its supplies by a distance of 600 miles, Lord Ellenborough then thought that it was not prudent to proceed farther, that we must awaken from our dreams of visionary conquests, and that we must place the British troops within the borders of British India. That, however, was a difficult task. It is not Lord Ellenborough who was responsible for the consequences of this state of things, it is those who invaded the country who ought to bear the responsibility. If you think that the policy of the abandonment of Afghanistan was ignoble, I challenge you to the discussion. Do not bring an indirect charge; come to the discussion, whether, under the circumstances in which Lord Ellenborough was placed, it was or was not wise in him to abandon Afghanistan. If you think that it was not, bring it to the vote, and we, who cordially approve, and who have stated our approval of this proceeding, will be ready to defend it. That policy—the evacuation of Afghanistan, was liable to misconstruction in India. It had been our policy to advance, and in general never to retire; there are few instances in India in which we have advanced and then retired. England, however, was at that time engaged in a war with China. All Europe was contemplating—some with hope, all with anxiety—the result of that struggle. By the retention of Afghanistan, the world, in India and in Europe, might think that we retained our power: the abandonment required more moral courage than the occupation; but, above all, it was necessary that in British India there should be no doubt as to the policy of retirement, and that man who had the boldness to adopt it, if the policy were wise, was deserving of all credit, and ought to receive it. And what course did Lord Ellenborough take to remove any erroneous impression on the minds of the Hindoos? It was difficult to say to them that Shah Soojah was not able to retain his hold over the Afghan people when they beheld his advance to Cabul, surrounded, as they were told, by his own troops. They were not aware of the private treaty with Shah Soojah, that he was to be upheld by British arms, and it was necessary to disabuse the Indian mind as to the policy of the retirement. What did Lord Ellenborough do? He found that there were military trophies in the possession of the Affghians, which he thought it desirable for the sake of the public mind to bring back. The whole of his letters considered them only as military trophies. In his first letter to General Nott, he orders him to secure these as trophies of the success of the war, and in his letter to the chiefs and princes of India he does not treat them as religious relics, but as trophies of war, and as such only did he regard them. You may not consider these trophies of victory—to you the gates of Somnauth may not have the character which rendered them valuable in the eyes of the descendants of the conquered troops of Hindostan. You have different prejudices—different associations from the people of this distant country. You almost adored, while they yet existed, the tapestried walls of the House of Lords, adorned with the memorials of an attempted invasion of your country, and you treasured them as proud records of your national glory. You hang up in the temples of the God whom you worship the flags which you have taken from your enemies—trophies seized in the midst of blood and carnage, and in the moment of victory, and you have not thought them unworthy to ornament your sacred edifices. Respect, then, the prejudices of men inferior to you in civilization. Remember how much religion is interwoven in all their political institutions—in all their civil acts. You have had this close connection described to you in eloquent and forcible language by the right hon. gentleman the member for Edinburgh, and this is a subject of which he has a perfect knowledge. He says, there is not an act of the life of the Hindoo which is not connected with their religious worship. Their food, their mode of dressing their food, their dress, all the political and moral institutions of their condition, are connected with their religion; and that being so, is it possible to view trophies of this kind, taken from them 800 years since, as being unconnected with their religion, which is so interwoven with all their social and political acts? They value these relics not because the possession of them shows the superiority of their form of religious worship—not because they are proofs of the former prowess of Mussulmen as opposed to Hindoos; but because they were the records—the disgraceful records to them—of Affghan power as compared with Hindoo power; and Mussulmen and Gentoos have an equal right to be proud, not in a religious, but in a military and civil point of view, of the reacquirement of the trophies of defeat. Therefore it is that this act, which you now condemn—this taking of these spoils from Ghuznee—was adopted by Lord Ellenborough, as a means, and for the purpose, of reconciling the people of British India to the abandonment of Affghan, and giving them some consolation in their disappointment, in seeing, for the first time, the British arms retire, not dishonoured or disgraced, but on considerations of policy. That was the ground on which I apprehend that Lord Ellenborough issued that proclamation. You may find fault with the terms of it. As I have already said, if it were not sufficiently guarded to prevent the possibility of mistake on the part of the Mahometan population, I must deeply regret it, and I concur with those who think that, though the act of taking the gates of Somnauth was perfectly justifiable, the expressions which accompanied that act might have been spared. But is it not a very different thing to make this admission with respect to a man, of whose conduct, so far as his motives are concerned, I entirely approve. Is there not, I say, a difference between making an exception in an individual case, and dooming the man to disgrace by the act of this very House of Commons which not many days since agreed to a vote of thanks to the same individual? It is impossible, I think, for the hon. member for Montrose to vote for this motion. He says, that he conceives that the impression that this act can be construed into a reverence for Hindoo worship is erroneous. The resolution which is proposed, implies that it is subject to that construction. The hon. gentleman has made by far the most powerful speech in demonstration of the policy of this act that has been made to-night, and he has quoted the expressions of a native Indian, who says,—“This cannot be considered as being done in deference to our religious ceremonies, but will be felt by the natives of British India as a great compliment, removing from their minds the impression of their ancient disgrace by the Affghan power.”

Why, if that is the opinion of the hon. member, and that the manly course to take is to vote at once for the recall of Lord Ellenborough, let him not attack that policy which he supports, by giving his assent to this resolution which he has shown to be unjust. Hon. gentlemen have said, and I have no doubt that they are sincere, that they are influenced by religious feelings, by their zeal and respect for Christianity; and I am sure that I have heard expressions of this sort from some hon. members, on whose sincerity I would not throw a doubt for one moment, for I am perfectly certain that they are sincere. But this question is to be decided by great numbers—by powerful parties in this House; and depend on it that the judgment of posterity will be passed on the event of this night. They will compare the attacks of last session—they will compare the motion, preliminary as it is to the votes of money for the public service—they will remember the declaration of the right hon. gentleman the member for Edinburgh, that the greatest disaster that ever befell the British arms, was that which occurred in Afghanistan—I say they will compare these things with the result, and they will see that in the course of the year these disasters have been repaired—that those very sepoy, whom General Pollock was afraid to lead to Jellalabad, and who, he thought, could not be persuaded to advance further, have been reassured by the superior care and attention of Lord Ellenborough. I say that posterity will see these things,—they will find the unanimous vote of thanks which was come to by this House to that man, for the ability and judgment with which he prepared the resources by which this disaster was repaired; and then they will say, that never did popular assembly commit so gross an act of iniquity and injustice as that which you will commit, if, after having given that unanimous vote, you compel Lord Ellenborough to retire with disgrace from the government of British India. “He may retire,” you say, “to the councils of his sovereign.” Is that your notion of the position which a public man fills? After being disgraced by the vote of the House of Commons for misconduct in India, is he to come back and administer the affairs of India at the Board of Control, and preside at home over those matters which you say he misconducted there? Do you believe that any man of common spirit, if you pass this vote, whatever the inclination of her Majesty’s government may be—and the noble lord says the government will protect him—will do so? It is uncharitable and ungenerous. Depend upon it, if the government were inclined to protect him subject to this disgrace, his own heart and mind would tell him that there was no other course than to retire, and mourn over this injustice of a popular assembly. If you believe that religious feeling compels you to give this vote, give it. But to those who are not influenced by such considerations, I say, vaunt not of religious feelings when you are influenced by political motives. Say what you please of the conduct of Lord Ellenborough in respect to this proclamation, and about his having lowered the character of the Christian religion; ten times more fatal will be the blow which you will strike against the purity and integrity of the faith you profess, if, being insincere, you clothe your party hostility against Lord Ellenborough in the garb of piety and religion.

The motion was negatived by a majority of 85.

PECULIAR BURTHENS ON LAND.

MARCH 14, 1848.

Mr. Ward having moved for a select committee, to inquire whether there are any peculiar burthens specially affecting the landed interest of this country, or any peculiar exemptions enjoyed by that interest, and to ascertain their nature and extent.

Mr. G. Banks moved an amendment to the effect, that the attention of the House be directed to the existence of associations, pretending to influence the deliberations of the legislature, thereby causing embarrassment to the agriculturist, injuring the commerce of the country, and being at variance with the spirit of the constitution.

Sir ROBERT PEEL wished to take the opportunity, before the debate closed, to state to the House the course which he meant to pursue, both with respect to the original motion of the hon. gentleman, and with respect to the amendment upon that motion, moved by the hon. member for Dorsetshire. He so far concurred with the hon. gentleman who had last spoken, that he thought the hon. gentleman who had made the original proposition had a fair right to expect that the House should decide affirmatively or negatively upon that motion. It was not in his power to give his assent to the proposal of his hon. friend the member for Dorsetshire. He could not be called upon by the forms of the House to give a direct negative to that amendment. The manner in which the question would be put from the chair he apprehended would be this, whether the motion of the hon. member for Sheffield should stand part of the question. The vote which he (Sir R. Peel) would give would be, that it should stand part of the question. He should, therefore, if the majority concurred with him in opinion, indirectly negative the proposal of his hon. friend. He should negative it upon these two grounds—he thought it had no immediate connection with the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward). He thought that the proposal of a resolution that certain associations were dangerous, was not a proper amendment to move upon a motion that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the burthens on agriculture. He thought there was no such necessary connection between the two as to make it a fitting amendment upon the original proposition. He rather thought his hon. friend must entertain an opinion not very different from his, because his hon. friend's original intention was to move it as an amendment, not upon the present motion, but upon a totally different motion, of which notice was given by the hon. member for Dumfries; but it happening that that motion would not be brought forward so early as was expected, his hon. friend transferred it to the motion now before the House. Upon the ground of its not being an appropriate amendment, he was prepared to express his dissent from it. But there was another ground on which he was also prepared to signify his dissent from this amendment. He decidedly objected to the House of Commons dealing with any acts which it might reprobate, or with any association which it might consider dangerous, by way of resolution. How could they affect the acts or the associations by any resolution they might come to? A resolution of that House constituted no part of the law of the land. There was no obligation on individuals or on associations to defer to the resolutions of the House; and if the resolutions were not deferred to, and the country be induced to disobey them, the passing of them would have a tendency to exhibit rather the imbecility of the House than its power. Although the association had not been distinctly pointed out by his hon. friend, yet there was no doubt what association his hon. friend meant; but if there were any associations in this country which transgressed the law, and which were so far dangerous that the law ought to be enforced, then it was the duty of her Majesty's government to apply to the provisions of the existing law. If it were thought that the government was remiss in performing its duty, it was competent for the House of Commons to address the Crown, praying the Crown to enforce the existing law. That was a course implying, certainly, some reflection upon the government; but it was perfectly consistent with, and perfectly open to, the House of Commons to take that course. If, on the other hand, the law were defective, the House of Commons had a perfect right to do that which was within its own province for the amending the law, namely, to introduce a bill to remove the defects of the existing law. Either of these courses was open to the House of Commons; but he objected to the course proposed of passing a resolution which would not have the power of a law, and had no binding obligation on their fellow subjects. Upon these two grounds he must dissent from the proposal of his hon. friend. To the proposition of the hon. gentleman the member for Sheffield he should also give a decided negative. He could not acquiesce in the propriety of appointing the committee which the hon. gentleman proposed. He was sorry to hear a portion of the speech which was delivered by the hon. member for Manchester. Nothing was more unfair or more ungenerous than the attack which the hon. member made upon those gentlemen connected with the landed interest, who, in the course of the last session of parliament, showed a disposition to support the proposal for relaxing the duties upon corn and other articles. They supported him in his proposal to reduce the duty on corn, and to repeal altogether prohibitions upon the importation of foreign meat and cattle; and what was the acknowledgment which the hon. member for Manchester made for this? He said to those gentlemen—by the very support you gave to those proposals, you proved that you were conscious of possessing what you had no right to possess; and yet, in the course of the same speech, the hon. gentleman said he could assure the House, on the part of the manufacturers, that they were perfectly prepared to part with the protection they now enjoy. Now, if he and those hon. gentlemen whom the hon. member for Manchester so unjustly assailed, were to turn round upon the manufacturers and say,—Because you are willing to part with the protection you now have, you impliedly admit that you have been robbing the public by maintaining duties which were not for the benefit of the public, but for the benefit of yourselves, would not the hon. gentleman himself have been the first to rise and denounce so unjust an imputation upon the manufacturing interest, and have resented it as most unwarrantably making an attack upon the manufacturers of having plundered the people? If he had ever indulged in sneers at the manufacturing interests, such sneers would have come with a peculiarly bad grace from him; with a bad grace as a minister of the Crown, and with peculiarly bad grace as an individual who owed all that he possessed to that interest which he was bound to hold dear. In the course of the debate, and in repelling some argument advanced against him, he might have used terms which any one wishing to take advantage of him might have turned to some such purpose, and which might have rendered him open to the mi-construction of the hon. gentleman; but he assured the hon. gentleman that he did him gross injustice, if the hon. gentleman supposed that he was unmindful of the deep obligations he owed to the manufacturing interests; or if he had indulged for an instant in a sneer at the tall chimneys of the manufacturers to which he owed all of wealth that he possessed. He therefore protested against the construction which the hon. gentleman had put upon any expression of his. The question between the hon. gentleman and himself was not whether any information which could throw any light upon this subject should be withheld, but whether a select committee was the proper tribunal to come to a satisfactory decision. Suppose that the hon. gentleman's committee should be appointed—that he should acquiesce in it—he would claim that his own side of the House should be fairly represented upon it; and if the committee were to represent the opinions of the House, he should be entitled to claim a majority. If so, would the report of the committee be perfectly satisfactory to the hon. gentleman? [Mr. Hume: It might take evidence.] What would be the nature of the evidence? It would only consist of conflicting opinions as to whether the land bore a greater or a less share of the burdens. The facts he had no objections to give in the shape of returns. Now with respect to the amount of taxation, the landed interest was subject to public taxes, and also to local taxation; and as some contended, it was subject to a peculiar burden in the support of a church establishment. The land had to bear almost exclusively the maintenance of the church establishment in three portions of the United Kingdom, in England, Scotland, and Ireland. In this country, likewise, it had to bear a large proportion of the expense of maintaining the sacred edifices, for he apprehended that a great proportion of the church-rates fell upon land. Then, with respect to public taxes, whatever return should be called for to show the proportion of the taxes borne by the land, and which could be produced from any office, he would have no objection to give. The hon. gentleman opposite had called for a return of the amount of the taxes borne by the land in the other countries of Europe; he did not think that the returns were very satisfactory, but as far as the government could procure them they were given. The hon. gentleman was in possession of them. Then let him take the case of the legacy and probate duties. The hon. gentleman contended that the land was altogether exempt from any charge for legacy or probate duty. He denied the assumption of the hon. gentleman. He said, in the first place, that the land did bear a considerable portion of the legacy and probate duty. All the leasehold interests paid the duty. How then was the question at issue between them to be met? Not by the appointment of a committee, but by voluntarily giving all the returns that might be called for. The hon. gentleman said, that the land paid no equivalent for exemption from the legacy and probate duties. He said, that land contributed almost as much as personal estates to the exigencies of the state by the payment of the stamp duties on conveyances. There was a material difference between him and the hon. gentleman; that difficulty also needed not a committee to clear it up, it might be done by returns. A motion was made last year for subjecting land to the legacy and probate duty. He had opposed it himself; it had also been opposed by members of the late government; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the year 1840, when pressed so to subject it, had showed, first, that the land did contribute to these taxes; and next, that it had paid £1,600,000 during the year for stamps on deeds and conveyances of land, whilst the total amount of the legacy and probate duty during the year was little more than £1,700,000. The hon. gentleman had totally omitted this charge, which was considered by the right hon. gentleman equivalent to the probate and legacy duty. The hon. gentleman said, that stamps were used for marine insurances and other purposes unconnected with land. Let the returns make every distinction. Let the House see what amount was contributed by the land to the legacy, probate, and stamp duties; and then let them consider, in the House, and not in a select committee, whether there were any peculiar exemptions. Next, there were the local taxes. The first great charge to which the land had to contribute was the poor rates and the county rates. The hon. gentleman denied, that these were unduly charged upon land. Here, again, let him call for returns. The hon. gentleman referred to the policy of the ancient law. He referred also to that law, as showing, that when these burdens were originally placed upon land, the same statute expressly provided, that the profits upon trade should be subjected to the tax. That was the policy of the law. Recent decisions in the courts of law had so determined; but the legislature passed an act exempting the profits of trade from the poor-rate. They found it difficult without a process of inquiry—to which they did not like to submit—to ascertain the profits of trade, or the amount at which they should assess stock in trade; and they had exempted stock in trade and profits of trade; but land was tangible, the profits were easily assessed, and they had made the land contribute to make up the deficiency. Let the House have the whole case before them, and all this would be easily ascertained. If they had a committee composed of seven gentlemen on the one side, and seven on the other, their opinions would have been made up before they began; and he did not expect that any investigation they could make, or any expression of opinion, would materially weigh with the House. An inference was to be drawn—it was to be drawn from public documents, and not by such an inquiry as the hon. gentleman demanded. Then as to the charges for highways. The hon. gentleman said, that these highways were essential for communication between different properties, but highways were equally necessary for communication between towns; and if the charge for highway rates did fall in an undue proportion upon land, surely it was not unfair to consider it a peculiar burden. But this was a matter for public discussion, on which hon. members were perfectly competent to form a decision, and no one would be influenced by the report of a select committee. That opinion would be greatly influenced by facts, but those facts could be as well ascertained by returns as by a committee. Then with respect to tithes, the hon. gentleman denies that they are a burden upon land. He drew a distinction between tithes of an uncertain amount to be determined at the caprice of an individual, and tithes paid by way of commutation, and he said,—“There has been a commutation of tithes of late years, which alters the whole question, because formerly the amount of tithe was uncertain, and varying from year to year according to the quantity produced, whereas it is now comparatively fixed and certain; therefore, whatever the opinion in former times may have been, it is now clear that tithes no longer constitute a burden upon land.”

He did not deny that variable tithes were a greater burden on land than a commutation; the question, however, was whether tithes paid for the maintenance of the Established Church were or not to be considered a peculiar burden on land. As he had said last year, Adam Smith and Ricardo had settled this question. Would a committee elucidate the facts, and determine whether the hon. gentleman or Adam Smith and Ricardo were right; or was it not rather a general inquiry into which every man was capable of entering for himself. Adam Smith said:—“When, instead of a certain portion of the produce of the land, or of the price of a certain portion, a certain sum of money is to be paid in full compensation for all tax or tithes, the tax becomes in this case exactly of the same nature with the land-tax of England. It neither rises nor falls with the rent of the land. It neither encourages nor discourages improvement. The tithe, in the greater part of those parishes which pay what is called a modus in lieu of all other tithe, is a tax of this kind.”

The opinion of Mr. Ricardo, a gentleman opposed to the corn-laws, was decided upon this point, and on that of tithes being a burden on land. Notwithstanding the origin of tithes, the claims of the church to tithes, he was willing to admit, were equal in force to the claims of the landlords to their estates; yet both Adam Smith and Ricardo were aware of this when they considered that the land in England was entitled to protection; they both said that the English land was subject to burthens to which foreign lands were not, and they both agreed that, for the burthens tending to increase the price of the production of the corn here above the price of production on the continent, the land was entitled to protection. Then the hon. gentleman laid it down that they should only consider the comparative protection of the produce of land, and the produce of manufactures in this country, and that we had no right, in dealing with the agricultural protection afforded in this country, to consider whether other countries would produce their corn free from these burthens. There again Mr. Ricardo and Adam Smith were both at issue with the hon. gentleman. Mr. Ricardo said, "a tax that falls exclusively on any commodity tends to raise the price of that commodity;" and that if it did not so raise the price, the producer would be subject to a disadvantage, for "he would no longer gain the ordinary profits of trade." [Cheers.] The noble lord cheered. No doubt Mr. Ricardo disregarded altogether the comparative expense of production between this and foreign countries, unless the greater expense arose from peculiar burthens. Mr. Ricardo said that unless the extra expense of producing here arose from special taxation, the land was not entitled to protection; and he, therefore, dissented from the report of the agricultural committee of 1821. But let them observe the practical conclusion to which Mr. Ricardo came. He thought that Mr. Ricardo did distinctly say that tithes did operate as a burthen on land, and that they had a tendency to raise the cost of producing corn; and the practical conclusion of Mr. Ricardo's writings in 1822 or 1823 was, that until corn should arrive at the price of 70s. there should be an exclusion of foreign produce; when corn arrived at that price he proposed that there should be a duty of 20s.; that the duty should then diminish annually by 1s. till it reached the fixed duty of 10s.; and that afterwards this duty of 10s. should remain permanently, as he considered 10s. was the protection to which, in consequence of the superior cost of the production of corn in this country, the producer was entitled. These were his exact words:—"If the importation price of wheat were 60s. a quarter in England, and it was 60s. a quarter on the continent, and in consequence of the burthen of tithes, wheat was raised in England to 70s. a quarter, a duty of 10s. ought also to be imposed on the importation of foreign corn."

Here Mr. Ricardo showed a decided difference of opinion from the hon. gentleman. He said that if a tax were in operation here there ought to be protection. He (Sir R. Peel) was assuming that tithes did operate as a tax. Not only did Mr. Ricardo say that if tithes did operate as a tax there should be protection, but he admitted that tithes in this country did operate as a burden upon land. [Viscount Howick: Hear.] The noble lord could not possibly deny that Mr. Ricardo called tithe a tax. He therefore said with respect to the three burthens of public taxes, of local taxes, and of tithes, that he was perfectly prepared to produce all the returns which could be required, and let the House determine whether they were or were not actually burthens on land. He never did, however, rest the claims of the land to protection on the ground exclusively of these burthens. He had contended as Mr. Ricardo had contended, that after protection had been afforded for 150 years, and after large masses of capital had been invested in land under that protection, any rash or hasty withdrawal of that protection, throwing open the produce of this country to the unlimited and uncontrolled competition of foreign countries, would not be judicious, and he had not spoken of the interests of agriculture exclusively, but the general interests of the community: he had contended that they should deal with agricultural produce as they had uniformly dealt with manufacturing interests, to make any change with great caution and great care. He never could exclude from his consideration not only the amount of capital embarked in agriculture, but that a great proportion of the population of this country was employed in it: and if they rashly disturbed those laws, although their principle might be unwise, yet after their long endurance, not only would the landed interest be injured, but the great interests of the community at large would suffer. When hon. gentlemen quoted his expression, "that a country ought to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest," and said that he laid down this as the general principle to which the law ought to conform, they ought in fairness to couple that quotation with his declaration, that in a state of society so artificial as this, and after these laws had endured so long, although such a principle might be sound, yet they should abstain from a rash and unwise manner of applying it without due consideration. He would read to the House the very words he had used last year upon this subject, on the motion of the hon. gentleman. He had thus contended last year:—"I rested the claims of the land to protection, not upon its peculiar burthens alone, but upon other grounds. I said, that protection to the produce of the soil had been afforded for the last 150 years—that large capital had been invested on land under that system of protection—and that nothing, therefore, in my opinion, could be more unwise than to risk the disturbance of the interests embarked in agriculture by the sudden withdrawal of the protection which had so long been afforded to them, under which the existing relations of society had in a great degree been formed, and in reliance upon which so much wealth had been directed to the cultivation of the soil."

That was the language which he held last year, and when hon. gentlemen quoted his statement of the principle which ought in the main to guide their legislation, they ought in fairness to refer to the qualification with which he had announced the application of that principle. He confessed he was rather surprised that the hon. gentleman should have made this motion. Did he think, that this inquiry ought to be completed before there was fresh legislation on the corn-laws? If he had acceded to the appointment of this committee, and had, in addition to the seven gentlemen selected by this hon. gentleman, named seven on his own side of the House, to consider the peculiar burthens on the land—and if their labours should continue for the same period as similar inquiries had done—did the hon. gentleman intend to postpone all legislation till those labours should be concluded? The hon. gentleman had referred to the possibility of the inquiry lasting two or three years, and he had known inquiries last that time. Now, did not the hon. gentleman, if he got this committee, still intend to go next week for a total repeal of these laws? Would he not say, "Although you have appointed a committee, its inquiries are all beside the question; for even if you show that there are peculiar burthens on land, the hon. member for Manchester says, and I agree with him, that there ought to be no protection on that account." [Mr. Gibson: You should equalise the burthens.] The hon. gentleman said, that they ought to equalise the burthens, and not to grant protection. If this motion were carried, might not the hon. member vote after Easter for a total repeal, leaving the agriculturists to trust for protection to the equalisation of the public burthens. He had been charged with producing uncertainty by his proposition, and the hon. member for Dumfries had given notice of a motion on that account. Perhaps he would not persevere in the motion. At any rate, he was happy to see that the hon. member thought it of so little importance, that he need not pay particular attention to the debate. [Laughter, Mr. Ewart being asleep.] He was sure that the hon. member would not be indulging in repose, if he did not know that the great question of the Corn-laws must be decided by the House of Commons, and that the proposal of a committee might be a very proper subject for debate, but that it need not occupy much vigilant attention. The hon. member thought his attendance necessary for the purpose of his vote, but that attention to the arguments was not absolutely required. On Thursday next, however, the hon. member meant to move:—"That, it having been acknowledged on the part of the ministry of this country, that the present Corn-law is not a settlement of the question, and there being reasonable grounds for believing that the existence of such law will be of short duration, it is just and expedient that a state of uncertainty, embarrassing and unfair to the agriculturists, and injurious to commerce, should be put an end to, and measures of a settled and final character adopted without further delay."

The hon. member said, that this uncertainty was unfair to the agriculturists and injurious to the interests of commerce, and he, therefore, called upon the House to settle the question of the Corn-laws on a principle of finality; but what sort of a settlement could there be if the House of Commons referred this inquiry to a committee whose labours should not be concluded? He advised the House to act on the suggestion of the hon. gentleman's motion. The question was too vast and comprehensive to be disposed of by a committee. If the law were to be altered, let them go at once to the consideration of the alteration; let a motion be made.

An opportunity would be afforded him of discussing the policy of the present law on the motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers), and he would not then enter upon it. He would examine the operation of that bill, and when he should be called on, he would enter upon the various and comprehensive considerations involved in the question of the Corn-laws. He admitted, that it was of the utmost importance that the people of this country should know what were the intentions of the legislature with respect to these laws, and his belief was, that the appointment of a committee would more than any thing else contribute to create uncertainty; it would be infinitely better if the House of Commons were prepared to make a change, to make that change at once, rather than devolve an inquiry upon a committee, which, if it meant any thing, meant that they ought not to legislate till the result of their labours was known. It was not fair to give a committee, when, if it were granted, they might next week proceed at once to the repeal of the Corn-laws. The right hon. baronet concluded by saying:—"I have no other object than to do justice between all parties whose permanent and comprehensive interests are intimately united, although I know that there may be an immediate conflict between them. In the proposal which we made last year, and which was made without reference to any party or political consideration, I did attempt what I deemed most consistent with justice, and most conformable to the interests of the country. It was impossible to touch those great questions without great embarrassment. We could not remove the protection afforded to cattle and meat, and reduce the duty on foreign corn, without disturbing the minds of the agricultural body. There has been an undue panic affecting them, not warranted by the change in the law, which had created a great evil, disturbing the application of capital, and suspending or diminishing employment. A continuance of doubt will be pregnant with evil consequences. I know that it is impossible for any minister of the Crown—I know it is impossible for the House of Commons to give any sort of guarantee for the permanency of a law of this description. I have already, for myself, refused to give such a guarantee. I say that I will reserve my opinion as to the necessity for an alteration of the law; and I say that no false sense of consistency, if I am convinced that this law is injurious, shall prevent me from advising against its further continuance. But although there must be a certain degree of uncertainty as to laws of this nature, whether we take a graduated or a sliding scale, do not increase the difficulty by sending it for the consideration of a select committee, to publish contradictory evidence day by day; not elucidating, but rather tending to conceal the facts. The agricultural body have a fair right to expect from me at least a maintenance of the law, till I am convinced that it is wholly objectionable. [Viscount Howick: Hear.] If the noble lord thinks that I am making any reserve for party purposes, he is decidedly mistaken. On the one hand, I have seen nothing in the operations of the law to change my opinion as to the result; but, on the other hand, I never will give a guarantee that if, after an experience of the working of the law a better can be substituted, I will not adopt it. Although I am the author of that law I would so act, whatever may be the consequence, and even if I were to lose power to-morrow. But I will maintain the law till my opinion undergoes a change; and it would not be fitting for me, after passing this law, in which I received the assistance of a great majority of the agricultural interests, acting, of course, for the public interests, but on the implied condition entered into, that so long as my opinions as to its working shall not be changed, there should be no alteration, to disturb the minds of the agricultural interests, by agreeing to the appointment of this committee.

The amendment was negatived without a division. The House then divided on the original motion; Ayes, 133; Noes, 232; majority 99.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

MARCH 21, 1843.

In the debate on Viscount Palmerston's motion, "For copies or extracts of the communications which have taken place between the British government and Lord Ashburton, their plenipotentiary at Washington, on the subject of the treaty signed at Washington on the 9th of August last"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the noble lord (Palmerston) has occupied nearly three hours [a voice, "more"]—the noble lord has occupied more than three hours in stating to the House his reason for asserting that her Majesty's government have acted unwisely and improperly in the selection they made of a representative of the British Crown to negotiate on behalf of this country, in bringing to a satisfactory settlement disputes which had lasted more than a quarter of a century. The noble lord has attempted to show, that those negotiations have been ill-conducted, that the terms agreed to were unfavourable to Great Britain. The noble lord denounced the treaties; he denounced the parties to those treaties; and yet the House cannot have forgotten that the powerful party, of which the noble lord is one of the heads, attempted for years to bring that question to a satisfactory issue, and attempted to do so in vain; yet now, the noble lord does not think it inconsistent with his public duty to make the motion which is at present before you, and to deliver the speech which you have just heard. The noble lord tells you, that I told the hon. member for Montrose, that I did not propose to lay those papers before the House. What was the exact state of the case? When the hon. member put that question to me, I did state that I conceived it would be prejudicial to the public service to lay before the House the whole of the correspondence between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton; but when the noble lord thought proper to give notice of a motion upon this subject, I said I would give all the materials which might be necessary for bringing that motion with the fullest effect before the House, and accordingly I laid upon the table every paper and document necessary for the purpose of making out any case which the noble lord might think necessary, in order that there should be no technical objection or difficulty whatever; but it must now be obvious to the House that the noble lord has evaded the opportunity thus afforded to him in a manner most unworthy of the position which he occupies. The noble lord well knows that I afforded him every facility, if he so thought fit, to move a vote of censure upon us and upon the representative whom we selected. He well knew, that if he felt himself warranted in moving against us a condemnation of the treaty, and of the negotiations which preceded that treaty, he might have done so without encountering any technical or official difficulty; but, if he had done so, I should have met such a motion by an amendment distinctly approving of the course which we have taken from the outset, and confirming the conclusion to which we have conducted the whole proceeding; and the noble lord knows that that amendment would have been carried by a very large majority of this House. The noble lord says, he has sufficient materials to enable him to judge of the principles of that treaty—he has sufficient to enable him to pronounce that the negotiations have been most unwisely and improperly conducted—that the terms of the treaty are insufficient and inequitable; and holding his position, and with these opinions, the noble lord thinks it a manly and becoming course to call for papers which I have already intimated that I do not think it consistent with the public interest to produce. The noble lord says, that the treaty is now ratified, and on that ground he would not now propose a vote of condemnation. That was not the ground taken when Lord Sidmouth concluded the treaty of Amiens. That treaty had been ratified, when Mr. Windham and Lord Grenville, who thought it unwise and unjust, did not shrink from the manly course of calling on the House to express an opinion upon it. In 1783, when the peace of Versailles was made, it was made, and after it was beyond the control of parliament, the treaty having been ratified and the ratifications exchanged, Lord John Cavendish did not shrink from calling upon the House to declare its opinion upon the treaty. He moved a resolution distinctly implying that the treaty ought to be adhered to, but censuring those by whom it had been concluded. The result was, the affirmation of the treaty, and the exclusion from power of those by whom the treaty was ratified. The noble lord has no pretext, therefore, for avoiding a resolution condemnatory of the treaty, on the ground of its being ratified, because it would be quite consistent for the noble lord to move the affirmation of the treaty, and to provide for its ratification, and at the same time condemn those under whose auspices it has been concluded. I will now take notice of the principal topics to which the noble lord has adverted, and I think it will be more convenient not exactly to follow the order of the noble lord's observations, but to separate those which refer to questions connected with slavery from those which are connected with the much more important question, in my opinion—the question of more pressing interest—that relating to the boundary. The noble lord says, that her Majesty's government have taken what he must call a backward step with respect to slavery. He offers three proofs of that disposition on the part of her Majesty's government to retrocession. The first is with the two articles of the present treaty, which relate to the suppression of the slave-trade, by the United States. The noble lord says, that by having inserted those two articles in the treaty, we appear to admit that the United States will, by acceding to those articles, fulfil all the obligations imposed on them by the treaty of Ghent. This is the article of the treaty of Ghent, with respect to the slave-trade:—"Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavours to accomplish so desirable an object."

I ask, what has the noble lord done for the purpose of inducing the United States to fulfil the obligation of that treaty? The noble lord was ten years Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and since the year 1814 the articles of the treaty of Ghent have been in force. Has the noble lord prevailed on America to submit to the right of search? Has the noble lord prevailed on the United States to take any step so effectual for the suppression of the slave-trade as the step which they have now consented to take on the coast of Africa? For the first time, in the year 1842, the American government has consented to conjoin its efforts with those of Great Britain, on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. They have agreed to appoint a sufficient and adequate squadron for the purpose of preventing vessels bearing the American flag from being concerned in the slave-trade. What right has the noble lord to assume that that is understood as a complete fulfilment of the treaty of Ghent? And what step, I repeat, was the noble lord enabled to take, during the ten years he was in power, more effectual than that to which the American government has now consented? By the 9th article of the treaty they promise to do that which they promised in the treaty of Ghent—namely, to join with us in addressing all becoming representations and remonstrances to any and all the powers within whose dominions a slave market is allowed to exist; and in urging upon all such powers the propriety and duty of closing such markets at once and for ever. So far from the present government having taken a retrograde step with respect to slavery, I say that, by prevailing upon the American government to appoint a squadron to co-operate with this country, they have taken a step more effectual, and more in advance, than the late government of the noble lord was enabled to take. The second proof which the noble lord adduces of our retrocession is totally unconnected with the present discussion—namely, the course pursued by France in refusing to ratify the late treaty. The noble lord admits, that France was willing to sign with him a treaty extending the right of search, but says that, in consequence of the treaty of the 15th of July, 1840, France refused to sign it. He said, that the French government anticipated sentiments more favourable to France from the present Cabinet, and that they deferred ratifying the treaty out of compliment to us. So far as the wishes of the government were concerned, that showed no retrograde step. But the French government did ultimately, in consequence of the intervention of the Chamber of Deputies, the popular assembly representing the opinions of the French people, hesitate to fulfil their original intentions, and decline to ratify the treaty. It was not General Cass who was the cause of that refusal. The cause was the noble lord, whose policy towards France almost brought England to a state of direct and open hostility with that country. It was the noble lord who embittered and exasperated the public feeling of France towards England, by the prosecution of his schemes in Syria, and who may claim the exclusive credit of having caused the rejection of that treaty. What course would the noble lord have us pursue? The noble lord was aware of the non-ratification in the course of last session. Why did the noble lord make no motion on the subject, and hardly put a question in the course of last session? Because he was aware, that all would have felt it to be an unseemly thing in him, who had been the cause of this interruption in the progress of humanity, to stand up and charge her Majesty's government with the blame of having prevented an extension of the right of search, and a cordial union with France. The third of the noble lord's proofs of the alleged indisposition on the part of the present government to exert itself for the suppression of slavery, was the instructions given by my noble friend, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to her Majesty's vessels on the coast of Africa, to conform to the law of nations in their efforts for the suppression of slavery and the slave-trade. If I recollect rightly, the noble lord opposite was called upon to make compensation for exceeding the law, in consequence of the destruction of barracoons. It is right that this country should exert itself to the utmost for the suppression of slavery; but its exertions ought to be limited by some regard for the law of nations. You may depend upon it, that if you attempt to exercise your power with a disregard of the obligations of the law of nations, you will be called upon for compensation for any acts unwarranted by that law. My noble friend acted in conformity with the opinion of him who advises the government with respect to the law of nations. My noble friend quoted the opinion of the Queen's advocate, that blockading rivers, landing and destroying buildings, carrying off persons, held in slavery, from a country with which Great Britain was not at war, could not be justified by the law of nations or the provisions of any existing treaty—that, however desirable it might be to put an end to the slave-trade, the good, however eminent, ought not to be obtained otherwise than by legal means. That opinion warranted my noble friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in saying that it was desirable that her Majesty's naval officers employed in suppressing the slave-trade ought to abstain from destroying slave-factories and carrying off persons, unless from territories with respect to which England was authorised by treaty to act in that manner. I am perfectly certain, that if you transgress the law of nations, your efforts, however well intended, will be less effectual than if you respect the rights of other countries. This is all I contend for. I say, employ all your naval power, and let no consideration of expense prevent you from enforcing the rights of humanity, but do not disregard, if your intervention is to be ultimately effectual, if you wish to conciliate the good opinion of other countries and induce them to co-operate with you, do not disregard the great principles of public law to which all nations are alike subject. The next point to which I shall refer, is the article of the late treaty providing for the mutual surrender of persons charged with offences. The noble lord admits, that the general object aimed at by the article is a wise one, that where the countries have a common boundary, the escape of criminals, by stepping over that boundary, is prejudicial to the cause of good order, and injurious to the interests of both countries. The reciprocal delivery of heinous criminals is clearly an object of importance to civilised governments. But I admit to the noble lord, that we must take great care, lest, in the application of that principle, we interfere with the rights of those who become freemen by stepping upon our soil. But the object must be secured by law. The article of the treaty cannot take effect without an act of parliament, and, as a bill upon the subject will be introduced, it will be better to postpone the consideration of details until that bill comes under discussion. I may observe that there is a special provision in the eleventh article of the treaty, that, if experience should show that the two objects cannot be reconciled—the surrender of criminals, and the due protection of those who, being slaves in one country, become free by passing into the other; then the tenth article is to cease to operate, and is to continue in force until one or other of the parties shall signify its wish to terminate it, and no longer. That is a wise and prudent provision, by which, if any injustice arise from the operation of the treaty, it may be remedied. The next point to which the noble lord referred was the correspondence in the case of the Creole. The noble lord must observe that no stipulations have been entered into by Lord Ashburton on that subject. Lord Ashburton expressed a wish to reserve, for the consideration of the government at home, the arrangement which it might be desirable to make with respect to cases similar to that of the Creole; but he declined to enter into stipulations on the subject. He said, that, for reasons which he stated, he thought it better that the question should be settled in London, where the chances would be much increased of a settlement likely to satisfy the United States. But on discussing the question of the Creole, Lord Ashburton laid down clearly and unequivocally this great principle. He says:—"Upon the great general principles affecting this case, we do not differ; you admit, that if slaves, the property of American citizens, escape into British territories, it is not expected that they will be restored, and you may be well assured that there is no wish on our part that they should reach our shores, or that British possessions should be used as decoys for the violators of the laws of a friendly neighbour. When these slaves do reach us, by whatever means, there is no alternative. The present state of British law is in this respect too well known to require repetition, nor need I remind you that it is exactly the same with the laws of every part of the United States, where a state of slavery is not recognised; and that the slave put on shore at Nassau would be dealt with exactly as would a foreign slave landed under any circumstances whatever at Boston."

Lord Ashburton, then, on referring to the peculiar position of the southern coast of the United States, contended that the municipal law of each country should be put in force. That law, of course, gives the privileges of freedom to the man who has become free by touching the British soil. Lord Ashburton declared finally that he was not empowered to enter into engagements or stipulations on the principle involved in the case of the Creole. As to the compensation demanded from us in that case, the British government has refused to grant any. They maintain the principle that the slave coming upon British soil is free, without regard to any claim for compensation by the master of such slave. The noble lord afterwards observed that every point of difference had not been adjusted. If every point of difference has not been adjusted, I apprehend one reason is, that Lord Ashburton did not enter into every possible point of eventual difference, lest he might excite fears and prejudices which would prevent a satisfactory settlement of the one question which has been the festering sore in our relations with the United States for the last twenty-five years. That is the one question which has exasperated every other, and embittered every prejudice against England. When we succeeded to the government the country was trembling upon the verge between peace and war. It was difficult to say to what side the balance would incline, and Lord Ashburton's great object was to effect, not merely an adjustment, but an honourable and satisfactory adjustment of that one great question, being satisfied that a settlement of that would lead to a good understanding upon all others. The question of the Oregon territory, no doubt, is not adjusted, but on that it is not necessary that I should address the House at any length. With respect to the course which the American government has taken, the noble lord makes no allowance for the position of a government so open to popular influence as that of America. We, however, deal with the executive government and not with the senate. We have proposed to that government to consider the means of effecting a conciliatory adjustment respecting the Oregon territory; and we have met with no repulse, but have received assurances, in reply to our proposition, that the executive government of the United States is anxious to come to an adjustment of that question; and we have every reason to hope, that unless we revive the former animosity and embitter the feelings between the two countries, that our attempt to settle that question by negotiation will be satisfactory. The noble lord says that the senate has passed a bill, which I believe it has not passed. I think the votes were equally divided; but whatever the senate may do, it is impossible for the executive government to approve of such a bill after having expressed a desire to negotiate. The noble lord says, the adoption of that bill would be a case of war. I will not discuss hypothetical cases of war, when, as I have said, the executive government has signified to us its desire to maintain peace, and to effect a satisfactory adjustment of the question of the Oregon territory. I trust in the assurances of the executive government, and I will not believe that it will give its consent to a legislative measure at variance with those assurances. I have reserved for the last that most important part of the negotiation which relates to the determination of the boundary between her Majesty's north-eastern provinces in north America and the United States. We have felt it our duty to attempt to draw a conventional line for the purpose of settling that question. We have felt it our duty to pursue a different course from that which the noble lord had pursued, with but little success. Instead of new exploring surveys, and new arbitrations, we have sought and obtained an adjustment of this much litigated question, which was fast endangering the relations of amity between the two countries. Sixty years have now passed since the seeds of these dissensions were sown. In the year 1783 England made a treaty with the United States, in utter ignorance of the geographical position of the country. From 1783 until 1841 not only had no progress been made in solving the difficulties arising from that treaty, but the question was placed, after that lapse of time, in a worse position than ever. An attempt to settle it by the treaty of Ghent was made, and that failed. Proposals have been repeatedly made since, both by the United States and the British government, for the purpose of effecting a settlement. Negotiations were tried in 1827, and the aid of an arbitrator called in; an impartial sovereign was selected for the purpose of determining, or attempting to determine what was the boundary contemplated by the parties who made the treaty of 1783. The subject was under deliberation for two or three years, and at length the king of Holland made an award, in which he stated that it was utterly impossible that that treaty could be strictly executed. The substance of his award was, that from the vagueness of the language of the treaty, it was impossible to decide in favour of either party, without violating the principles of law with regard to the other. He therefore strongly advised a compromise, and suggested that a conventional line should be drawn, dividing the territory equitably between the two countries. The American government had the award under consideration in 1832. The British government, on receiving it, professed their readiness to accept the award. When the noble lord made a notification to that effect, he declared he thought the claim of Great Britain perfectly well-founded, that the parties to the treaty of 1783 intended to give Great Britain what she claimed, but he was so anxious for a satisfactory termination of the difference that he waived the extreme right of Great Britain, and would accept the award of the king of the Netherlands. In 1832 the Senate of the United States determined not to accept the award. They said the arbitrator had no right to accept a compromise—that he was bound to decide in favour of one or the other. On that ground they refused to be bound by the award. Did the noble lord refuse to be bound by it also? No; for three years after that decision the noble lord kept pressing upon the United States the acceptance of the boundary line suggested by the king of Holland. The moment the United States refused to accept it, the noble lord was freed from any obligation he might feel to accept the award. But for three years he pressed it upon America. He wished the United States to take that very crest of hills which overlooks the St. Lawrence, for giving up which the noble lord complains of us. During that period he had opportunities of taking military advice, of ascertaining whether the country would be endangered by the proposed boundary. On this point the noble lord had no excuse. He might have been ignorant of the geographical situation of certain mountains, but at any time between 1832 to 1835 he had the means of ascertaining whether, by advancing the American boundary to the crest of hills overlooking the St. Lawrence, he would be endangering the military security of Canada or not. Canada and Quebec had been threatened by insurgents, a war was apprehended with the United States, and public attention had been called to the subject. It was well and generally known, that the proposed boundary was unfavourable to us; yet for three years the noble lord continued to press upon the American government the adoption of a line which he now says by having been adopted, exposes to the utmost danger our Canadian possessions. Well, then, in 1835, all his efforts to persuade the American government to adopt the award having proved ineffectual, in October, 1835, the noble lord gave notice that he declined to be bound any longer by the award, and since that period he has tried all in his power to settle the question by negotiation. But let me ask with what success? I will trace briefly the progress of the negotiation, and what had been done till my noble friend, Lord Ashburton, took the matter in hand. The noble lord says my noble friend is a simple-minded man, and is not skilled in the arts of diplomacy. Now, my noble friend may not be intimately acquainted with the technicalities of the Foreign Office—he may want the skill to write long protocols; but what did you do in the ten years you were in power?—what was the position in which you left the question? I submit you have had enough of the cunning of diplomacy in former years. You had a choice of diplomatists. You had men of the first eminence in all the trickery and artifices of diplomacy, and what was your success? In what position did you leave the negotiations in 1841, after having had all these skilled and practised diplomatists at your command, Sir Charles Vaughan included, and Lord Heytesbury, whom you would not allow to govern India, but whom you think so admirably fitted, and I agree with you, for diplomatic functions—you had all these and your master-mind directing them—and I will now show, tracing the negotiations, in what position you left this question, a position scarcely less admirable than that in which you left affairs in Afghanistan. Well, in 1835, the Secretary of State for foreign affairs in the United States, foreseeing the hopelessness of negotiating, made a proposition to the English government; which proposition you left for months without notice. It might have been most proper that you should not accept the offer of Mr. Livingstone—it might be most proper that you should reject it; but why did you not answer it? Why, with war almost trembling in the balance, did you contemptuously make no answer to the proposition made to you? Why leave the American government for months—nay, for more than half a year, in ignorance of your intentions? Well, then, in 1837 and 1838, you again entered into communication with the United States. That government proposed, or suggested the appointment of an exploratory commission. You consented to adopt the suggestion, but in doing so you told them, that you anticipated no benefit as the result of it. Well, in 1838 you renewed your communications with the United States, and you pressed upon her government the policy, not of appointing an exploratory commission, but of agreeing to a conventional line. You then thought the only true policy to be pursued was to enter into a compromise, and agree to draw a conventional line of frontier between the two countries. On the 10th of January, 1838, your minister, Mr. Fox, in writing to Mr. Forsyth, says: “Both governments have agreed to consider the award of the King of the Netherlands as binding upon neither party, and the two governments, therefore, are as free in this respect as they were before the reference to that sovereign was made. The British government, despairing of the possibility of drawing a line that shall be in literal conformity with the words of the treaty of 1783, has suggested that a conventional line should be substituted for the line described in the treaty, and has proposed, that, in accordance with the principles of equity, and in pursuance of the general practice of mankind in similar cases, the object of difference should be equally divided between the two differing parties, each of whom is alike convinced of the justice of his claim.”

This is the view taken of the question by the noble lord and his minister in 1838. But he went further. In the same document Mr. Fox says: “Her Majesty’s government exceedingly regret that such an obstacle should exist to prevent that settlement (the division of the disputed territory), which, under all the circumstances of the case, appears to be the simplest, the readiest, the most satisfactory, and the most just.”

No language of mine could be half so strong in favour of the treaty concluded by my noble friend; but the language of Mr. Fox was even yet more strong, for in a subsequent paragraph he says: “But the very existence of such conflicting pretensions seems to point out the expediency of a compromise; and what compromise can be more fair than that which would give to each party one-half of the subject-matter in dispute.”

These are strong opinions to come from the noble lord who made the statement which the House has just heard. Can any one for a moment doubt that in 1838 the noble lord was in favour of a conventional line? The American government had however suggested the appointment of an exploring commission, but the noble lord told them that such a commission never could lead to any useful result, and therefore he objected to it; but so anxious was he to conciliate, that he would not withhold his consent to its appointment, if the principle upon which it was to act could be agreed upon. But what did the noble lord do—what did he effect from 1838 up to September, 1841, when he quitted office? The noble lord attempted to come to an agreement upon the principle, and I will show you the result. He began by telling the American government that he despaired of success, and when the American government asked the question, “How is the inquiry of the commission to lead to a practical result?” the noble lord answered with a species of sneer in which he much indulged on some occasions, that inasmuch as the proposal for its appointment originated with them, they were the proper persons to answer the questions; he could not do it because her Majesty’s government had already expressed an opinion that it could lead to no useful result. Mr. Fox, in the letter to Mr. Forsyth to which I before referred, says: “Her Majesty’s government have themselves already stated, that they have little expectation that such a commission could lead to any useful result, and they would on that account be disposed to object to it, and if her Majesty's government were now to agree to appoint such a commission it would be only in compliance with the desire so strongly expressed by the government of the United States, and in spite of doubts which her Majesty's government still continue to entertain of the efficacy of the measure." [Lord Palmerston—Read the whole.] I have no objection, for I do not wish to misquote the noble lord. He proceeds as follows: "But with respect to the way in which the report of the commission might be expected to lead to an ultimate settlement of the question, her Majesty's government in the first place conceived that it was meant by the government of the United States, that if the commission should discover highlands answering to the description of the treaty, a connecting line drawn from those highlands to the head of the St. Croix should be deemed to be a portion of the boundary line between the two countries. But her Majesty's government would further beg to refer Mr. Forsyth to the notes of Mr. Maclane of the 5th of June, 1833, and of the 11th and 28th of March, 1834, on this subject; in which it will be seen that the government of the United States appears to have contemplated as one of the possible results of the proposed commission of exploration, that such additional information might possibly be obtained respecting the features of the country, in the district to which the treaty relates, as might remove all doubt as to the impracticability of laying down a boundary in strict accordance with the letter of the treaty. And if the investigation of the proposed commission should show that there is no reasonable prospect of finding a line strictly conformable with the description contained in the treaty of 1783, the constitutional difficulties which now prevent the United States from agreeing to a conventional line may possibly be removed, and the way may thus be prepared for the satisfactory settlement of the difference by an equitable division of the disputed territory. But if the two governments should agree to the appointment of such a commission, it would be necessary that their agreement should first be recorded in a convention, and, it would obviously be indispensable that the state of Maine should be an assenting party to the arrangement."

Well, the commission to the appointment of which the noble lord gave his consent in 1838, was to lead to an equitable division of the disputed territory; we have come to that settlement without any of the expense or delay of a commission; and I will ask the House whether, under the circumstances in which we were placed last year, we did not act a wise and prudent part? Now, I wish the House to bear in mind what it is I am labouring to prove. I want to show that when we came into power in 1841, it was most desirable that we should attempt to effect a conciliatory arrangement with America, at once, and without the loss of time and the expense of an exploratory commission. What I want to prove is, that the line agreed to and settled by my noble friend is one perfectly consistent with the honour of the country, and one which only a few short years ago the noble lord was himself anxious to adopt, and I think I have already gone far to prove that our course was a wise one, and that by adopting a conventional line we took the course the noble lord himself was anxious to pursue in 1838. It appears that the principle of a commission was agreed upon by the two governments in 1838. On the 6th of April, 1838, the noble lord sent out the draft of a convention for the new commission. The noble lord thought that the principles he laid down in that draft could not be departed from. On the 29th of July, 1839, it was found, however, that Mr. Forsyth, so far from accepting and adopting the draught of the convention so sent him by the noble lord, sent Mr. Fox his draught of the American counter-project—another project for a commission, and then the noble lord found that there was a wide difference between himself and the government at Washington—that there was, in fact, no agreement between them. On the 3rd of July, 1840, the noble lord, writing to Mr. Fox, says: "The British government accordingly transmitted in April of last year, for the consideration of the president, the draught of a convention to regulate the proceedings of the proposed commission. The preamble of that draught recited textually the agreement which had been come to, by means of notes which had been exchanged between the two governments; and the articles of the draught were framed, as her Majesty's government considered, in strict conformity with that agreement. But the government of the United States did not think proper to assent to the convention so proposed. That government did not, indeed, allege that the proposed convention was at variance with the result of the previous correspondence between the two governments; but it thought that convention would establish a joint commission of mere exploration and survey; and the president was of opinion that the step next to be taken by the two governments ought to bear upon its face stipulations which must necessarily lead to a final settlement under some form or other, and within a reasonable time. The United States' government accordingly sent to you, for transmission to her Majesty's government, a counter-draught of convention, varying considerably, as Mr. Forsyth admitted, in some parts, from the draught as proposed by her Majesty's government. But Mr. Forsyth added, that the United States' government did not deem it necessary to comment upon the alterations so made, as the text of the counter-draught would be found sufficiently perspicuous."

Now this was the state of matters in 1840. We had then Lord Palmerston complaining of nothing effectual having been done; but then, they had got the British project and the American counter-project. There was this difference, however, between them—the one contained the proposition for appointing an arbitrator, and the other did not. It was the American project that proposed an arbitrator. Then the noble lord wrote to Mr. Fox that he rejected the project of the American government altogether. Well, on the 30th of June, 1840, the noble lord sent Mr. Fox another draught of the convention, which was transmitted by him to Mr. Forsyth on the 28th of July, and how was it received? Why, on the 13th of August, also in 1840, Mr. Forsyth sent our minister another counter-project—a second counter-project, even as the noble lord had done, nor had they come to any better understanding down to August 1841, when the time was approaching for the change in the government. On the 24th August, 1841, only a few days before the noble lord left office, he wrote to Mr. Fox as follows: "Her Majesty's government received with very great regret the second American counter-draft of a convention for determining the boundary between the United States and the British North American provinces, which you transmitted to me last autumn, in your despatch of the 15th of August, 1840, because that counter-draft contained so many inadmissible propositions, that it plainly showed that her Majesty's government could entertain no hope of concluding any arrangement on this subject with the government of Mr. Van Buren, and that there was no use in taking any further steps in the negotiation till the new president should come into power. Her Majesty's government had certainly persuaded themselves that the draught which, in pursuance of your instructions, you presented to Mr. Forsyth on the 28th of July, 1840, was so fair in its provisions, and so well calculated to bring the differences between the two governments about the boundary to a just and satisfactory conclusion, that it would have been at once accepted by the government of the United States, or that if the American government had proposed to make any alterations in it, those alterations would have related merely to matters of detail, and would not have borne upon any essential points of the arrangement; and her Majesty's government were the more confirmed in this hope, because almost all the main principles of the arrangement which that draught was intended to carry into execution had, as her Majesty's government conceived, been either suggested by, or agreed to, by the United States' government itself."

This was in August, 1841, and I may be allowed to remark that the noble lord, in objecting to the propositions of the American government, had used terms, which, if ever expressions exhibited dissent to a proposition that diplomatist disapproved of, most successfully expressed dissent in all its varieties. After a negotiation of four years, the noble lord said of the arrangements proposed by the government of the United States, that as to the preamble, her Majesty's government "cannot possibly agree;" to the second article, "her Majesty's government cannot consent;" to the third article, "her Majesty's government must object." The seventh article, it was said, imposes duties upon the commissioners "incompatible with each other." I am quoting the very words used by the noble lord, and to every article there was an objection stated in a different form till they came to the tenth, and of that the noble lord said,—“But of all the propositions made by the American government, none can be more inadmissible than that contained in article 10.”

Thus to one article the noble lord cannot agree—to a second he cannot assent—to a third he said it proposed incompatible duties—and the fourth was more objectionable than the preceding; for that article, he said, suggested that Mitchell's map should be used as evidence bearing upon the question, whereas every one knew that it was full of gross inaccuracies, and "her Majesty's government can never agree to this proposal, nor to any modification of it." Thus they had begun this discussion in 1783, and in 1841 we find the noble lord, with all his diplomatic skill, and all his knowledge, and all his astuteness, and aided as he might have been by Sir C. Vaughan and Lord Heytesbury, still with no prospect of peace before him; but on the contrary, almost two days before he quitted office, declaring that he could not agree, that he dissented, that he entirely dissented, and that he positively declined to assent to propositions made to him; that these propositions were founded upon principles utterly to be repudiated; that the first was inadmissible, the second bad, and the third worse; and finally, that the noble lord, on behalf of the British government, abandoned every hope of settling the question, as long as Mr. Van Buren was in the president's chair. It was in this state that the noble lord left these negotiations. But then the noble lord had said that he would make proposals of his own for settling the dispute. And what does the House think were the noble lord's proposals in that desperate state of circumstances? The proposal of the noble lord, after fifty-eight years of controversy, submitted by him to the American government for the purpose of a speedy settlement, was, that commissioners should be nominated on both sides; that they should attempt to make a settlement of this long disputed question; and then, if that failed, that the King of Prussia, the King of Sardinia, and the King of Saxony, were to be called in, not to act as umpires, but they were each to be requested to name a scientific man, and that these three members of a scientific commission should proceed to arbitrate. Was there ever a proposition like this suggested for the arrangement of a question on which two countries had differed for fifty-eight years? And this, too, was proposed after the failure of the arbitration on the part of the King of Holland, and when they had their commission of exploration in vain. And yet, with all this, there were to be three scientific men, foreign professors—one from Prussia, one from Sardinia, and one from Saxony! to do what? and where were they to meet, or how were they to come to a satisfactory adjustment? What must the people of the State of Maine have thought of this proposition when they read that they were to be visited by three professors from Saxony, Sardinia, and Prussia? But what said the noble lord's own minister on hearing of this proposition? Mr. Fox, in writing to the noble lord said, "For God's sake, if you have arbitrators, do not have professional men." That was on record. "Have," he said, "if you like, three sovereigns, but no philosophers." It was true that their judgment should be guided by scientific men; but the final judgment should be with statesmen and not with mere professors, and this, for many obvious reasons, was a point of very great importance. So also said Mr. Featherstonhaugh whom the noble lord had praised, and praised justly. But then, the noble lord relied solely upon Mr. Featherstonhaugh and Colonel Mudge. The noble lord would not depart one inch from Featherstonhaugh and Mudge. Ten years had elapsed before the noble lord would agree to settle the question, and then he would not move from the conclusions to which he had arrived through the means of those two gentlemen. The instant Mr. Webster came into office, the noble lord attacked him with Featherstonhaugh and Mudge. He called upon Mr. Webster to submit. "But no," said Mr. Webster, "I have got a Featherstonhaugh and Mudge of my own, and I am as well satisfied with these as you are with yours." The noble lord wanted to force conviction on the United States; but they would not be convinced. But what said Mr. Featherstonhaugh to the noble lord's proposition? That it was quite true a commission might be appointed; but the commissioners might not give in their report until the expiration of eight or ten years, and then the expense of the commission might exceed the value of the territory in dispute, and, after all, the decision might be against them. For God's sake, said Mr. Fox, the noble lord's minister, do not appoint professors; go on, said the noble lord's favourite commissioner, with a commission if you will, but it may exceed the value of the territory, and after all, the decision may be against you. However, there was a change in the American government, and then Mr. Fox in despair set about executing the instructions of the noble lord. The noble lord said:—"Let us consider the American contre projet as unreasonable, undeserving of answer—as withdrawn from consideration, and now submit my original projet to Mr. Webster, the new Secretary of State, and persuade him it is reasonable."

Mr. Fox accordingly waited on Mr. Webster, and thus describes the reception his proposals met with from that gentleman, "I found him entirely ignorant of the last previous movements of the two governments on the subject." Mr. Webster not having watched the progress of these projets and contre-projets, says, "Give me time to master this difficult question." I know what that is: I have been trying to wade through it ever since it began in 1783, and I ask the sympathy of any one who has been subjected to a similar infliction. At last Mr. Fox reports, from communications with Mr. Webster, his conviction of a willingness to conclude the dispute by the compromise of a conventional line of boundary. That was the conclusion which Mr. Webster, a wise and sagacious man, came to before he had waded through one-half of the controversy; and as we came to the same conclusion, we resolved, instead of appointing commissioners, trusting to the evidence Mr. Fox adduced of a readiness on the part of the United States' government to act in a spirit of conciliation, we resolved to make one effort to conclude the long-pending dispute by a conventional line mutually satisfactory. And was it not time for us to do so? There are questions which admit of delay; there are speculative points of difference which may be hung up for years without compromising national interests or injuriously affecting the settlement of them; but there are others in respect to which delay brings with it certain peril. And what was the power of the arguments in this case against further delay? Have you read the correspondence of your own colonial officers as to what passed on the frontier? I hope to hear from a late high commissioner, the gallant officer near me, his testimony as to what was the result of the delay respecting the disputed territory. [Sir H. Douglas: "Hear."] Did we gain by this procrastination? No. America was nearer at hand. Every month that passed was undermining our dominion over that continent. I ask my gallant and hon. friend, for instance, whether in 1828 he did not apprehend an American subject and bring him to trial for encroachments on this disputed territory, and whether on the very spot on which he was taken, a fort has not since been erected, by the authorities of Maine? [Sir H. Douglas: "Hear."] The vast tide of population—that rapid and resistless tide which knows no ebb—presses on from day to day, and each month that passed saw our territory further encroached on—the dominion we had in 1838, we retained not in 1840; and had we postponed the settlement for another five years, the question would have settled itself by a contest for actual possession. If we had pursued then the course for the future which had been pursued in the past, let me tell you, that however boastful your language might have been, you would have placed yourself in an infinitely worse position than when you previously attempted to settle the question. Now let me refer to some of our colonial authorities to prove that it would not have been wise in us (notwithstanding our Featherstonhaugh and Mudge) to have waited, relying on commissions, for some five years longer, with no reasonable prospect of a satisfactory settlement. In April 1840, Sir J. Harvey writes thus to Mr. Fox:—"A sudden and entirely unexpected interruption has been made by a large body of the people of Maine (under the authority of certain resolutions of the legislature of the State) into a part of the territory in dispute, which has hitherto been in the possession of Great Britain."

Sir J. Harvey had the good fortune to meet with an excellent and judicious officer with whom he came to an agreement, by the exercise of mutual forbearance and discretion. But what was that agreement:—"That Great Britain should hold a part of the disputed territory, Maine denying the right of such possession, and that Maine should hold another portion of the territory, Great Britain denying the right of such occupation."

Here then was the convention. What is the account of the hostile preparations of Maine afforded by our minister, Mr. Sherwood?—"Every thing wears in Maine a warlike appearance; the people are hot for it. The draughting of the militia has commenced. There can be no doubt of the intention of the State; it is, to take possession of the territory we claim."

And was the agreement entered into with Sir John Harvey adhered to by the State? What said Sir John Harvey to Mr. Fox? "Upon the ratification of an agreement to this effect, accompanied as it was by an assurance from General Scott

(which to me was entirely conclusive), of his conviction that it would be fulfilled by Maine 'cheerfully and in good faith,' I immediately ordered back to Canada her Majesty's 11th regiment, which was then in the occupation of both banks of the St. John river, just below the confluence of it with the Madawaska, and I shortly afterwards despatched the warden of the disputed territory with a suitable posse, with instructions to seize and destroy all timber illegally cut, and effectually to prevent, by the force of the laws of this province, all further depredations upon the timber of that portion of the disputed territory comprised in the valley of the Upper St. John. Scarcely, however, had these orders been given, and these movements made, in the very spirit, as I declare to your excellency, of an anxious desire on my part, to give effect to what I considered to be the true intent of the arrangement, when I learned, with equal astonishment and concern, that a portion of the armed posse of Maine had not only advanced from the valley of the Restook to that of the Upper St. John, and had established and commenced fortifying itself (why do this, if not conscious of the infringement of the agreement which it was committing?) at the mouth of the Fish River; but that the person in charge of this party (of the name of Nye), had actually threatened to arrest the British warden (whose posse was unarmed), in the execution of the duties which I had assigned to him."

These are the evidences of the impropriety of delay. What further is the advice of Lord Sydenham? On the 21st of May, 1841 (one of the last letters the noble lord could have written), he thus wrote to Sir. W. Colebrooke:—"I entertain the most decided opinion that the Americans ought never to have been permitted by Sir John Harvey to form that establishment, which was in direct and open violation of the convention made by himself; but it has been suffered, and thus the curious anomaly is presented of an armed posse, in the pay and under the authority of a Foreign State, being stationed in a district over which her Majesty claims, and has exercised jurisdiction. Whilst, therefore, it is true that the authority of the warden extends, even according to the interpretation above referred to, over the fort at Fish River, it would, in my opinion, be extremely imprudent and unwise to call it in question, unless we are prepared to carry it to its full extent, which would really be the removal of the American posse altogether. A case might arise of so grave a character, in the shape of insult or injury to her Majesty's subjects along the St. John's, as would necessitate interference with this force, and justify the collision that must attend it, but every endeavour should be used to avoid it, and certainly the offence contemplated as likely to call for it, is one of the last which would be a sufficient motive for what might be attended with such serious consequences."

That is the account Lord Sydenham gave of the state of affairs; you cannot repel his authority. Yet what more humiliating position could the interests of this country be placed in? We are obliged to march men to drive a foreign force out of our territory. What a situation of relations with the United States! We know the state of things in 1841 was such that twenty-two battalions were in Canada, and if we had not settled the question, those battalions would have remained there. Lord Sydenham, moreover, said,—“From my despatch of the 21st ult., your excellency will have learned my views, in regard to the exercise by the warden of any authority over that part of the disputed territory now in possession of the state of Maine.—I still continue to think that every exertion should be made not inconsistent with the national honour and the safety of her Majesty's subjects, to prevent a collision; but it is impossible to allow the people of Maine to carry out the schemes which you suppose to be in contemplation, without an entire sacrifice of British interests. I trust that the further information which Mr. M'Lauchlan is seeking, will show that some mistake exists as to their intentions, if not, I shall immediately upon receiving your letter and further report, apply to Mr. Fox, with a request that he will at once appeal to the federal government, to prevent acts on the part of Maine which are contrary to the existing arrangements between the countries, and which, if persisted in, must inevitably lead to collision.”

Sir W. Colebrooke wrote to the same effect to the noble lord. He said—"The encroachments that have taken place, and the embarrassments that they have occasioned, induce me to consider that no time should be lost for effecting such a settlement as may be now practicable, and not a compromise of the settlers' rights on either side of the St. John's. Circumstances might, at one time, have induced the Americans to assent to such a line, if any were attainable, preferable to that proposed: but the settlements on the south of the river, would lead the people of Maine to oppose it, and such opposition would effectually prevent the United States from assenting to it."

Have I not, then, by strict proof, shown that in 1841, the matter admitted of no delay?—that the public peace on the frontier was compromised—that our amicable relations with the United States were endangered—that it would have been unwise to enter upon a new commission which might have lasted for years, and must have led either to our loss of the territory by constant encroachment, or to the necessity for a resort to arms for its protection? We determined, then, to make every effort for an honourable adjustment, and to invite, with that view, the assistance of a nobleman we believed best calculated, by his character, to attract the confidence of both countries. The noble lord opposite says, there were some prejudices and interests as to the United States, which precluded Lord Ashburton from being the proper person for such a commission. Sir, I never heard of such prejudices. I never heard of such imputations. Nor do I believe that there could be any considerations to which Lord Ashburton would listen, except that of his country's real welfare. And, I will add, that it was through his own wish alone, that he became not a cabinet councillor of her Majesty. He filled office with me in 1835. There is no man in the whole range of public characters, whom I consider more calculated to give strength to a government than Lord Ashburton. But ambition was not his object: he sought only an honourable retirement; cheered by the satisfactory recollection of many years' creditable discharge of public duties. Through his own act alone he was not included in the cabinet. It was at the earnest request of the administration that he, disregarding private wishes and inclinations, and believing his influence might be beneficial for the preservation of peace, undertook his important mission; and, in my opinion, he deserves well of his country—not only for having undertaken it, but for the manner in which he performed it. His conduct merits approbation, and I claim for the government all the responsibility which belongs to an entire approval of it. We think him entitled to every acknowledgment; it is the government, therefore, not Lord Ashburton, that is to be condemned on account of the treaty, if condemnation be considered just. But I conceive that instead of condemnation, Lord Ashburton and the government ought to meet with public acknowledgment and gratitude. He went out to the United States to effect a settlement. I think I have shown that it would have been unwise to attempt further explorations and inquiries by commissions. In some quarters, it appears that the American minister, Mr. Webster, has met with censure on account of the treaty, similar to that which has assailed Lord Ashburton; but I believe he was equally animated by a spirit of sincere regard for the interests of his country, uninfluenced by political considerations. If, then, a conventional line were to be adopted, what basis were we to take for the negotiation? We hoped for a more favourable line than the King of Holland had assigned us. What impression does the noble lord entertain as to the likelihood of the people of the United States agreeing to a line more favourable for us? For my part, I am convinced they were honestly persuaded of the justice of their claims, from the highest to the lowest. Lord Ashburton found, on his arrival in America, one almost unanimous bonâ fide conscientious feeling, that their claims were founded on justice. You may say it was an erroneous and unfounded impression; and you may be just as satisfied of the justice of our claim. But can you ever effect any adjustment without some degree of mutual concession? And the impression of the Americans had been strengthened by the noble lord's conduct. The noble lord did not insist on our extreme rights. He had listened to compromise; subsequently to 1835 he professed a readiness to divide the territory. The impression of those in America most favourable for a settlement was, that we might possibly allow an acquiescence in the award of the King of Holland ("the Dutchman's line"), but nothing beyond it: and if Lord Ashburton had attempted to take any other basis than this, he might as well have altogether abandoned the attempt at arrangement. As to advancing the boundary of the United States to certain heights in the neighbourhood of the St. Lawrence, we acted not hastily; we were most desirous that every boundary line should duly protect the interests of our North American provinces—which we were determined to defend with the whole power of the British Empire, so long as they manifested a sincere and honest desire to maintain the connection. We did, therefore (feeling it of the highest moment not to compromise their security), before entering into any communication with Lord Ashburton, consult many of the highest military authorities; among them, the gallant officer (Sir H. Douglas), whose ability and experience entitle his opinion to much respect, Sir James Kempt, Lord Seaton, Sir George Murray, and, I may add, the Duke of Wellington. We consulted all these distinguished officers as to the most desirable line of boundary in a military point of view. Our great object was to select, in preference to that part of the boundary awarded by the King of Holland, some boundary that should better countervail any possibility of dispute. And I apprehend that we succeeded. We have got more favourable terms by Lord Ashburton's boundary, so far as military security is concerned, than those which were given by the boundary of the King of Holland. We did deem it a great object to prevent the Americans from having the command of those heights which overlooked the St. Lawrence: but the King of Holland had given those heights to the United States; and I beg to tell the noble lord, who is the foremost to condemn this proposal, that the acquiescence in that alteration of boundary has been met by great objections in the United States, and that there are some in the United States who consider that very great sacrifices have been made by that government in giving up that part of the boundary which was awarded to the United States by the King of Holland. Now, how stands the extent of territory? The noble lord said in his despatch, that the division of territory by the King of Holland was in these proportions, three-fifths to the United States, and two-fifths only to Great Britain. The boundary of Lord Ashburton gives us a much larger extent of territory—that gives, I think, about seven-twelfths to the United States, and five-twelfths to Great Britain. Mr. Featherstonhaugh calculates the difference in point of acres, and makes it also very favourable to Great Britain; I do not exactly bear in mind what the proportions were, according to him, but I think that by the award of the King of Holland we had about 2,600,000 acres, and the Americans 4,500,000 acres, and that by the present division of territory we have about 3,400,000 acres, and the Americans about 3,700,000. So that if you take the extent of territory, the division made by Lord Ashburton is a little more in point of acres than that awarded by the King of Holland; and if you take the military frontier, the boundary of Lord Ashburton is more favourable than that of the King of Holland. The noble lord referred to certain dinners which took place at Boston and New York, and at which Lord Ashburton had been present; and says, that the conclusion of this treaty was a matter of the utmost congratulation and triumph to the United States. Why, Sir, there are senators in the United States who take exactly the same view of this adjustment, as bearing upon the interests of the United States, as the noble lord takes of it in its bearing upon our interests. It is curious to contrast the language of the noble lord with that of persons of great eminence and consideration in the United States, and I cannot give a more convincing proof of the difficulty which attended this question than by showing the discordant views of different persons with respect to it. A very eminent man in the United States, a man of great weight and influence in the senate—Mr. Benton, who voted against the treaty—in speaking of the concessions made by Mr. Webster—now, just contrast this with the language of the noble lord—Mr. Benton says,—“Such are the grants and concessions from Great Britain to the United States; few in number, small in value, nothing for her to yield, injurious to her to retain, and already ours as effectually without the treaty as with it. Except the restricted and compensated navigation of the lower St. John, all the rest was already ours—ours by the treaty of 1783, and by the fact that Great Britain wanted none of these slips, or islands, or points of land, with the encumbrance of their republican inhabitants, which she makes a merit of yielding to us. Not so with our grants to her. They are large and valuable—material for her to receive—dangerous and injurious for us to yield—and involving, not only territory, but natural boundaries; and admitting a foreign power within the limits which nature herself and the treaty of 1783 had prescribed for the frontier of an independent nation. And here I frankly accost the subject, and say, that if our negotiator, in forming a general treaty for all the states, and in settling all the subjects in dispute between the two countries, had yielded to the British Crown all that the award of the King of the Netherlands granted, I should have said not a word. But in transcending that award, which he himself opposed as yielding too much—in giving up more now than the British government demanded at the time of that award—in doing this, I find reasons for amazement and disapprobation. I am astonished at what I behold, and shall proceed to state the number and the magnitude of the sacrifices we have made, and demand from the friends of the negotiator the causes and the reasons for such extraordinary concessions."

That is the language of Mr. Benton; he thinks the honour of the United States is absolutely sacrificed by the treaty that was made with Lord Ashburton. Then, speaking of the arrangement that was made about the Caroline and Mr. M'Leod, in enabling the court of general authority of the United States to overrule the jurisdiction, with respect to a man committed by the States' court, Mr. Benton says:—"The infamous act—the habeas corpus against the States—squeamishly called the 'remedial justice act'—is now on the statute book, the original polluting our code of law, the copy lying at the footstool of the British Queen. And this is the point we have reached. In the short space of a year and a half the national character has been run down, from the pinnacle of honour to the abyss of disgrace. I limit myself now to the affair of M'Leod and the Caroline alone; and say that, in this business, exclusive of their disgraces, the national character has been brought to the lowest point of contempt. It required the Walpole administration, twenty-five long years of cowardly submission to France and Spain, to complete the degradation of Great Britain; our present rulers have completed the same work for their own country in the short space of eighteen months. And this is the state of our America—that America which Jackson and Van Buren left so proud!—that America which, with 3,000,000 of people, fought and worsted the British empire—with 7,000,000 fought it and worsted it again—and now, with 18,000,000, truckles to the British Queen, and invents all sorts of propitiatory apologies for her, when the most ample atonement is due to itself?"

These are the opinions of the Palmerston of America; and permit these extreme councillors to prevail, and you will soon have war between the two countries. But in this I confide—I confide in what I believe to be the vast preponderance of the influence of men in either country wishing and hoping for peace between them—I believe that the vast majority in America are actuated by a sincere desire for peace, and that they concur in the terms settled by Lord Ashburton. I believe that they are not prepared to act on the principles of the noble lord, on the one hand, or of Mr. Benton upon the other. The noble lord asks by implication, by the motion which he has made, the noble lord asks the House to condemn Lord Ashburton, and to disapprove of his treaty. I entreat all those, whatever their party connection may be—whatever their political opinions may be, providing that they do believe that delay in this matter was no longer possible—that delay was injurious to Britain, not merely by the want of a definite treaty, but by the danger in which uncertainty placed the maintenance of peace—I entreat all those not to follow the noble lord in his critical examination of minute details, but to take comprehensive views of the question, and declare by their language, by their speeches, by their votes, their satisfaction that the differences, with respect to this boundary, are adjusted on honourable and mutually conciliatory terms. Depend upon it no adjustment will be to our advantage which is not based upon conciliatory terms. If you have three professors to reinforce Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh, and if you force a boundary upon a reluctant people, you may be abstractedly in the right; but your prospect of continued peace would be lowering and gloomy, if a sullen assent were to be given on the part of the United States. I say, therefore, that a measure of adjustment was not the only object, it was necessary that that measure should be a satisfactory and conciliatory measure of adjustment. Why, we are not now minutely to criticise the treaty. Let us think how our North American provinces have been treated. It is their interests which have been principally compromised, if any have been compromised; but I do not believe that even that has been the case; or that British interests, with boundaries extending for nearly 3,000 miles, with millions on millions of acres of territory, have been compromised. Let us think of the value of these lands, and do not let us set up difficulties, do not let us even take into consideration the thousands, or (I am not inclined to underrate their value) the few millions of acres of extra territory. I don't undervalue the boundary of the Aroostook; but, a few thousands or millions of acres is nothing against the advantage of a permanent and satisfactory peace. And yet I would advise you to concede nothing inconsistent with your honour. I put out of the question the political aspect of affairs at the time this treaty was effected. I put out of consideration the political aspect of affairs at the time these disputes were settled. I do not ask you to look to the wars then being carried on in Afghanistan—to the wars being carried on in China—I do not ask you to look to the then state of our relations with France—I do not ask you to praise the treaty in connection with these circumstances—on the contrary, I believe that no dangers should ever induce you to make unjust and unwise arrangements. You are not entitled by any such considerations to sacrifice your North American colonies, and even if you had done so, I do not believe that your concessions would have laid the foundations of a lasting peace. You should do that which you believe to be wise and just; and make no undue concessions in order to preserve peace. Such concessions have a tendency to encourage the power to which they are made in its unjust demands; and I, therefore, place no stress on the position of affairs in other parts of the world at the time of the conclusion of the treaty. But, Sir, I say that that treaty was hailed with satisfaction by our North American colonies. The previous unsettled state of affairs had been felt as a grievous interruption to habits of honest industry—there had been no possibility of concluding sales of land—the uncertain position of affairs had interfered with business and industry; the inhabitants of our North American colonies gain much by the prospect of a continued peace. As far as public sentiment can be traced by the declarations of the public press, I find that nine-tenths of the newspapers published in these provinces are in favour of the treaty. The people, then, are not disturbed by those apprehensions of danger in the event of war, so long dwelt on by the noble lord. They are sensible that those eventual dangers which will be brought on them by allowing the approach of an American army within thirty miles of Quebec, were nothing compared to the hazards to be encountered were the question left unsettled. They thought all such fears as those insisted on by the noble lord, were subordinate considerations, and they rejoiced in the adjustment of the question. There is one more point on which I must touch before I sit down. The noble lord has spoken at great length of a map recently discovered. He seems to think that that map so discovered affords conclusive evidence of the justice of the British claims. Now, Sir, in the first place, let me observe to the noble lord, that cotemporary maps may be—when the words of the treaty referred to by them are in themselves doubtful—they may be evidence of the intentions of those who framed them, but the treaty must be executed according to the words contained in it. Even if the map were sustained by the parties, it could not contravene the words of the treaty; but the noble lord considers that a certain map which has been found in the archives of the foreign-office at Paris, is conclusive evidence of the justice of the British claims. Now, Sir, I am not prepared to acquiesce in any such assertion. Great blame has been thrown upon Mr. Webster with respect to this map. He has been charged with perfidy and want of good faith in not having at once disclosed to Lord Ashburton the fact of his possessing this map. Now, I must say that it is rather hard, when we know what are the practices of diplomatists and negotiators, I say it is rather hard to expect that the negotiator on the part of the United States, should be held bound to disclose to the diplomatist with whom he was in treaty all the weak parts of his case, and I think, therefore, that the reflection cast upon Mr. Webster—a gentleman of worth and honour—are, with respect to this matter, very unjust. This map was, it is true, found in the archives of the foreign office at Paris, and a letter of Dr. Franklin's has also been found, having reference to some map, but there is no direct connection between the map so found and the letter of Dr. Franklin. In general there is such a connection, as in the case of maps referred to in despatches; but there is none in this case. There is nothing to show that the map so found is the identical map referred to by Dr. Franklin in his letter; and nothing can be more fallacious than relying on such maps. For let me state what may be said upon the other side of the question with respect to maps. We made inquiry about those maps in the foreign-office at Paris, and we could find none such as that in question at first. We have not been so neglectful in former times with respect to the matter as the noble lord seems to think. We made inquiries, in 1826 and 1827, into the maps in the foreign office at Paris, for the purpose of throwing light upon the intentions of the negotiators of 1783. A strict search was made for any documents bearing in any shape upon the disputed question, but at that time neither letter nor map could be found. However, there were afterwards discovered, by a gentleman engaged in writing a history of America, a letter and a certain map, supposed by him to be the map referred to in the letter. In answer to our first inquiry, as I have already stated, no such map could be discovered. The first which we received from the foreign office at Paris, was a map framed in 1783, by Mr. Faden, geographer to the King of England. On that map is inscribed—"A map of the boundary of the United States, as agreed to by the treaty of 1783: by Mr. Faden, geographer to the King." Now, Sir, that map placed the boundary according to the American claim, yet it was a cotemporary map, and it was published by the geographer to the British King. There was a work, which I have here, a political periodical of the time, published in 1783, called Bewe's Journal. It gives a full report of the debate in parliament upon the treaty then being concluded, and, in order to illustrate the report, it also gives a map of the boundaries between the countries as then agreed to. That map, Sir, also adopts the line claimed by the United States. On subsequent inquiry, at Paris, we found a map, which must be the map referred to by Mr. Jared Sparkes. There is placed upon that map a broad red line, and that line marks out the boundary as claimed by the British. It is probably a map by M. D'Anville, of 1746, and there can be no doubt but that it is the map referred to by Mr. Jared Sparkes; but we can trace no indication of connection between it and the despatch of Dr. Franklin. To say that they were connected is a mere unfounded inference. But there is still another map. Here—in this country—in the library of the late King, was deposited a map by Mitchell, of the date 1753—that map was in the possession of the late King, and it was also in possession of the noble lord, but he did not communicate its contents to Mr. Webster. It was marked by a broad red line, and on that line is written "Boundary, as described by our negotiator, Mr. Oswald;" and that line follows the claim of the United States. That map was on an extended scale. It was in possession of the late King, who was particularly curious in respect to geographical inquiries. On that map, I repeat, is placed the boundary line—that claimed by the United States, and, on four different places on that line, "Boundary as described by Oswald." Now I do not say that that was the boundary ultimately settled by the negotiators; but nothing can be more fallacious than founding a claim upon cotemporary maps, unless you can also prove that they were adopted by the negotiators: and when the noble lord takes it for granted that if we had resorted to arbitration we should have been successful in obtaining our claims, I cannot help thinking that the matter would be open to much discussion. Indeed, I do not believe that that claim of Great Britain was well-founded; that it is a claim which the negotiators intended to ratify. I cannot say, either, that the inquiries which have been instituted since Mr. Sparkes's discovery have materially strengthened my conviction either way. I think they leave matters much as they were, and nothing, I think, can be more delusive than the expectation that, if the question were referred to arbitration—the decision would inevitably have been given in your favour, in consequence of the evidence of maps, which would not be regarded as maps recognized by the negotiators themselves. And then, Sir, with reference to the maps discovered subsequently to the conclusion of the negotiations conducted by Lord Ashburton. The noble lord opposite has stated that his predecessor in office had made all possible inquiry into the matter, and possessed all the elements of information connected with it. Lord Ashburton, then, had a right to draw the same conclusion. He had a right to presume that he was sent abroad in possession of all the elements of information on which a satisfactory conclusion could be come to, and therefore the subsequent discovery of the map in Paris, even if it could be positively connected with Dr. Franklin's despatch, would be no ground for the impeachment of the treaty of Lord Ashburton, or for proving that he had not ably and honourably discharged his duties. If blame should fall upon any one, it should fall upon those who have been conducting these negotiations for years. But I think that I have shown that no blame can be attached either to Lord Aberdeen or Mr. Canning; that they did what they could to search the archives of the foreign office at Paris for information connected with the subject. The documents lately discovered were not kept in the political department of the French foreign office, but in the historical department, and it was thus that while they had eluded former search they had come to be discovered by Mr. Jared Sparkes. Nothing must be said as impeaching the accuracy or good faith of that gentleman, but he himself admits that the map which he discovered could not be traced to have had any connection with the despatch of Dr. Franklin. I am not aware that there is any other point noticed by the noble lord to which I have omitted to refer. As I said before, I deeply regret that the noble lord should have brought forward such a motion as he has to-night proposed. Most willingly would I have consented to the production of additional papers on this subject, if I could have done so consistently with my sense of public duty. In consenting to a change in the line awarded by the King of Holland, as I have before stated, our chief object was to consult the security and the military defence of our North American colonies. I think it must be quite evident to the House that it would be inconsistent with my duty to present any correspondence bearing upon that subject. I should also decidedly object, in the case of a negotiation which has been brought to a successful result, to lay upon the table of the House all the confidential communications which may have passed between the executive government of this country and the individual by whom they were represented. I do not believe that there is any precedent which would warrant the production of papers of this nature under such circumstances. Where the endeavour to conclude a treaty has failed, and where it might be necessary to appeal to the House for its opinion, it might be justifiable to lay before the public the whole correspondence on the subject. My objection to produce the correspondence required by the noble lord does not arise from any mere consideration of the interests of the government. As I before stated, we adopt the conduct of Lord Ashburton—we approve his conduct, and we hold ourselves responsible for it. If, therefore, the noble lord should wish to move a direct vote of censure, without calling for further documents, he may involve the government in that censure; but, acting upon the principles on which men in office must act, I am bound to consider whether it be consistent with the public interests to produce the confidential communications between the government and their representative, Lord Ashburton; and I must state that I think the production of such correspondence would be most injurious to the public interests. It is, however, competent to the noble lord to press his motion to a division; but if the noble lord does adopt that course, it will be with a view of calling upon the House to mark its condemnation of the government for having sent Lord Ashburton to the United States to conclude this treaty, and to censure Lord Ashburton for the course which he has pursued. I do hope that the House will not lend itself, so far as Lord Ashburton is concerned, to such an act of injustice. That noble lord, following the course which he has uniformly pursued, influenced only by a desire to promote the public welfare, and to maintain peace between this country and the United States, sacrificed his own private convenience—his private ease—in order that he might undertake this mission. Lord Ashburton and Mr. Webster have both been the objects of condemnation in their respective countries. Lord Ashburton has been, in this country, the victim of anonymous calumnies; and I am confident that no hon. member of this House could have sanctioned those calumnies, who would have adopted any other course than that of proposing a direct motion of inculpation, calling upon the House to pronounce its censure on the conduct of a man so aspersed. The motion of to-night is in itself a complete vindication of, and triumph for Lord Ashburton. If a powerful party can bring forward no other motion reflecting upon the conduct of Lord Ashburton than—not a vote of censure—not a motion implying the slightest blame—but a mere proposal for the production of papers, which the author of the motion knows cannot be produced—I say that any vindication of Lord Ashburton is wholly unnecessary. The nature and character of the motion itself constitute the vindication and the triumph of Lord Ashburton. The noble lord is afraid to propose a vote implying censure, lest I should move an amendment, which would be carried by a vast majority, approving of the treaty, and of the conduct of Lord Ashburton. The private character of Lord Ashburton—much as I regard that noble lord—is to me a matter of comparative unimportance, compared with the public interests which are involved in the decision which the House may adopt upon this motion. The decision of to-night, if to-night a decision is come to, will involve the opinion of the House as to the adjustment of the differences between this country and America. I do not mean to say that all the subjects of difference between the United States and this country have been adjusted by this treaty but I speak of those peculiar differences which caused considerable exasperation in both countries, and which afforded reason for apprehending the disturbance of tranquillity. If you are desirous for the maintenance of peace—if you believe that this negotiation has contributed to lay the foundation of peace—then I call upon you not to be misled by a plausible motion calling for further papers to imply a doubtful and equivocal opinion; but if, upon the whole, you are satisfied that the conduct of the government and of its representative, Lord Ashburton, has been influenced by pure motives—that it has been wise and just—that it has contributed to lay the foundation of a better understanding with the United States—then I do intreat you, whatever be your party differences from us, whatever be your political principles, to mark your opinion in favour of peace by negating the motion of the noble lord.

Debate adjourned.

SUPPRESSION OF THE OPIUM TRADE.

APRIL 4, 1843.

Lord Ashley having presented several petitions on the subject of the opium trade with China, praying that the House would adopt effectual measures for its abolition, concluded a powerful and impressive speech by moving a resolution to the effect, that on account of the injurious tendency of the trade to our manufacturing interests, and its utter inconsistency with the honour and duties of a Christian kingdom, steps be taken, as soon as possible, with due regard to the rights of government and individuals, to abolish the evil.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was surprised at the conclusion to which his hon. friend (Sir R. Inglis), and his noble friend the member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) had come, with reference to this resolution. Here was a matter of the greatest delicacy and importance, involving a revenue of £1,200,000, when the revenue of India is in a state requiring the utmost care, and his hon. friend and his noble friend called on the House to adopt a resolution which would injure the revenue to the extent he had stated, and compel the cultivators of the soil to give up another portion of their scanty earnings. In a matter of this delicacy he could not help expressing his surprise at the admission of his noble friend, who said that the resolution should be modified, and that parts of it required consideration, and should be amended. His hon. friend who spoke last, said that there was now an able negotiator at the court of China, and who, it was possible, might by his exertions do much to modify the evils of the trade. Now, how did his hon. friend know that some such beneficial results were not in the course of being brought about, through the exertions of this able negotiator? If such negotiations were pending, and if there was a chance of changing the feelings of the Chinese government on the subject, so that some amicable arrangement could be effected, was it not unwise to interfere by adopting a course like the present? Might they not defeat the object which the negotiator had in view? This resolution prohibited the growth of opium, and supposing that the Chinese government heard of this resolution, the hopes that might otherwise be entertained that, by diplomatic means, the object in view would be obtained, would be entirely at an end. If there was one thing more important than another, for the House of Commons to maintain its weight and authority in the country, it was that it should weigh well the resolutions to which it came. A resolution was not like a bill, for one vote decided the matter; and there was no opportunity of reconsidering it, as there were various stages at which a bill could be thrown out. Ought the House, then, after the admissions of his noble friend, and his hon. friend, to come to a vote of this kind to-night, which would at once decide the matter? Why not rather adopt the other course which had been proposed, and declare that the House was not in such a state, as regarded their then knowledge of the subject, as to enable them to vote on a resolution which they were told by its supporters required amendment? But what was the resolution of his noble friend, of whose motives he spoke with the utmost respect, doing justice to the humanity which induced him to bring the subject forward, and also to the ability which his noble friend had displayed on the occasion; but he knew his noble friend too well not to know that he was willing that his resolution should be canvassed with the utmost freedom. What was his noble friend's resolution? "That it was the opinion of the House of Commons, that the continuance of the trade in opium, and the monopoly of its growth in the territories of British India, is destructive of all relations of amity between England and China."

This was the first part of the resolution, and it excluded any possibility of legalizing the trade in opium. But it was also impossible entirely to interdict the trade; for opium, besides being produced in our Indian possessions, could be obtained from Turkey or from Manilla, or British capital would be engaged in cultivating it in the state of Malwa and other places. Would the House aver, that the "continuance of the trade in opium is destructive of all amicable relations? and at the same time decide, that the monopoly of the growth in the hands of the East India Company is unwise? There were two questions to be considered; one, whether you will vote, that if this country should sanction the illegal trade in opium, that would be contrary to the wishes of the Chinese government; and another, perfectly distinct from this,—whether by this resolution, you can prevent the growth of the vegetable in our possessions in India. He would show why it was better to postpone their coming to a decision on the subject. The matter had not only occupied a considerable share of attention from the present government, but also from the late administration. The late government instructed Sir H. Pottinger to communicate with the Chinese government on the subject. Now, had Sir H. Pottinger acted at all in a spirit favourable to the opium trade? Did not Sir H. Pottinger, on a recent occasion, almost stand alone, while he had to confront the displeasure of powerful parties in China, in consequence of the part which he took in condemnation of that traffic? Sir Henry Pottinger had been instructed to make a respectful application to the Chinese government on the subject, and to show them the impolicy of endeavouring entirely to interdict the trade. He was instructed to show in how many countries this vegetable could be produced, and to point out the great extent of the coast of China, and the almost impossibility of putting down the smuggling trade in opium; and he was directed to point out the tranquillising effect in one respect, and the advantages that might be obtained from it as an article of revenue, if the Chinese government would look at the question in the same way as European governments regarded questions of this kind—namely, getting rid of smuggling by legalising the trade, and imposing a duty on the import. This was a matter of such importance, that he was sure the House would excuse him for reading a portion of the instructions that had been sent out by the present government to Sir Henry Pottinger, to guide him as to the course that he was to pursue. He referred to this extract from the instructions to Sir Henry Pottinger, for the purpose of proving to the House, that her Majesty's government was not indifferent to the question, but was fully aware of its importance, as well regarding the interests as the honour of this country; and also to show that it condemned the principle of British subjects, with immense capital, engaging in a traffic against the municipal laws of the Chinese. The instructions were written by Lord Aberdeen to Sir H. Pottinger, and were dated 29th of December, 1842. The extract, which he would read, was as follows:—"Whatever may be the result of your endeavours to prevail upon the Chinese government to legalise the sale of opium, it will be right that her Majesty's servants in China should hold themselves aloof from all connection with so discreditable a traffic. The British merchant, who may be a smuggler, must receive no protection or support in the prosecution of his illegal sale; and he must be made aware, that he will have to take the consequences of his own conduct. Her Majesty's government have not the power to put a stop to this trade on the part of the British smuggler; but they may impede it in some degree by preventing Hong Kong and its waters from being used as a point by the British smuggler, as a starting point for his illegal acts. That is to say, when Hong Kong is ceded—until that, the smuggling of opium cannot be prohibited there; but as soon as it is ceded, you will have power to prevent the importation of opium into Hong Kong, for the purpose of exportation into China."

Did not that prove, that this important question had not escaped the attention of her Majesty's government; and such being the case, was not the course marked out in the instruction he had just referred to, a much wiser course than that proposed in the resolution? If they adopted it, the chances would be, that the negotiations of the able man to whom his hon. friend had alluded would be put a stop to; he therefore urged upon his noble friend the propriety of leaving the matter in the hands of her Majesty's government, so that the object which his noble friend so anxiously had in view should not be defeated. So much for the illegal traffic in this article. Now, with regard to the other question, whether it were politic or just for the House of Commons to attempt to interdict the growth of a certain vegetable by the people of India, within the territory of the East India Company? He was afraid, that a very erroneous construction would be put upon the motion of his noble friend. He was sure that his noble friend's intention was a just and a good one; but when he was called upon to interdict the growth of opium, in order to benefit the manufacturers of this country, he became doubly unwilling to sanction this resolution; first of all, because upon that ground it was assumed, that the growth of this vegetable ought not to continue, and secondly, it was most unwise that we should undertake—because persons in another country abused the use of it; because they had not a sufficient control over their own appetites; because, by their own good sense, they could not abstain from the use of the vegetable, it was most unwise that, therefore, the English government should resort to the extreme step of preventing the growth of it altogether in their possessions in the East. He thought, that it had been shown in the course of the debate, that there could be no control over the growing of opium beyond the British provinces. In the state of Malwa there was in one year produced 10,000 chests, and if we chose to attempt to control the growth there, we could have no security that British capital would not be taken to other spots, where the climate and soil were favourable to its growth. This was not a question, however, of absolute prohibition—we could not prohibit the growth. The question was, whether it would not be better to attempt its regulation? If they could not interdict the growth, the question they had to decide was, whether opium should be grown under the regulations of a monopoly, or under free trade? He implored the House to act with great caution in this matter. If it were a question merely affecting the commercial interests of this country, he would ask the House to come to no hasty decision, but to weigh calmly all the points connected with the subject; of how much greater importance was that when the interest of so large a country and so great a body of people was at stake? If you abolish monopoly altogether, and substitute in its place free trade, the House could not anticipate the evils which may arise to India itself. With regard to this question, he would refer to the opinion of Lord Cornwallis. What does his lordship say on the point? Lord Cornwallis had many opportunities of studying and watching the interests of the great country committed to his charge. When examined in 1786 by the East India Company with reference to a free-trade in opium, his lordship said, that he was opposed abstractedly to all descriptions of monopoly. He had maturely and deliberately considered the question, and he must confess that he saw the great advantages which resulted from keeping the opium trade in the hands of the government. He expressed an opinion decidedly in favour of monopoly. Lord Cornwallis thought it was necessary in order to protect and preserve the public interest. He would refer the House to another authority, the opinion of Mr. Mill, the historian of British India. That gentleman, a man of great talent, and whose opinion certainly ought to carry great weight on a question of this character, took the same view of the matter. Mr. Mill was in favour of monopoly. He considered a free-trade in opium would lead to great abuse of the opium trade in India. Mr. Flemming also expressed a similar opinion in favour of monopoly and against free-trade. If that House consulted all the authorities on the point, it would be found that a monopoly of the trade of opium was considered preferable to that of free-trade. He did not ask the House to enter upon a consideration of this question with the view to its settlement this night. He asked the House to vote for the previous question, and not for the abstract resolution of his hon. friend. How was it possible that they could affirm this resolution with the imperfect information which the House possessed on the subject? They were going to affirm a resolution in defiance of the opinion of Lord Cornwallis, in defiance of the statement of Mr. Mill, that monopoly ought not to be abolished, that it was necessary for the well-being of that country that a free trade in that drug should not be established. Opium was an article of agricultural produce. He considered it very questionable whether the House had a right to limit its growth, in order to introduce into China, with much greater advantage, the produce of British manufactures. What has been our policy with regard to that country? India had a flourishing cotton manufacture; that, this country had destroyed. India is in a different position from what you found her. If you destroyed her manufacture of cotton, you left her in undisturbed possession of her agriculture. If the traffic in opium could be legalized, it would be most unjust, if, for the purpose of opening a market for the British manufactures, you adopt measures which must inevitably have the effect of destroying the agriculture of India. Are hon. members so very sensitive on the subject of opium? Did we not derive a large revenue from tobacco; a revenue to the amount of £3,400,000 on the tobacco smoked and chewed, to excite and stimulate us. [An hon. member: And compose us.] And this in addition to a duty on gin, spirits, brandy, and wine, luxuries which men who had no command over their appetites could and did abuse. We who raised £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 by the duty on barley alone, and £3,400,000 on a weed which many considered most noxious, would yet interdict the growth of opium in India in order to preserve the morals and take care of the health of the Chinese. The Ryots were very glad to grow opium, because, according to Lord Cornwallis, there was a degree of protection derived from it against undue and unauthorised exaction, which was not the case with other commodities; and, moreover, the cultivation of indigo and opium was healthful to the inhabitants. Was it for the House to say to the people of India "we will prohibit the cultivation by you of that part of your agricultural produce which is most safe, most profitable, and most healthy," and to do this in order to substitute the cotton manufacture of this country, in making which we employed a child for twelve or fourteen hours a day. He did say that it was not quite fair, after we had destroyed the cotton trade of India by the superior cheapness of our own, to destroy also its chief agricultural produce. It was absolutely necessary to consider this question with great caution in the present state of India, in the present state of the labouring population, and in the present state of the revenue; seeing that if that revenue were deficient, additional sums must be derived from direct taxation which would fall upon labour and be paid out of the produce of the soil. His noble friend said, that £1,000,000, or £1,200,000 a-year was a small amount; but they might depend upon it that the revenue in India was a matter of the utmost importance, and that they could not diminish the revenue by one million without engendering the necessity for fresh taxation, which must fall on the labouring population of that country; and unless they were perfectly clear as to the justice of the change they were about to make, they ought not to subject to additional burthens those who were already taxed to the utmost advisable extent. The resolution declared:—"That the continuance of the trade in opium and the monopoly of its growth in the territories of British India is destructive of all relations of amity between England and China; . . . and that steps be taken as soon as possible, with due regard to the rights of government and individuals, to abolish the evil."

They might depend upon it that it was not by the summary course, even if they could abolish the trade, that they could effect this abolition safely. He would not at that late hour of the night, enter into any further discussion; he trusted he had said enough to induce the House to believe that her Majesty's government were not negligent in this matter, that it would be unwise to pass this resolution on a single night's debate, that its terms were too decisive and emphatic, and that, upon the whole, the best course would be to leave the subject to her Majesty's government, for their cautious consideration. He did not ask the House to reject the resolution; he did not ask them to negative it; but, in the present state of the revenue of India, he only asked the House to leave the subject where it ought to be left, in the hands of her Majesty's ministers.

Lord Ashley ultimately withdrew his motion.

SUPPLY—BRITISH MUSEUM.

APRIL 7, 1843.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in proposing the annual vote for the British Museum, said, that as there were such ample details with respect to it in a paper which had been laid on the table, it would not be necessary for him to go into any lengthened explanation. The estimate was £2,640 more than that of last year. The chief of this increase was £1,500 for the completion of the collection of English scientific works in the library. Another addition was an increase of £450 for binding books. He was happy to state, that there had been a great increase in the number of visitors during the last year. In 1841, the number of visitors was 319,000, while last year the number had increased to 547,000, showing an increase of 220,000 in one year. He thought that after this it was unnecessary for him to say one word more in recommendation of the vote. He should, therefore, propose that the sum of £32,576 be granted for the establishment of the British Museum, for the year ending April 5, 1843.

In reply to Mr. Hume, who objected to the constitution of the trustees of the institution, and thought that the superintendence of this establishment should be placed under some responsible officer of the government,—

Sir Robert Peel said, the hon. gentleman had stated that the government had no control at the board of trustees of the British Museum, whereas six members of the cabinet were ex officio trustees. So far, too, from their having no influence, the first lord of the treasury had always a very great influence, as it must be with his sanction that the vote was proposed; and he would venture to say that any reasonable suggestion as to the management of the Museum made by the first lord of the treasury would be attended to by the trustees. The hon. gentleman stated that formerly only seventy-five persons were admitted to the Museum each open day in the course of a week, whereas at the present time not less than 30,000 had been admitted in a single day. Did not this circumstance prove that the trustees of the Museum were anxious to afford every facility for the access of the public? In the year 1840, the number of visitors was 247,000; in 1841, it was 319,000; and last year the number had increased to 547,000. If, then, the hon. member would contrast the present management with that which obtained formerly, he would find that there was every desire to afford accommodation to the public. Again, in the year 1810, the number of visits made to the reading-rooms for the purposes of study was 1,950; in 1815 the number was 4,300, but last year the number was 71,000. It was to him most gratifying to find the large number of persons that passed through the Museum without any circumstance occurring that could reflect even the slightest discredit on them. The orderly and decent conduct of the visitors to the Museum, even on the most crowded days, must afford the utmost gratification to every reflecting mind. The habit of order inculcated by visiting this institution in this way must have a great moral effect, and this was produced in addition to the gratifying the curiosity of the people. With respect to the admission of young children to the Museum, he would only observe, that they might be exposed to inconvenience and some risk in a crowded day; for instance, on any occasion when 30,000 persons passed through the Museum. So far, also, from the trustees not being willing to adopt the recommendation of the committee, he would observe, that they were gradually doing so; and in the present year they had made arrangements to carry out the recommendations of the committee with regard to the synopsis. Again, the public were greatly indebted to the enterprise of Mr. Fellowes for a most valuable addition to the contents of the Museum, in the shape of the Xanthian sculptures; and the trustees of the Museum were about to send out that gentleman again to Asia Minor, to endeavour to obtain an additional number of these valuable remains of antiquity. * * * * The conduct of the hon. member for Montrose, in printing a cheap catalogue of the National Gallery, was in the highest degree creditable to him; and there was not one word which the hon. gentleman had said as to the cathedrals in which he did not entirely concur. He believed that access might be given to these edifices to the mass of the people with the most perfect safety, and that nothing but good could result from such access being freely afforded; even if any additional precautions were considered necessary in the first instance, he could conceive no better way in which a portion of the revenues of chapters could be expended. It would be but a very small portion. Since the last discussion on this subject, the House was aware that a vacancy had occurred in the deanery of Westminster. He had filled up that vacancy with a gentleman, of whom he knew nothing personally, but who was recommended to him by his high professional and personal character; and in speaking with this reverend gentleman, Dr. Turton, on the subject, he had expressly told him that he could not give him a more satisfactory proof of any gratitude he might feel for the distinction which had been conferred upon him, than the exercising all the influence he should have, as dean, in procuring for the public free admission to the abbey. Dr. Turton had expressed his entire sympathy with him on this subject, and he had every reason to believe that the rev. gentleman would actively co-operate with him in carrying out this most desirable object.

Vote agreed to.

IMPORT DUTIES—COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

APRIL 25, 1843.

In the debate on Mr. Ricardo's motion, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion of the House, that it is not expedient that any contemplated remission of import duties be postponed, with a view of making such remission a basis of commercial negotiation with foreign countries"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said: Unless I misunderstood the hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Villiers), he made a statement which was gratifying to me to hear, and which I hardly expected to come from that quarter. For the hon. gentleman stated that some four or five years ago there had been a great export of bullion from this country that greatly inconvenienced and deranged the currency, in consequence of a sudden demand for foreign corn, and the inability of exchanging British manufactures for that article, but that within the last two or three years a great change had taken place in that respect—that there had been no sudden demand for foreign corn, but that there had been a ready demand for British manufactures, and that foreign corn had been imported into this country in a regular way, and in the ordinary manner of commercial intercourse. And the hon. gentleman said, that this regular interchange of British manufactures for foreign corn, of late years, had prevented that large demand for bullion which was apprehended by my hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury. Now, I well remember that one of the prophecies of the inevitable consequences of maintaining the sliding-scale, as it is called, used to be, that there must be at intervals a sudden demand for foreign corn, which it would be impossible to pay for by the exportation of British manufactures. I think the hon. gentleman said, that that prophecy had not been fulfilled, but that there had been a regular interchange of British manufactures for foreign corn, and that though a large quantity of corn was imported in the month of August last—to between two and three millions of quarters—yet no apprehension was felt that it would derange our monetary system. That was the statement which the hon. gentleman made, and coming from such high and unquestionable authority upon such a point, I heard it with a very great deal of pleasure. I do not intend to trouble the House with many observations on the present occasion. I well know the peculiar difficulty under which I at this time speak on the subject, considering that on next Monday week my right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, intends to submit the usual financial statement to the House. There being only ten days to elapse before that discussion takes place, in which a full consideration of every subject connected with the fiscal arrangements of the country must necessarily be entered upon, I feel how very inconvenient it would be were I to allow myself to go into a discussion of details at the present moment. I apprehend that the main and single question before the House is this; "is it wise on the part of the House of Commons, by an abstract resolution, to declare that you shall not seek for any reduction of the import duties on your own manufactures into foreign countries in consequence of, and as an equivalent for, any reduction of duties imposed by you on the importation into this country of the produce of those countries, but that we shall fetter the discretion for all time to come of the executive government, and lay down to-night, after a debate of three or four hours, this important principle—that you shall not attempt by commercial negotiation to procure any reduction of the import duties imposed by foreign countries upon your own manufactures, and that when you are considering the policy of any reduction of duties on foreign produce into this country, you shall not endeavour to obtain a corresponding reduction of duties imposed on your own articles of produce, and that even if negotiations for forming commercial treaties are now pending, whereby you hope to obtain certain reciprocal advantages, yet you shall (for, by the resolution now proposed, if carried, you will be bound to,) relinquish all those advantages, and to tell the country with which you are negotiating, that it is not necessary for them to give you an equivalent in return for that which you are about to concede to them, for that you do not look for any corresponding advantages.” I need hardly say that I am the last man to maintain the principle directly opposite to the one involved in such a declaration. I think I gave a sufficient proof of this in the tariff of last year. I then declared that I considered that our domestic interests, in all these arrangements, were of primary consideration. I laid down the principle, that it would not be wise in us to punish ourselves, because other countries refused to adopt similar arrangements as to their import duties. These principles I laid down last year, and I adhere to them still. But it is quite a different thing to propound principles when you are applying them to practical details, to that of laying them down merely in the shape of abstract propositions. Consider the many questions there are to be taken into account before you can apply such a principle. There is the state of the revenue—the comparative claims which different articles of commerce, to which taxation applies, have upon you. Even admitting the principle that all taxation is an evil, and supposing you are only determined by the state of the revenue, and by the obligation of providing for the interest of the national debt, and of the necessary annual expenditure, still these constitute such demands upon you as to make the power of reducing taxation necessarily very limited. But the difficulty is enhanced when you have present to your consideration the comparative claims of different articles on which the reduction is to be made. Shall you take the raw article—shall you take some great article of consumption—or shall you take an article of luxury? Then, again, what chance have you of preventing the duty being evaded by smuggling; and what will be the expense of protecting the revenue? Surely all these are important questions applying to each separate article of trade. Then, with reference to vested interests, as the noble lord said, there are the respective claims of the colonial interests, and of the interests of foreign countries. All these are matters deserving the utmost consideration when you come to deal with details, and are not to be disposed of by an abstract principle embodied in a resolution of the House of Commons. I was surprised to hear the noble lord (Lord John Russell) say, that he was disposed to support the present motion. Why the noble lord has been for ten years trying to make commercial treaties. He has even boasted of some success in his efforts. When I said, last year, that we were engaged in making commercial treaties, up got the noble lord, and also the noble lord, the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and exclaimed, “What credit do you deserve for that? You know that we commenced the work, and have prepared the way.” But now the noble lord says, that unless I give him some assurance, which he knows I cannot give him, he is disposed to support the resolution now proposed to the House. In the Import Duties’ committee Mr. Porter was examined, and he was asked,—“Are you at the head of the statistical department of the Board of Trade?” He answered, “I am.” “How long have you been connected with that institution?” “From its first establishment in 1832.” “Have you been engaged in effecting a commercial treaty between this country and France?” The answer was, “I have.”

Now, we found these negotiations pending. They had been suspended in consequence of the affairs which had occurred in Syria. We resumed these negotiations, but now, to-night, by a sudden resolution, we are to forego every advantage, and proclaim to France, “we contemplate making reductions in the duties upon articles of your production; but you are distinctly to understand that we look for no return from you." That, I think, in the present state of this country, is a piece of superfluous liberality which the House ought not to sanction. In the course of this very year, I heard the noble lord publicly declare it to be his opinion that nothing could be more essential to the permanent interest of this country than to make good commercial arrangements with the United States. I myself heard the noble lord declare that, "of all the commercial arrangements which this country could enter into, that which would be most essentially beneficial would be a good tariff with the United States." Is the noble lord, then, now prepared to consent to the proposition of his hon. friend, and to proclaim to the United States that we looked for no equivalent from them for any reduction we might make in our import duties on their produce? It is true the noble lord endeavours to break the fall by saying that if I will give him some assurance, he will not support the resolution. But what assurance can I give him some eight or nine days before the discussion on the budget? Will the noble lord specify any particular tax which I could propose to reduce? The noble lord knows that I must decline to enter into any discussion of details. I state now, as I stated last year, that I think our own interests ought to be the first consideration. If a duty cannot be levied, in consequence of its producing a system of smuggling, the prevention of which would be a greater expense than the revenue to be raised, and if that, united with the monstrous evils produced by the immoral practice of smuggling, by which we not only lose the revenue, but corrupt the manners and habits of the people—am I to say that I will maintain that duty permanently, because no other country will reduce its duties on our produce? By no means. But let us not lay down general principles in the abstract; let us reserve them for the particular cases in which they are to be practically adopted. Take, for example, our commercial arrangements with Portugal and France. I do not regard our commercial relations with Portugal in a merely pecuniary point of view; I think it of great political importance that we should strengthen the bonds of amity between that country and this, by means of an intimate commercial intercourse. In the same manner I look upon our commercial connection with France. I should not estimate the advantage of an extended commercial intercourse with France merely in respect to the amount of pecuniary gain that may result from it; but I value that intercourse on account of the effect it is calculated to produce in softening down prejudices between the people of the two countries, and in promoting the feeling of amity and good will between two great nations. I should regard that mutual intercourse in commercial affairs as giving an additional security for the permanent maintenance of peace. Let us suppose the case of a duty on an article in respect to which there is no danger from smuggling, but the revenue on which can be easily collected—an article of luxury—is it not perfectly open for me to consider whether I shall reduce the duty for the purpose of obtaining some reciprocal advantage for British manufactures? I do not consider our commercial relations with any country as a mere question of a balance of trade, I do not look upon any supposed balance against us a measure of loss. If, for example, we import from Russia the produce of that country to the amount of £5,000,000 a-year, and we export to Russia only £1,200,000 a-year, making a difference of £3,800,000 in the amount of our imports from Russia over our exports to that country, no doubt no fallacy could be so complete, no mistake so absurd, as to assume that this country sustained a loss to the extent of the £3,800,000, because that amount must necessarily be made up by our trading with some third country. That I quite admit; but while I do so, surely I may contend that a direct is more beneficial than an indirect intercourse. Surely it is better for this country to have a direct intercourse with France and with Portugal, even independently of the political advantages which must arise, by having the bonds of friendship more firmly linked together, than that we should pay our debts to France, or that she should pay her debts to us, by means of a trade with a third country—Portugal. Does the hon. gentleman mean to contend for this principle—that any remission of duty which is desirable for us in regard to our own domestic interests, ought not to be postponed with a view of producing a reduction of duty in other countries on articles of British manufacture? That, I apprehend, is the principle which the hon. gentleman maintains. Now, even if that principle were sound, I should doubt the policy of proclaiming it. Depend upon it, we have prejudices enough to contend with in other countries, without throwing away any advantages by a gratuitous declaration of a principle like this. The noble lord says, "Suppose a taste for British manufactures arises, can foreign governments control it? and can they prevent its being gratified by any duty they may impose?" That may be very true; but how can you best encourage that taste? Take Portugal for instance. How will you be most likely to beget a taste for British manufactures in Portugal? Is it not by directly introducing our cottons and woollens into Portugal? And if, by reducing the duty on port wine imported into this country, I can induce Portugal to reduce the duties on our cottons and hardware imported into her markets—if I can introduce our cottons into Portugal, and they take the taste of the people, the value of having them at a cheap rate would soon be appreciated, and will not that be an advantage to the manufactures of this country? The reduction in the duty on port wine may be a good thing in itself; but if, by a treaty with Portugal, we can not only have that reduction but also secure the reduction of duties on the importation of our manufactures in Portugal, is it not better to obtain the double reduction of duty than the single reduction? The hon. gentleman, however, by his resolution, would prevent the executive government from obtaining any such advantage. The noble lord (Viscount Howick) does certainly push the doctrines of free-trade to an extravagant length; it is to him a matter of entire indifference how high the duties are which foreign countries impose upon our articles—"If we import," says the noble lord, "we must pay somehow or other." Now, that doctrine of the noble lord, and also his other position, that this resolution would have the effect of depriving the foreign-office of the temptation of writing nine-tenths of the useless correspondence which it now produces, are the grounds upon which he will vote for this motion; and although he may think the tendency of this motion to diminish the labour of the foreign-office is a very good thing, it is hardly a sufficient reason for supporting the resolution of the hon. gentleman. Then, says the noble lord the member for London, "I will prove the advantage of a diminution of your import duties, independent of the conduct of other countries, from a reference to the article of brandy;" and then he stated that the exports of brandy from France in a certain year amounted to a certain quantity, and the imports of brandy into England for the same period amounted to 1,200,000 gallons less; and it was quite clear, therefore, he said, that there must have been an enormous quantity of smuggling; but, unfortunately for the noble lord, the facts are exactly the other way. In the year 1834, the exports of brandy from France were 1,744,000 gallons, and therefore, according to the noble lord's statement, the imports into England in that year ought to have been only 547,000 gallons; but, in fact, the imports into England were three millions of gallons, showing apparently an excess over the whole quantity exported, and so as to every year downwards since 1834. Do I therefore contend that there has been no smuggling? Not at all; it only proves that the noble lord's argument is without foundation, and the records of the French custom-house are not to be depended on. But the terms of the resolution itself, are not such as I can concur in. The hon. mover does not say "Let your own domestic interests alone be regarded;" but nine or ten days before the budget is to be produced he calls upon the House to adopt this resolution:—"That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion of this House, that it is not expedient that any contemplated remission of import duties be postponed, with the view of making such remission a basis of commercial negotiations with foreign countries."

"Contemplated remission!" Contemplated by whom? The hon. gentleman has heard that it was in contemplation to reduce the duties on port wine; we contemplated that reduction in the hope that Portugal would reduce her duties on our hardware, cottons, and woollens. Now, there is the hon. member for Sheffield—does he, would his constituents, think it no object to get our hardware freely admitted into Portugal? Even supposing it to be wise to reduce the duties on port wine without any equivalent, is it not, I ask, a perfectly legitimate object to say to Portugal, "We are going to reduce our duties on port wine, there is no absolute necessity for it, but do you, Portugal, take a corresponding course with reference to our hardware, cotton, and woollen goods. Accustom your population to the use of British manufactures, and then we shall feel confident that the advantage, as it will be mutual, will be permanent." Then we may be sure that the taste for our manufactures will be encouraged, and that the Portuguese would soon seek for freer access to our markets. But the hon. gentleman tells me I am not, even if I can, to obtain this advantage: "You must not postpone (he says) even for a month, any contemplated remission of duties, though that remission were only contemplated in the hope of getting an equivalent."

Supposing the reduction of the duties on port wine could be effected with advantage to this country, does it necessarily follow, because we contemplated the reduction of the duty on port wine in the hope of obtaining an equivalent, that when that expectation has been disappointed, port wine ought still to have the preference over all other articles? Suppose we could afford to run the risk of losing £300,000 or £400,000 of revenue, ought port wine to be the article selected for the benefit of that remission? Might it not be a question whether the duty on wool ought not to be remitted instead; and, if we contemplate a remission of that duty, why should we give the duty on port wine the preference? I advise the House to reserve to itself the power of applying sound principles to particular cases, as they arise. When any proposition for the remission of any duty is submitted to the House by her Majesty's government, every individual member will have the opportunity of opposing that proposition, of making a counter proposal, and of urging the claim of one particular article in preference to that of another; and that I think would be a much wiser course, one much less likely to involve the House in embarrassment and difficulty, than to proclaim an abstract principle as a matter of commercial negotiation, about which even the warmest free-traders widely differ; for since I came into the House I have read a postscript of a letter, addressed to me by a gentleman, a zealous free-trader, whose authority cannot well be disputed on the other side of the House. I see hon. gentlemen opposite turn away from Colonel Torrens now, as a gentleman of no authority at all—but I refer to his opinion for the purpose of showing that upon this subject even strenuous advocates of free-trade are not united. Colonel Torrens says:—"I would beg to submit for your consideration, what appears to me to amount to a mathematical demonstration, that a reduction of the duties upon foreign productions, unaccompanied by a corresponding mitigation of the duties imposed by foreign countries upon British goods, would cause a further decline of prices, of profits, and of wages; and would render it doubtful whether the taxes could be collected, and faith with the public creditor maintained."

Colonel Torrens calls, too, in aid of his opinions other high authority; and he names one, for whom, whatever may be the connection of the hon. member opposite with him, he cannot feel greater respect than I do—Mr. Ricardo, in whose chapter on trade the doctrine is involved. He says also, that the same doctrines have been established by Mr. Senior and Mr. Pennington—whom Col. Torrens calls one of the most profound thinkers of the day. If, then, these differences of opinion exist—if these are speculative doctrines upon which even free-traders are not agreed—I hope the House of Commons will not make itself a party to an abstract resolution embodying these views without much more mature consideration; and I hope, therefore, the House will negative the motion of the hon. gentleman. I repeat what I have already stated, that in my estimation, our own interests are the main consideration in the reduction of duties, but I doubt whether our interests would be best promoted by granting, without reference to other considerations, a free admission for foreign productions; at all events, I trust that the House will avoid a course which my political experience has taught me is always attended with embarrassment—that of laying down an abstract principle to be the guide of the government in matters of so much delicacy and difficulty as commercial negotiations.

The House divided: Ayes, 61; Noes, 135; majority against the motion, 74.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—LORD ASHBURTON.

MAY 2, 1843.

Mr. Hume proposed a resolution, conveying the thanks of the House to Lord Ashburton, for the manner in which he had conducted the negotiations which led to the recent treaty with the United States for the settlement of the north-eastern boundary question, and other matters in dispute between the two countries.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, when this question was previously under discussion, I had an opportunity of entering so fully into the subject of the negotiations which were begun and brought to a successful close by Lord Ashburton, that I shall feel myself relieved from the necessity of now going at length into the subject. The noble lord who spoke last has made the important admission, that when the result of these negotiations first became generally known, there was in this country one feeling of almost universal satisfaction. I apprehend that satisfaction would not have been felt, if any undue or discreditable concessions had been made by the government. It is the character of the British people to be more ready to resent an affront than to tolerate undue acquiescence. But what the noble lord says is perfectly true. The feeling of satisfaction at the termination of the long protracted discussions between the two countries was almost universal, and it afforded, as I conceive, the strongest possible testimony of the merits of the negotiation. The people of England concur in the sentiments expressed by the noble lord towards the latter part of his speech, deprecating the commencement of hostilities with the country which had set the example of independence—they deprecate war and carnage with a country united to ours by a community of origin, a community of language, and a community of religion; and I believe that the noble lord will now find it a difficult task to persuade the people that they ought not at this time to be satisfied with an arrangement in which, on its first announcement, they were ready and willing to concur. The noble lord says, and he says correctly, that the vote now proposed to this House is not strictly in conformity with precedents. For that reason I have declined to move the vote of thanks to Sir Henry Pottinger, of which the noble lord has given notice for this night. Although I fully admit all the noble lord can urge—although I fully agree that the greatest prudence, the greatest judgment, and the greatest moderation, have been shown by that gallant officer in the conduct of the negotiations entrusted to him; and although government has manifested its confidence in that distinguished person, by requesting him to remain in his present station, yet, because I felt that it would be contrary to precedent, for a minister of the Crown to move such a vote of thanks, I have refrained from submitting to the House the motion the noble lord intends to propose. But I will ask the noble lord this question. Was there ever an instance in which three statesmen whose opinions are entitled to such respect as those of the noble lord who has just spoken, the noble lord, the late Foreign Secretary, and the right hon. gentleman, the member for Edinburgh—was there ever such a case in which men who swayed public opinion to such an extent, came forward so decidedly to express an unfavourable opinion as to the result of a negotiation, and the conduct of a diplomatist? Was there ever, I ask, a case in which such charges were made, or in which a government shrank from asking the House of Commons at once to affirm, or decidedly to negative, such sentiments? The noble lord has stood in the position of the leader of the House of Commons—the other noble lord by his side, has lately filled the office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and is generally believed to have more knowledge and experience in these matters than any other man living—of the great talents and abilities of the right hon. gentleman on his right (Mr. Macaulay), I have had frequent opportunities of expressing my opinion; and, I will ask, is it just, is it equitable, that three such men should attempt to discredit—nay, to ruin—the reputation of a public man, who has undertaken a public duty from the purest of all possible motives, and because they conduct their attack according to precedent, those who support and defend him are to have no opportunity of asking for the opinion of the House of Commons—of determining whether or not such discredit is cast upon him with the sanction of the legislature and the public? One noble lord has described this negotiation as a capitulation; the right hon. gentleman has said that it is a stain upon the honour of the country; the other noble lord says he entirely agrees in those opinions, and yet they refuse a motion calculated to put their opinions to the test by a vote of the House. I do say, that if the motion is unusual, it flows from a course which is entirely without precedent. But the noble lord says we are not to judge of the motion by the terms of it. We are to look back, forsooth, to the opinions which the mover once expressed upon some matters relating to Canada. The opinions of a man who spoke upon an entirely different subject, are put forward by the noble lord as a test by which to try whether the motion is just or unjust. Why, the noble lord was not always so ready to disclaim the support of the hon. member on account of his opinions regarding Canada. The time was, when, turning round to his hon. friend, he could find it convenient to forget his opinions respecting Canada, and could even condescend to receive his vote to support or to rescue him in his hour of difficulty and danger. Why, it would have been as absurd for the noble lord to have said, "I can't go out into the lobby with you, because of your conduct concerning Canada," as if I said now, "This motion is just; there is no reason for negating it; but three years ago its mover said something on Canadian affairs, of which I cannot approve, and, therefore, I shall vote against his proposition." Sir, I think the noble lord might have found many precedents for insisting upon a distinct vote of the House in cases where a motion of condemnation has been made; ay, and I think, too, that he might have found those precedents in cases where the authors of the motion, were not deterred from going to a division by the fear of being left in a minority. And here, let me again ask, is the course you are pursuing a creditable course? Is it fitting, that entertaining the opinions which you hold—is it for the honour of the House of Commons—is it for the honour of party connections or public men, that after throwing every discredit on a diplomatist by your speeches, you should not have the manliness to come to a vote? That was not the course which Mr. Windham pursued when he brought forward his motion concerning the treaty of peace in 1801. He made a motion condemnatory of the treaty; he stood nearly alone; Mr. Windham, Mr. Elliot, and a few others, were divided from the whole House upon the question; but they did not throw out insinuations right and left and then shrink from a division; they had the courage and consistency, after stating their opinions fairly, to ask for a vote in the affirmative or negative. On that occasion, Mr. Windham was supported, I believe, by only nine other members, and yet Lord Hawkesbury, finding what he considered to be a censure moved upon the government, deemed it to be his duty to move a counter-resolution. After expressing a hope, that the House would not separate without giving an opinion on the subject, he accordingly proceeded to move a resolution, in which it was declared—"That this House is satisfied, that his Majesty has, on the whole, wisely consulted the interests of his people in having concluded a definitive treaty, founded on the basis of these preliminaries."

That was Lord Hawkesbury's course on Mr. Windham's motion. But I will give you another instance. In 1823, when Mr. Macdonald brought forward his motion, concerning the negotiations relative to Spain, the mover, towards the close of the debate, found himself supported by so small a minority, that he was anxious to withdraw his proposition. Mr. Canning, however, feeling that the conduct of the government was questioned, would not allow the withdrawal of the motion, but pressed it to a division, when only twenty members were found to divide with the mover. Mr. Canning said, on that occasion, that he would not have asked for an approval of the policy of the government, but finding it condemned, he called upon the House to say if they joined in that vote of condemnation! In the same way, I would not have asked for a direct vote of approbation, but finding the conduct of the government impugned, I now call upon the House to give a distinct vote upon the motion before us with the view of discouraging the practice of disparaging public men without allowing them an opportunity of vindicating themselves. After all, Sir, what miserable cavilling is this about the language used by Lord Ashburton in reference to the Madawaska settlement! Having a point to gain for Great Britain, he made use of the language which he deemed strongest and most likely to achieve it. And is it, then, to be said, that he sacrificed the honour of his country, because he did not insist on the letter of that language? It would go hard with negotiators if they were bound by this motion with respect to language used by them in attempting to gain the most favourable terms for the countries by which they are employed. The real question at issue is, not Lord Ashburton's language, but where would you have now been if the Washington treaty had not been concluded? The real discussion does not turn on the Madawaska settlement, or on the river St. John. But the great and important question which the good sense of the country will decide is, whether, with respect to a nation with which we have such close connection by trade, affinity, and otherwise, on which our own colonies border for an extent of 1,500 miles, we should remain in a condition of perpetual uneasiness, approaching to hostility? The intelligent people of England asked, if it was right that after so protracted a diplomatic conflict, which had been going on for the long period of ten years, without any prospect of its amicable termination—nay, the people of this country had a right to ask, whether this matter could not, without any dishonourable concessions on the part of England, be brought to a satisfactory settlement? Is it not a subject of congratulation that this state of things has terminated with honour to this country? Where would you have been at this moment if this had not taken place? Would you have been in possession of the disputed territory? My hon. and gallant friend (Sir. H. Douglas), who is better acquainted with this matter than any man in this House, has truly stated that this territory had been gradually slipping away from you, that an American citizen had been arrested by his authority on a portion of the territory, for committing a trespass, upon which you have permitted the Americans to build a fort without making any remonstrance. Why did you allow this to take place? Is that the way of vindicating the honour of England and maintaining your own boundary? The noble lord said, "Open another negotiation, based upon the report of our own commissioners." But, however able Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh may be, I happen to hold in my hand the message of the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the board of commissioners appointed to survey the north-eastern boundary, which will show that the probable effect of sending more commissioners to America would only be to excite more contention. The report to which I refer, and which was presented to Congress, was made by commissioners Renwick, Major Graham, and A. Talcott, and the Americans consider their commissioners entitled to as much confidence as we justly place in ours.—"That the line of highlands (they say) claimed by the United States, is, as the argument on the part of Great Britain has maintained it ought to be, in a mountainous region, while that proposed by Messrs. Featherstonhaugh and Mudge does not possess this character; that it is also, in the sense uniformly maintained by the United States, the height of land, which that of Messrs. Featherstonhaugh and Mudge is not; that it fulfils, in every sense, the conditions of the proclamation of 1763, the Quebec Act of 1774, and the treaty of 1783, which no other line that can possibly be drawn in the territory in question can perform."

Sir (continued the right hon. baronet), this is the construction put upon the report of Messrs. Mudge and Featherstonhaugh, and, without expressing any opinion on the correctness of that report, is it probable that the commissioners from Maine and Massachusetts, and the governments of these states, would have acquiesced in the reasoning of our commissioners. I think that such a result was not at all probable. But, again, the noble lord says that the United States senate has passed a bill (by a majority of two I believe) appropriating the Oregon territory as a portion of the possessions of the United States. To that I oppose, in the first place, this circumstance, that the executive government of the Union, which has in its hands the conduct of diplomatic negotiations, has acceded to a proposition of the English government, or rather made one to us, that the question of the Columbia River should be amicably settled between the two countries. And next, I must remind the noble lord, that the House of Representatives, a popular body, as open as the senate to the desire of an increase of territory—that the House of Representatives, with all the correspondence before them, still refuse to sanction the bill agreed to by the senate, so that the session passed without anything being done. I may further say, Sir, that I have every hope that, by a prudent and temperate course of proceeding, these difficulties will be amicably arranged. It is to this that the noble lord refers for the purpose of obtaining a paltry triumph. I will not refer to the right of search or visit. What I have on a former occasion stated to the House on this subject is fully borne out by subsequent events. I said, and I say again, that no authority was given to make concessions on this point. We claim no right of search, or detain vessels, if we do know them to be American. If we do visit the vessels, knowing them to be American, we do it on our own responsibility, at our own risk and peril; and we are liable to be compelled to make compensation should our officers make any mistake. And what has brought this question into its present position? I tell the noble lord that if he had limited himself to the claim of visiting suspected vessels, no angry feeling would have arisen. But the noble lord captured, or authorised the capture, of American vessels. In February, 1841, I heard that the noble lord issued orders to British captains not to capture American vessels—that vessels bona fide American should not be captured. Then from that it is to be inferred that previous to this order such captures must have been made. The noble lord, I believe, acquiesces. Now, it has been admitted that if an American vessel were evidently equipped for the slave-trade—carrying fetters and provisions sufficient for ten times the number of her crew, we have no right whatever to meddle with that vessel. But when it appears that we for some years claimed a right to visit and search vessels, knowing them to be bona fide American, it is no wonder that excited feelings were created in the States, on the question of the right of visit, which made it extremely difficult to come to a satisfactory and amicable arrangement with reference to that subject. The noble lord says that we have made great concessions to the United States by that article of the treaty which provides for the employment of vessels by both countries on the coasts of Africa to suppress the slave-trade. The article in the treaty alluded to is as follows—“The parties mutually stipulate, that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force, of vessels of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries for the suppression of the slave-trade; the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two governments stipulating nevertheless to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co-operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each government to the other respectively.”

I must now remind the House and the noble lord of what Mr. Fox asked the American government to do. All along the coast of Africa there were swarms of ships carrying the American flag. Mr. Fox pressed upon the American government the importance of acceding to a mutual right of search, and various advantages which were likely to accrue were pointed out, and among others, that of the capture of rich prizes. In 1839, nothing effectual having been done in the suppression of the slave-trade, Mr. Fox again urged upon the government of the United States the importance of mutual exertions for the suppression of the slave-trade upon the coast of Africa, but nothing was done. In consequence of the course which has now been pursued, France, it is alleged, will say, that it is possible for this country to suppress the slave-trade without exercising the right of search. Why was it not just as competent for France to prefer an agreement of this sort before the treaty was concluded as at present. It has been thought right that an arrangement should be come to which for a time should not be liable to be annulled at the will of popular assemblies, and that for five years, therefore, there should be a joint squadron on the coast of Africa, adopting effectual means—and, in my belief, they will be effectual—for the suppression of the slave-trade. But you say, that we have effected nothing; that we have left the Oregon treaty all unsettled. Now all this is said for the purpose of possessing the people of this country with the idea, that Lord Ashburton has failed as a negotiator. However, with respect to this, my firm persuasion is, that the two countries will enter shortly upon an amicable settlement of the Columbia question. Then, with respect to the boundary question, all the accounts that her Majesty's government have received from America, concur in representing that the boundary states are animated equally with ourselves by a sincere desire that the line of demarcation should be drawn as soon as possible. They have appointed engineers, they wish that the line of demarcation should be drawn in one year, they are actuated to all appearance by precisely the same feelings as we are. This is what we hear from the United States. With respect to the right of search, the American government has communicated to us their instructions to their officers, but as it is impossible for me to speak of the nature of them at this stage of the proceedings, I can only state it is my firm belief, that they can and will be carried into effect. On the whole, then, my persuasion is, that it will be most desirable to leave the governments of the two countries to settle these questions amicably between themselves; and with the knowledge that they possess of their great reciprocal interests, with the knowledge that any bad feelings which might mutually arise would only recoil on themselves, and notwithstanding the indications of adverse feelings which may be displayed for a time by small bodies, my firm belief is, that it will be found by this treaty concluded by Lord Ashburton we have not only laid the solid foundations of peace, but that we have done that which is most desirable for our common interests, and that, as far as negotiations can effect that object, these negotiations will issue in establishing permanently amicable relations between the United States and ourselves. If such be the feelings of the House, looking to the motives of our distinguished negotiator, and seeing the many sacrifices he made to accomplish that for which he went out—that he sought no honours nor distinctions, and had no other motive for his exertions than his desire to unite the two countries in relations of permanent peace—looking at the difficulties which he had to encounter, that he had the assent of no fewer than seven commissioners from Maine and Massachusetts, in addition to the assent of the American government, to gain, if, revolving all these matters in your minds, you should, as I hope you will, think that the conduct of Lord Ashburton demands your approbation, and will justify you, if departing from ordinary precedent, you should consent to vote with the government, and—disbelieving the charges that have been brought forward against him, charges made, but immediately after withdrawn, that he was an American citizen, or had some pecuniary interest of his own to serve—if you think that he has taken a comprehensive view of the subjects comprised in this treaty in spite of the petty cavilling about the noble lord's language, and the Madawaska settlement, and done nothing in his conduct of the negotiations but what is right and just, I hope that you will give your support to the motion of the noble lord. I mean the motion of the hon. gentleman [laughter], and record your approbation of Lord Ashburton's proceedings. Sir, my noble friend was compelled in the course of his speech to allude to a little hypercriticism, and gentlemen do seem a little fastidious about this little mistake. I am glad, however, that I made no greater mistake—and if hon. gentlemen thought my argument unjust, they would not have fastened on this little error. I willingly yield to this correction, and I trust that they will support the motion of the hon. member for Montrose.

On a division the numbers were: Ayes, 238; Noes, 96; majority for Mr. Hume's motion, 142.

REVENUE—THE BUDGET.

MAY 8, 1843.

The House in Committee of Ways and Means. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the conclusion of his financial statement, moved the following resolution—“That, towards making good the supply granted to her Majesty, there be issued and applied to the service of the year 1843, the sum of £47,994:12:3, being the surplus of Ways and Means granted for the service of preceding years.”

In the discussion which ensued—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said,—Sir, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring) has given notice that an opportunity will arise for entering into a detailed discussion with respect to several of the matters connected with the trade of the country; and I think it more consistent with the public interest and the usage which has been generally observed upon similar occasions, to avoid entering into a discussion upon particular articles until that opportunity shall present itself. I must say, I think the temper and general tone of the right hon. gentleman were worthy of the situation he formerly held, and his determination to uphold the revenue in its present state, and not to hazard it by an undue reduction of taxation, were such as might be expected from his public character. The right hon. gentleman says, that last year I was particularly severe with respect to the failure of the produce of the 5 per cent. additional duty upon the customs and excise. I cannot say I think the right hon. gentleman is borne out by the facts of the case. The estimates of persons making financial statements are liable to error—their expectations may be disappointed—they profess, in short, only to give estimates, and are not to be severely blamed if the estimates are not perfectly true. The right hon. gentleman expected a considerable sum from the addition of 5 per cent. to the customs and excise duties, and in that he was disappointed. But when I commented upon it, the circumstances out of which my comments arose were these:—I found a great deficiency in the public revenue. I was then considering how the deficiency might be made up. I said, shall I revive the tax upon leather? Shall I revert to the tax upon salt? Shall I re-impose the duty upon beer? or shall I follow the course taken by the right hon. gentleman, and propose a general addition to the duties of customs and excise? I was then discussing all the possible means of supplying the deficiency. I rejected them, and I said I thought it would be most unwise to tax articles which entered into the consumption of the great body of the people; that I doubted whether or no, if I did attempt to impose such a tax, the result would be to gain the required sum of money, and I came to the resolution, that upon the whole it was desirable to make a great effort to repair the deficiency in the revenue by a tax upon property rather than upon articles of consumption; but what I said upon that subject was this:—"I must here observe, that I am now merely exhausting the different means by which men might contemplate the supplying of the deficiency, and trying to show that increased taxation upon any articles of consumption will not afford relief. I wish to carry your judgment along with me. I said that the net produce of the customs and excise in the year ending the 5th of January, 1840, was £37,911,000, and the estimated increase in the customs and excise by the additional 5 per cent. was £1,895,000. Comparing, therefore, the income from customs and excise in 1840 with that in 1842—and I take 1842 in preference to 1841, because you can thus more fairly estimate the effect of the increased duty—I find, while the estimated produce of the customs and excise was £39,807,000, the actual produce was only £38,118,000, the actual increase being, instead of £1,895,000, only £206,000; not 5 per cent. increase in the amount of revenue, but little more than one-half per cent. realised in the attempt to impose 5 per cent. additional duty. In the depression of trade there may, undoubtedly, be circumstances sufficient to account for the expectations of the right hon. gentleman not having been realised, but still, making every abatement for these causes of decrease, I think it impossible not to admit that 5 per cent. increase of duty on articles of consumption would not produce 5 per cent. in net amount to the revenue."

That was the conclusion to which I came. The right hon. gentleman was wrong in his, as I fairly admit I have been, in my calculations: I made them upon the usual data, but nothing can be more doubtful than an estimate. However, when the right hon. gentleman made the proposition of adding 5 per cent. to the customs and excise, he did not receive from me a very cordial support, and I said, I thought upon the whole, that instead of levying a new tax on consumption, he was wise in attempting to raise the required amount of revenue by the addition of a per centage on the customs and excise. The right hon. gentleman was disappointed to the extent of £1,600,000. However, I only referred to that to show that it was not politic to propose any great addition to the duties upon articles of consumption. Then, with respect to the great advantages to result from the imposition of the Income-tax, what I stated was this—that the imposition of an Income-tax would enable me to make considerable reductions in the duties on articles of consumption; and I ventured to utter this prediction—I will quote the very words I then used—I said—"I propose that the income of this country should bear a charge not exceeding 7d. in the pound, which will not amount to 3 per cent., but, speaking accurately £2 : 18 : 4 per cent., for the purpose of not only supplying the deficiency in the revenue, but of enabling me with confidence and satisfaction to propose great commercial reforms, which will afford a hope of reviving commerce, and such an improvement in the manufacturing interests as will re-act on every other interest in the country; and by diminishing the prices of the articles of consumption and the cost of living will in a pecuniary point of view compensate you for your present sacrifices."

Now, although that prediction has been said to be falsified, I must say I think there has been from some cause or other that reduction in the price of the main articles of consumption, that to a person exercising due economy will compensate the amount of £2 : 18 : 4 per cent. which he pays in the shape of Income-tax. I take the case of a person with £300 a-year, having to pay on each £100, £2:18:4. I very much doubt whether, in the case of that man, the reduction in the price of the various great articles of consumption does not, in point of fact, fully compensate him for the charge of between £8 and £9 he pays as a tax on income. So I say of a man with £5,000 a-year. He is called upon to pay £150 as income tax; if he is perfectly regardless of the fall in prices—if he do not take advantage of competition—if he will let retail dealers charge what they please, very well—he will have no compensation; but if he makes inquiry—if he looks after his own concerns, and avails himself of the lowness of prices, the man with £5,000 per annum can, with the present price of articles of consumption, effect a saving in his annual expenditure of more than £150. That was the prediction I made when I introduced the Income-tax. You may say the result has arisen from other causes; you may attribute it to a good harvest, or to something else; but the fact, I think, cannot be denied, that for every £2:18:4 per annum paid upon £100 income, there is an opportunity of making a saving of much more than that amount. At least, I know I have had the satisfaction of receiving various communications from parties possessing small and large incomes, in which they admit that by the exercise of proper economy a greater saving than I then predicted may fairly be made. I have been told by one hon. gentleman that in the article of timber alone he expects to realize a saving that will compensate him for the payment of the Income-tax. I made another prediction—that the reduction of the duties on several of those articles which entered largely into manufactures might afford the hope of reviving commerce. Certainly, without speaking sanguinely of the revival that has taken place, I expected it would have taken place at an earlier period. I did not contemplate the long-continued depression that we have had to encounter. In fact, the continuance of that depression, accompanied with great pressure on the working classes, necessarily entailing upon them great privations, and causing a reduced consumption of many articles, has mainly contributed to defeat the calculations I made, and to prevent the receipt of that amount of revenue which I anticipated. I am not speaking too sanguinely now. I shall not venture, after such frequent disappointments, to excite too great expectations; but I cannot help thinking that the facts to which my right hon. friend has referred, as having arisen within the last three or four months, do entitle us to entertain the expectation that the worst is past, and there is a hope of a progressive revival in the commerce of this country. The articles to which my right hon. friend referred, are articles in which a reduction of duty took place, and they are largely used in manufactures—olive oil for instance. Then there is the great increase in the consumption of cotton. Then, I hope we have seen the commencement of the recovery from depression in the wool trade; and I think such a combination of circumstances warrants the hope that we are about to see a revival in the commercial and manufacturing interests of the country. I deeply regret to see the depression continue in some branches of industry—in the iron trade, in the coal trade; and I am afraid the hardware trade has not yet shown any symptom of material recovery. But, looking at what has taken place in the cotton districts, and what is beginning to take place, I trust, in the woollen districts—looking at the demand for articles, which enter as elements of manufactures, I cannot help entertaining the conviction, although the expectations I held out have been deferred, still there is now a prospect they will be realized so far as they refer to a revival of the manufacturing industry and commercial prosperity of the country. I do hope the House will not press on the government, in the present state of the revenue, hasty and precipitate reductions of taxation; and that they will not forget the advantages they derive from the maintenance of public credit. It is impossible to deny that if the state of the finances of this country were prosperous, there might be an opportunity of reconsidering, with advantage, several of our duties. I do not deny it; but I entreat the House to bear in mind that, comparing our revenue with our expenditure, there does remain still, at least there did remain in the last year, a deficiency—if the whole receipts of the Income-tax had been realized within the year, we cannot deny that there was a deficiency in the last year. The right hon. gentleman says he does not now call for the abolition of the Income-tax. I think, in the present state of the revenue, there are few that would advise a repeal of the tax on property and income. I think there are few who will not admit that if the financial proposals of the late government had been carried into effect, they would not have caused such an increase in the revenue of the country as to dispense with the necessity for an Income-tax. Where should we have been now if the Income-tax had not been imposed? There is a deficiency now. In discussions upon the budget it has always been usual to avoid anything like asperity or party spirit. I shall studiously avoid it upon the present occasion. There is no doubt a deficiency on the last year, of £2,400,000, but there are the arrears of the Income-tax due, which, if you could now realize and pay them at once into the exchequer, would considerably repair that deficiency; but there would still be a balance against you. The deficiency, therefore, of this year is not precisely of the same character as those of former years, because the arrears due, if raised, would redress the balance. When I proposed the Income-tax, what was the fact? The deficiency was not casual; there had been a growing deficiency for five or six years, and the full amount of the deficiency at the close of the year, when I proposed the Income-tax, was not less than £10,000,000. There was an increase of the debt in a time of peace to the amount of at least £10,000,000 for the year ending 1842. The late government, it is true, proposed a modification in the existing corn and sugar duties, but it can be conclusively proved, and I think they themselves will admit, that if their proposals had received the sanction of parliament, still the state of the revenue, as compared with the expenditure, on account of the Chinese and other wars in which we were engaged, would have rendered it imperatively necessary to resort to some other scheme for the purpose of raising additional income; and I now doubt whether any measure could have been devised for raising a sum approaching to £5,000,000, half so free from objection as that which I proposed—namely, the Income-tax. What other measure can now be suggested? The hon. member for Montrose says, reduce your estimates to the amount of £4,000,000 during the present year. Her Majesty's government have paid the utmost attention to this subject. They have considered the demands on our naval, military, and ordnance service, from every part of the globe; they have looked at the duties demanded of those who form that service, and they have come to the firm conviction that it is impossible, without endangering the health of the men employed, without sacrificing the efficiency of the public service, and probably increasing the expenditure greatly hereafter, that any such reduction could be made; and I apprehend that upon that point there will be a concurrent, almost unanimous, opinion of the House. Very few hon. members, looking at the state of the army, looking at the navy, looking at the demand for protection to commerce in every quarter of the world, believed that in the course of the present year we could have effected so great a reduction in our estimates. But we have in the present year made such reductions as we thought consistent with the efficiency of the public service, and effected a saving of £800,000; and these reductions have met with general assent. I did propose, certainly, that a vigorous effort should be made to replenish the public coffers by a tax on property. Although the estimates I made may have been incorrect, and although the period of revival of trade has been postponed beyond my anticipations, I see nothing in what has passed to discredit the policy of the great measure I then proposed—namely, the attempt to raise additional revenue by a tax on income. At the same time I admit, that the existence of a tax is no reason to continue it, if it be proved to be injurious, and it is now open to any hon. member to propose a substitute. But if it were proposed to repeal the tax, and substitute other taxation in its room, I feel perfectly convinced that a vast majority would support me in attempting to give effect to the experiment I made last year. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. F. Baring), and others, have said, that the imposition of the Income-tax had caused the defalcation in other branches of the revenue. I doubt that. The defalcation in other branches of the revenue have been caused by depression of trade, not from the imposition of the Income-tax. The receipt of a larger sum than I calculated upon only fortifies me in the opinion, that it was wiser in the present state of the country to obtain additional revenue from a tax on property rather than by increasing the taxes on articles of consumption. If there be any particular class of taxation that ought to be affected by the imposition of the Property-tax, it is that of the assessed taxes. I was distinctly told, that the effect of the Property-tax would be most apparent on the assessed-taxes. I still doubt whether it will be the case; I doubt whether reductions in the excise and customs can be attributed with justice to the Income-tax. If there were a great falling off in the assessed-taxes, then you might with some justice argue that that defalcation was caused by the increased tax on property. But the actual falling off in the receipt of the assessed taxes is only £200,000 on a receipt of £4,400,000; and, judging from any notices which have been given, I certainly have no reason to anticipate that the burden on property on account of the Income-tax will to any very material extent affect the receipts under the assessed taxes. We must hope, too, that the revival of trade, and the demand for manufactures, owing to the reductions of duty which have taken place, will more than counterbalance to the people the amount of the tax. As yet we have not seen the injurious effect of the Property-tax, either on the actual receipts of the assessed or any other taxes. With respect to the coal-duty, the sugar-duty, and the duty upon any other article, there appears to be a prospect of having them submitted to the House in detail upon some future occasion, and till then I think it will be infinitely better to reserve the discussion. I, at least, shall for one abstain from discussing them at present. It would have been infinitely more gratifying to me and my colleagues to be enabled, on account of the state of the revenue, to have proceeded in the course of the remission of duties on which we entered last session. My conviction of the principles which ought to govern the remission of duties, I must own, has been confirmed rather than abated in force by the experience we have had of the past. I wish most sincerely we could have reconciled it with our duty to have proposed further reductions in some duties; but in the present state of the revenue, adverting to the still continued deficit as compared to the expenditure, looking to the great importance even in a commercial point of view of maintaining public credit, we have come unwillingly to the conclusion, that it is not consistent with our public duty to propose the remission of taxation on articles of consumption, which would have been most agreeable to our feelings could we have reconciled it to our duty.

The resolution was agreed to, and the House resumed.

ABOLITION OF THE CORN-LAWS.

MAY 9, 1843.

In the fourth night's debate on Mr. Villiers's oft-repeated motion—"That the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House to take the Corn-law into its consideration, with the view to its immediate abolition,"

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—The progress of this debate has confirmed the impression which I had before it commenced, that almost all the arguments which it was possible to adduce on each side of the House had been exhausted, and that it was not probable that any ingenuity on the part of any speaker could present either side of the question in a new point of view. I repeat, that what has passed in the course of this debate has confirmed that impression. In the course of this discussion, I have heard little that is new; I have heard little more than a repetition of former arguments. As for myself, having frequently been called upon to discuss this question—having had frequent opportunities of delivering my opinions upon it, I confess I have no new argument to offer; and nothing but the importance of the subject, and the position in which I stand, would have induced me to overcome the reluctance which I feel again to present myself to the House. I must, however, for one, thank the hon. member for Wolverhampton—for the manner in which he has presented his motion to the House. With the opinions the hon. and learned member entertains on the subject, it is creditable to him that he has solicited the decision of the House upon the broad principle involved in his proposition. There was no subterfuge either in the motion or in the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman—there was no attempt to catch a stray vote by a plausible reference to the nature of the motion—the hon. and learned gentleman does not call upon the House to resolve itself into a general committee on the Corn-laws, but he asks the House to resolve itself into a committee on those laws, specifying the precise object for which he solicits that committee, namely, to effect a total and immediate repeal of those laws. I shall address myself to that which is properly the subject of debate, and assign the reasons why it is impossible for me to give my assent to that proposition. The principle involved in the resolution is much wider than the resolution itself. The hon. and learned gentleman proposes that to-night we should affirm the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws; but the great principle is further involved in the resolution, namely, that every duty on every article which savours of protection shall be at once abolished; and I think it would have been better, considering the principles avowed by the hon. and learned gentleman, that, instead of moving for the immediate and total repeal of the Corn-laws, he should have made his resolution concurrent with his argument, and have proposed to the House to resolve that all duties savouring of protection should be abolished. Depend upon it, Sir, if the present motion is carried, long prescription, vested interests, the application of capital under the existing law, cannot operate to prevent the application of that great principle to duties being protection, or as you call them monopoly and robbery. If that be true as applied to the Corn-laws, do not—as the hon. and learned member for Bath has said,—do not delude yourselves, for the same principle must be applied immediately and completely,—not by removing only duties imposed for purposes of revenue, but to every duty which operates as protection to any interests favoured by law. Can it be questioned—and this is the only point on which I quarrel with the fairness of the hon. and learned gentleman—can it be questioned that it would have been fairer to have advanced that principle boldly than to lay it down partially, when its consequences are so clear and apparent? But let us see what we are called upon to affirm by this resolution. Not a trade in this country, the produce of which is protected by a duty upon foreign articles entering into competition with it, can hope to retain that protection. There must be an immediate and complete repeal; for, observe, what your own argument is: you say that on the establishment of a certain principle, the practical execution of that principle is immediately to follow. From your argument, no vague inference is to be drawn. You have sounded the knell of protection by the adoption of that principle, and, therefore, you must immediately proceed to abolish, as respects manufactures, without exception, all and every duty upon the import of foreign manufactures which operates as a protection. Of course, then, this is a subversion of the whole arrangement that was made last year by the adoption of the tariff. How complicated are the consequences to which this leads. Every duty arranged last year by the tariff must undergo instant revision. If you are unwilling to sacrifice the revenue, you must, for instance, restore the duties on colonial timber, because the imposition of a duty on foreign timber operates as a protection to colonial timber. Are you prepared to abandon the duty levied upon foreign timber? it operates as a protection, and if you are not so prepared, the consequence is, that you must replace the duties on colonial produce, and therefore, I say, that by acceding to this motion, I must not only abolish every duty on every article of the nature of provisions, but I institute an immediate reversal of the whole arrangements made by the tariff of last year, excepting so far as the revenue is concerned. But the next consequence that flows from the adoption of this resolution, is the immediate subversion of the whole of the colonial system. The entire colonial system will at once be swept away, unless you will leave the colonial interests to drag on a precarious existence, without letting the capitalist know what is the legislation by which he is to be governed; in fact, it follows, as the necessary consequence of the adoption of this resolution, that the whole colonial system must be at once abolished; that is to say, that this country must not, on a careful revision of the colonial system—must not, after a gradual and well-considered attentive consideration of the abstract principle, but upon a resolution to be affirmed to-night, consent to subvert at once the whole colonial arrangements so recently made. Of course, I apply to the colonists the benefit of the principle we claim for this country. At present, our manufactured goods are admitted into the colonies on a footing more favourable to us than to foreigners. Whether wise or unwise, this is the nature of our colonial connection. This country said to the colonies: "I will be responsible for your security and internal order, and the return I ask for is the favour and privilege of the admission of my manufactures." This is granted; and for this we give the colonies corresponding advantages. This is the system which has endured for years; it is a system that may be unwise, and contrary to sound principle in the abstract, but would any sane assembly of legislators, knowing the extent of our colonial empire, consent by the adoption of the resolution of to-night at once to subvert, without delay or consideration, the whole of that system. Have you, who support this resolution, considered the effect the adoption of its wide principle would produce upon countries like India and Canada? Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the principle involved in the resolution is wise, did you ever find any writer on political economy who recommended legislation on a principle of this kind? Do I say that I would protect these interests for the sake of individuals? No; but I say, looking at the extent of capital invested on the faith of the law, it is impossible to contemplate what the consequences would be, not only to the landed interests, but to the manufacturers of this country and the interests of our colonists. The vote of the 4th of August in the national assembly of France, by which all privileges were abolished, was not adopted with less consideration than would this principle, if you ask now at once to deal thus with these interests. Can you answer this argument?—can you deny that if you affirm the principle of this resolution as professedly applied to the protection to land, there ought to be a repeal of every duty which gives protection, and which you call monopoly?—that monopoly ought to cease, that there ought to be no preference of colonial interests, and no sacrifices in return? [Mr. Villiers: “Hear.”] I am glad that the hon. gentleman admits that it is a necessary consequence. But with that admission, I ask the House if it feels that it is in accordance with the national interests and security, by the vote of one night to adopt a principle like this? That is the question. You ought, as legislators, well to consider your votes—to anticipate the possibility that you may be in a majority. I am certain, if hon. gentlemen will admit that, that it is not honest, from the conviction that you will be in a minority, and will escape the practical consequences of your vote, to vote contrary to this admission. I give hon. members credit for the integrity of their motives, and I ask them then if they were responsible for the colonial interests of this country—if they were responsible for the public safety, and for the consequences that might ensue, not from injury to individual interests, but from the disturbance of capital to such an extent, invested under laws which I will admit, for the sake of argument, require careful revision and alteration—would they, by the vote of one night, risk the consequences which the pledge of such a resolution would give? Now, observe, I have the admission of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Villiers), which I expected, that though the principle of the resolution is applicable apparently to corn, yet there is no one article, whatever the extent of capital employed in producing it, the manufacture of which can be affected by the sudden import of immense quantities of foreign produce, but, whatever the consequences may be, the manufacturers of it must be prepared to adopt the immediate application of this principle. If I were prepared to agree to such an abstract principle as that embodied in the resolution, I should shrink from its application. Those who have none of the responsibility imposed on the executive government of the country urge this measure; but no executive government would indirectly incur the responsibility of immediately announcing and applying such a remedy. From the legitimate consequences flowing from the resolution of the hon. gentleman, it does appear to me that I have stated conclusive reasons why, in the present state of this country, or in any conceivable state of this country, the representatives of the country should act with more caution and deliberation than that with which they will act if they affirm the resolution to-night. If the hon. gentleman should say to me, that which I am sure he will not say, that I am assuming that the resolution includes principles more extensive than it does, that it is applicable to corn only, even then it would be utterly impossible for me to assent to the resolution as applied to the trade in corn. Sir, I concur in much that was said by the noble lord, as to the general principle which should govern the consideration of this question; I remain as opposed to him as ever upon the practical measure to be adopted; but as to the general principle with which we should view alterations in the Corn-laws, I do not materially dissent from the noble lord. The noble lord laid down the principle as strongly as it was put by any gentleman on this side of the House, that even if these laws required alteration, you ought to be cautious in retracing your steps and applying remedies. That was the principle as laid down by the noble lord, and he supported his opinion by reference to high authority—to the authority of Adam Smith, and he might have done it by reference to Mr. Huskisson. Every one who has considered this subject, the more carefully he has considered it the more convinced he has become of the abstract principle, and the more unwilling he has been to pledge the abstract principle by an incautious application of it to practice. I was sorry to hear the noble lord after he had admitted that principle, take an unfair advantage of an expression used by my right hon. friend the Vice-president of the Board of Trade, in saying that "he had placed the landlord on the footing of a sinecurist." My right hon. friend might have used the word "sinecurist" in enforcing the propriety of caution, where there were great vested interests at stake; but all that my right hon. friend said was, even where you are dealing with that which is the most obnoxious interest, even with the sinecurist, even there you recognise his claim for compensation: how much more, then, is there a necessity for cautious legislation, when you are dealing with the great body of landholders of this country, and with capital invested on the faith of the existing law? That was the argument of my right hon. friend, and the noble lord took an unworthy advantage of it in saying that my right hon. friend classed the whole body of agriculturists with the sinecurists, and placed them on the same footing. Again, I think with the noble lord, that not only for the protection of individuals, but for the public interest, great caution is necessary. I think with the noble lord, that the landed interest is entitled to protection upon the just ground of being called on to bear special burthens. [Hear, hear.] Sir, I am stating my opinion. I am repeating that I admit that having frequently discussed this subject, as I stated at the outset, it is difficult to allege any new argument. I am stating my concurrence with the noble lord with respect to the protection which ought to be afforded to agriculture on account of the burthens imposed on land which are not imposed on other property. It is the landed property of the country which maintains the church establishment. I say that the greatest writers on this subject have admitted that the tithes do constitute a peculiar burthen upon the land. [Interruption.] Permit me to state my own opinions; they are a fair subject for canvass. But I must say the advocates for liberality are the most intolerant of the opinions of others. My intention is to discuss this subject with the spirit and temper with which a subject of so much importance should be discussed. I shall avoid all personal imputations, and I shall not think it necessary to reply to those which have been advanced. If any one is to be deterred from expressing his opinions by abuse, or diverted from his argument by retaliating that abuse, it is impossible we can come to any conclusion; we cannot conduct the argument in a satisfactory manner, or in a manner worthy of the question. And I protest, because I may entertain opinions differing from the hon. gentleman, against the imputation being cast upon me, of acting from improper or corrupt motives. The imputation affects me little; I shall not follow the example of those who use such personal imputations, having a strong conviction that they recoil on their authors. I was stating that the land was subject to peculiar burthens; I should think no one will say it is not. I constantly hear this address made to the proprietors of land, "Beware of the course you are taking; the great manufacturing towns in the times of their prosperity have drawn the rural population within their limits. They have made no provision in the time of prosperity for the support of the labourers in the time of decay; and that they will avail themselves of the existing law—disgorge the superfluous and unemployed population on the land, and having extracted from them, in the time of manufacturing prosperity, all the good they could, then that they will not support them in time of difficulty, but will return them to the land, and the burthen of supporting them will be on the land." And, therefore, I should have expected a ready assent to my argument, that the land is called on to bear burthens imposed materially by the manufacturing districts. But observe what was the principle of the law; was it not the original principle of the law that the profits of stock-in-trade should be made subject to this burthen? Have you not departed from it? Why? Because the land is permanent, is tangible, is always visible; that there is less of inquisition, and less of exaction in levying the burthens on land, whilst you say it is impossible to determine the amount of stock or profit for the purpose of assessing it for the poor-rate or the county-rate, without occasional difficulty, and consequently you have abolished that principle of law, and the land is left alone to bear that burthen, which the original principle of the law contemplated should be partially borne by the profits of stock-in-trade. I will take the single case of barley. I think you raise £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 a-year from the tax on barley. I think the duty is above £8,000,000, and, in addition, you subject the landowner to great difficulties in conducting his operations. You say to him, "In order to secure this revenue from a single article, we will interfere with the operations of your trade and subject you to peculiar supervision, interrupt you in the application of your capital, and prevent you from making the most of the barley you have." I know the answer to this statement will be, that this duty is not a burthen peculiar on land—that it is borne by the consumer. Let us try to apply the same sort of reasoning, supposing a tax were proposed to be imposed on the cotton manufacture. Supposing the manufactured articles of cotton were subjected to a duty for the purpose of raising £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, I apprehend the cotton manufacturers of this country would decidedly object to such an imposition. They would say, "At the time we are pressing you to take off the duties on raw articles, and while we complain of the duty on foreign raw cotton as a grievous exaction, to propose to raise two or three millions by a duty on manufactured cotton, would be an act of folly and insanity of which no man fitted to serve in office in this country could be guilty." If I answered them by saying that foreign silks and articles of foreign manufacture, which entered into competition with their goods, would come in more freely if their goods were taxed—that the tax on their goods would fall on the consumer, and that they (the producers) had no reason to complain—would they be satisfied with these observations? and, therefore, though I cannot admit that the malt-tax is, to the extent in which it has been represented, a burthen exclusively on land, yet as the removal of the malt-tax would give great facility to the operations of those concerned in the malting business, I must say that it is a heavy duty on an article of agricultural produce, which must operate as a disadvantage in the application of capital in that particular direction. For these reasons, I have a strong impression that on the ground of special burthens there is a claim for protection on the part of the land. The noble lord, the member for Sunderland, denies that the land has any claim for protection, and he yet would consent to a fixed duty for the purpose of raising revenue. Now, I think the noble lord, the member for the city of London, on the principle which he holds, that extreme caution is necessary in dealing with these complicated interests, and that (looking to the cost of production and the special burthens borne by agriculturists) land is entitled to protection—that noble lord, I think, would be able, on such a principle, consistently to advocate and maintain protection; but I must say my confidence in the maintenance of the protection offered by the noble lord, the member for Sunderland—namely, that a duty might be levied for the purpose of revenue, would be very weak indeed. In the first place, it is not clear, if there is no claim to such a duty on the ground of protection, that the duty, exclusively for the purpose of revenue, would be easily defensible; but of this I am sure, that the noble lord would find it more difficult to maintain in argument that if it were right to levy a duty on corn, domestic corn should escape from that duty. After all, what would a tax on foreign corn, though raised (it may be asserted) for the purpose of revenue—what would such a tax, from which British corn should be exempted, be, but protection under a false pretext? It would be neither more nor less than that. The noble lord, the member for Sunderland, contended that the land is entitled to no protection, and he said that if in 1828, a duty of 10s. had been imposed on foreign corn for the mere purpose of revenue, nobody would have found fault with it. If, then, the noble lord's proposition were adopted, to give protection by the circuitous mode of extracting revenue from foreign corn, to which revenue domestic corn should not contribute, it is my belief that the Anti-Corn-law agitation would not so soon cease as the noble lord supposed. With respect to barley, the principle of the noble lord is reversed, as I stated on a former night; and in this instance we have no scruple in taxing the domestic article. [Lord Howick: "There is no tax on barley—the tax is on malt."] The noble lord intimates that my argument does not apply, because the tax is levied on malt, and not on barley. Then, instead of speaking of a tax on corn, if I spoke of a tax on bread, would that satisfy the noble lord? For the reasons I have stated, and on the general principle, I concur with the noble lord the member for the city of London, that the land is fairly entitled to protection on just and equitable grounds; and I dissent from the noble lord the member for Sunderland, feeling very little confidence in the protection he offers by means of a fixed duty, imposed for the purpose of revenue, and which, in the course of this debate, has been reduced to 4s. or 3s. With respect to the existing law, I differ from the noble lord the member for the city of London, still retaining my opinion, that if the noble lord attempted to impose a duty which he contemplated, whether it were 8s. or 10s., it would be very doubtful whether the levy of it could be ensured under circumstances, the recurrence of which we must anticipate. Acting on the principle which the noble lord opposite has advocated, that we should attempt a fair compromise of a long litigated question, I proposed, in the course of last year, with the concurrence of my colleagues, a measure which appeared to the government, under all the circumstances of the country, to be an equitable and fair proposition. We did contemplate and did effect, I admit, a very material reduction in the amount of duty levied on foreign corn. But this is not the only point on which we affected the landed interest. We removed altogether the monopoly of the supply of cattle and meat. We removed the prohibition which prevented the importation of foreign cattle and meat. This was hailed as a most satisfactory arrangement, and confident predictions were made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that important consequences would follow from these measures to the trade of the country. I am now quite surprised to hear the tone of an hon. gentleman opposite. He says, that from the partial application of our principles announced last year no good has resulted, and that we have done nothing by removing the monopoly of the supply of cattle and meat. All this, he says, has afforded no relief to the country and no stimulus to commerce, and yet the conclusion to which he comes is, to recommend us to proceed in the course we have adopted and to carry our principles into effect. It would have been more consoling to us, and certainly more consistent with reason, if the hon. member had said, that the sound principles which we propounded last year had proved beneficial in their operation, not indeed to the extent which he expected, but still most beneficial, and this was an encouragement for us to proceed in the same course; but when he says that the ministers have done nothing, and that their measures have entirely failed, and yet at the same time encourage us to proceed in the same course, I really cannot understand the argument of the hon. gentleman. We removed the protection on domestic timber, seeds, and on a variety of articles, and extensive alterations were made. I believe the effect of those alterations has been most advantageous. I can make no retraction of the principles on which I then acted. I am satisfied with them and desire their application. Therefore I dissent from the hon. gentleman, and looking at the reduced price of provisions and the increased comforts of the labouring classes of this country, I cannot regard without satisfaction, generally speaking, the operation of the principles on which her Majesty's ministers have acted, though at the same time I deeply regret whatever partial distress may have been the consequence of our measures. The noble lord opposite (Lord Worsley) has asked me to give some assurance with respect to the future. Her Majesty's ministers proposed the Corn-law last year in the hope that it might be an adjustment of this question. They could not say that the measure should be irrevocably final and unalterable; but her Majesty's ministers had no dirty intention in their minds of proposing an abrogation of the Corn-laws. In a matter of this immense importance, I consider political support to be of no slight consequence; but, however painful it may be to lose it, I cannot attempt to conciliate political support by making any inconsistent declarations. Her Majesty's government offered this law as a fair and equitable adjustment of the question; and they thought it would be met in a fair and conciliatory spirit by the landed interests: and I never will say, with respect to any law of this nature, that the fear of losing political support shall induce me to sacrifice my opinion. I tell this to the noble lord, that I do not maintain the law, merely because it was passed last session; nay, I must admit, that if it were true that the law is irreconcilable with the interests of the country, and that, a better law could be proposed, it would be the duty of the government to propose, and parliament to adopt, such a law. It is utterly impossible, in a commercial matter like this, to combine influences for the purpose of maintaining, as you suppose, your consistency; because it is not like a great political principle, it partakes of nothing of that character. But I say, that intervening experience has not convinced me that the law is a bad one. With the opportunity of watching its operation, I see no reason to infer that the principle of a fixed duty is preferable to that which I proposed. What were the objections which were offered against the law last year? Let us see what they amounted to. In the first place, it was said that it would have no effect whatever in diminishing the price of corn; and I remember that a most confident prediction on that head was uttered by one hon. gentleman, that it would keep corn at 72s. But there has been a material reduction in the price of corn. I know that some say, that is not in the least degree owing to the law; others again, attribute it to the law. However, the fact cannot be denied, that from some cause or other there has been a material reduction in the price of wheat, the main article of subsistence. I must say, that nothing surprises me more than to hear the cost of subsistence spoken of as a matter of indifference. The hon. member for Montrose, as I understood him, expressed himself utterly indifferent to the price of food. The argument was, that the high price of food was of no consequence if wages were high, yet no argument has been more frequent than that the price of food being higher here than on the continent, it is impossible for the manufacturer to compete with foreigners. It has been argued, too, that several millions of money per annum have been absorbed, by the high prices of corn; and a pamphlet was written by Mr. Greg to show that the quantity of money absorbed in the purchase of articles of subsistence prevented the manufacturers from having as large a market at home as low prices would have afforded them. That was the argument; there was the greatest advantage, it was said, in having the price of provision low, for then we could compete with foreigners, while at home it would enable parties to appropriate their money to the purchase of manufactured articles. Therefore I am surprised, whatever may be the cause of the price of corn being low, to hear that the reduction in price is of no advantage. But what is the object of all this? Is it not to try to raise an agricultural clamour about the lowness of prices. That is a most unfair and unworthy course. It was said again, that the importation of foreign corn would lead to the export of bullion, and derange the monetary system of this country. Well, there was a large importation of foreign corn last year, has there been any great export of bullion? At any rate, that has not taken place. It was said, also, that the system of averages which I introduced, would have no effect upon the admission of foreign corn; nay, it was said, that if it had any effect, it would be to diminish the average. Now it so happens that the effect of increasing the number of towns has been to increase rather than to diminish the average, and therefore to facilitate the admission of foreign corn. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Wolverhampton repeat the statement over and over again, that I guaranteed to the farmer a price of 56s. I have seen this constantly stated:—"The First Lord of the Treasury promised that you should have a remunerating price of from 54s. to 58s., and now you have but 46s. How can you ever repose any confidence in him?"

My answer is a simple reference to statements which I did make. I was referring to the price of corn for some ten or twelve years before, and I stated all the difficulties of determining what would be a remunerating price; but I said the average of the ten or twelve preceding years was 56s., and I stated also, that upon the adjustment of the tithe commission the average was also taken at 56s., and that as far as the legislature was concerned, I thought it probable that the effect of this law would be to prevent oscillations to a greater extent than from 54s. to 58s. I further stated, that I did not see any advantage to agriculture in having the price of corn at a higher rate than 58s. But when you quote that, it is but fair that you should quote the qualification in the context. What was it that I said? At the same time, that I made a reference to the price of 54s. and 58s. I said this in the same speech, and immediately preceding that allusion—"Nothing can be more difficult than to attempt to determine the amount of protection required for the home producer. I am almost afraid even to mention the term 'remunerating price,' because I know how vague must be the idea which is attached to it. The price requisite in order to remunerate the home-grower must necessarily vary; a thousand circumstances must be taken into account before you can determine whether a certain price will be a sufficient remuneration or not."

Again, I said—"Now, if we take the average price of wheat which determines the commutation of tithes, the principle on which the Tithe-bill passed, taking the average of seven years, we find the price of wheat during those seven years to have been 56s. 8d. If we take the average of wheat for the last ten years, we shall find that the price has been about 56s. 11d.; but in that average is included the average of the last three years, when corn has been higher certainly than any one would wish to see it continue. Allowing for that excess of price, however, 56s. 11d. was the average price for the last ten years. Now, with reference to the probable remunerating price I should say, that for the protection of the agricultural interest, so far as I can possibly form a judgment, if the price of wheat in this country, allowing for its natural oscillations could be limited to some such amount as between 54s. and 58s., I do not believe that it is for the interest of the agriculturists that it should be higher. Take the average of the last ten years, excluding for some portion of the average the extreme prices of the last three years, and 56s. would be found to be the average; and, so far as I can form an idea of what would constitute a fair remunerating price, I, for one, should never wish to see it vary more than I have said. I cannot say, on the other hand, that I am able to see any great or permanent advantage to be derived from the diminution of the price of corn beyond the lowest amount I have named, if I look at the subject in connection with the general position of the country, the existing relations of landlord and tenant, the burthens upon land, and the habits of the country. When I name this sum, however, I must beg altogether to disclaim mentioning it as a pivot or remunerating price, or any inference that the legislature can guarantee the continuance of that price; for I know it to be impossible to effect any such object by a legislative enactment. It is utterly beyond your power, and a mere delusion to say, that by any duty, fixed or otherwise, you can guarantee a certain price to the producer. It is beyond the reach of the legislature. In 1835, when you had what some thought was a nominal protection to the amount of 64s., the average price of wheat did not exceed 39s. 8d., and I again repeat, that it is only encouraging delusion to hold out the hope that this species of protection can be afforded to the agriculturist. To return, however, to the subject; I again say that nothing can be more vague than to attempt to define a remunerating price."

Now, I think I have read sufficient to show that I did not undertake to guarantee by legislation any price whatever. With regard to the lowness of price, I think that the Corn-law of last year has not been the cause of it. When I speak of a reduction in the cost of living, I cannot claim either for the tariff or the Corn-law the full extent of that reduction. I fear the reduction in the price of agricultural produce has arisen to a considerable degree from that depression of trade and diminished power of consumption of which we have had too many melancholy proofs. I wish my agricultural friends to remember that I said before this discussion on the Corn-laws came on, that it was my firm conviction, as it still is, that the prosperity of the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country is much more essential to the prosperity of the landed interest than any Corn-law whatever. I am not using new language in expressing that opinion. I have said the same thing on more than one occasion before; and, Sir, if you could convince me that the Corn-law was the cause of the manufacturing depression which has existed, or, if I could bring myself to believe the exaggerated statements which have been made with respect to the cause of that depression, I should feel the strongest conviction that the agriculturists would best consult their own interests by consenting to an alteration. But I at once declare that I distrust those statements—that I do not believe the Corn-law to be the cause of the manufacturing depression. When the hon. gentleman tells me of former successes in trade—of the immense profits which were made by manufacturers in former years—let me remind him that all those successes and all those profits accrued under a Corn-law. If then the existing Corn-law be fatal to manufacturing prosperity, how does he account for the fact of such prosperity having occurred at former periods when the same law was in existence? I will show him that prosperity and the Corn-law have co-existed. It has been said that the greatest manufacturing prosperity of this country was in the years 1835 and 1836. The Corn-law was in operation during both those years. Yes, but your reply to this is, that in those years food was cheap. Why, so is food cheap now. It is nearly as cheap now as it was in 1835 and 1836; and why should I admit that it is the existence of the Corn-law, which is fatal to manufactures, when I find that in those years you had the law in full operation, and at the same time had the public declaration of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce to the effect that trade was never more flourishing. But your greatest objection to the Corn-law is, that it has a tendency to encourage speculation. You tell us, among other things, that last year there was a rise in price just before the harvest, and that the consequence was, a large importation of foreign corn, which was met by the abundant crop, and consequently proved unremunerative to its holders. Now, I think it is hardly fair to try the existing Corn-law with reference to the circumstances of the last year. What were the circumstances of the last year? Certainly in the spring of last year large speculations took place in the importation of foreign corn, and these speculations were entered into on the assumption that there would be an unfavourable and a defective harvest. There never was a period when greater exertion was made than in the spring of last year to bring in large quantities of corn, on account of the expectation that prevailed that there would be a failure of the harvest. That conviction remained in full force up to a very late period of the year, and, the harvest turning out favourable, an occurrence so widely different from that which was expected, naturally caused losses which are not to be traced to the Corn-law. You are not testing the law fairly, therefore, if you try it by the circumstances of last year. But, nevertheless, let us see what the law really did last year. It came into operation on the 28th of April. At the 13*s.* duty which then, or shortly after occurred, 26,000 quarters of wheat were imported. At the 12*s.* duty, the amount imported during the two weeks ending the 13th and 20th of May, was 50,000 quarters; and in the weeks ending the 18th and 25th of June, when the duty was 9*s.* and 10*s.*, not less than 76,000 quarters were brought in. This shows that the law did not operate badly. But the truth is, that both speculations were entered into, and the natural operation interfered with, in consequence of certain motions made and speeches delivered within these walls. Some hon. members were, up to the latest moment, loud in their predictions of a deficient harvest, and their language was very influential in inducing corn-merchants to enter into speculation, and the holders of corn to retain their purchases in expectation of a further rise. It was so late as the 7th of July, that the hon. member for Aberdeen submitted a motion to this House to give a power to the Queen in council to remit the duties on corn during the recess. What would the speculator in corn naturally do when he saw motions of that kind made, and read such speeches (which, of course, operated as an encouragement), but hold back his corn? What said the noble lord the member for Tiverton, a person of high distinction in this House, and who held a cabinet office under the late administration? On the 11th of July, at the very time when all those speculations were going forward, the noble lord said in this House: "I venture to predict, that if parliament does not meet before November the government will have to let out the bonded corn."

This was the confident prediction of the noble lord; I acquit the noble lord of all improper motives. He was, I am sure, expressing a bona fide opinion, and never thought of interfering with the operation of the law; he believed that the harvest would prove defective—that another 2,500,000 quarters of corn must be imported from the Continent, at whatever price; but when the speculators heard a person in the situation of the noble lord make that declaration, they would naturally say—and the greater their confidence in the noble lord the more inclined they would be to say—"We will keep back our corn, for there is every prospect of a rise in the price;" and I must say, that if the agricultural interest have suffered from the sudden influx, at a critical period, of large quantities of corn, they have to thank the noble lord and his predictions for that influx of corn. But the noble lord was not the only prophet of evil. There was another noble lord—I mean the member for Sunderland. That noble lord, with the high sanction of his name, after the law passed, at a time when persons were pouring in corn to the extent of forty and fifty thousand quarters, at a duty of 10*s.* and 12*s.*, gave notice of a motion to release all corn in bond at a fixed duty of 6*s.* a quarter until the month of March, 1843. Corn, then, was brought into this country under the belief that the harvest would be a bad one, and at the same time there were three gentlemen in this House—supposed to speak with the best authority and most complete information on the subject—declaring, that if the speculators kept back their corn they would be sure to have a much lower duty, and giving notice of motions which, if they had been carried, would have effected that object. Is it not, then, fair to suppose that the natural operation of the new law was, to some extent, defeated by predictions of this kind; that that law has not had a fair trial, and is not to be judged by the circumstances of last year? But to go to another point. I am taking the objections to the measure seriatim. I know that it has been a favourite objection to the sliding-scale, that it has had the effect of preventing the employment of British shipping in the carrying of foreign corn, and of giving employment to foreign ships. It is said, that the duty on corn, varying inversely with the price when the duty is low, a sudden demand for foreign corn arises, which is shipped at foreign ports, and that few British ships are employed in carrying it. I know that this has been repeatedly urged upon the shipping interest for the purpose of inducing them to join in demanding a fixed duty in preference to a varying duty, which it was represented gave the advantage of the carrying trade to foreign ships. Now, what are the facts? I hold in my hand a return of the number of ships entered inwards with corn. In 1842, there were 4,203 corn-laden ships entered in the ports of England. Of these 2,346, or considerably more than one-half, were British ships. In 1841, the corn-laden ships entered were in number 4,705; but of these only 1,887, or considerably less than one-half, were British. So far, therefore, as we can form a judgment, the present law does not operate to discourage the employment of British ships. Next, looking to the question of steadiness of price, I can see no impeachment of the new law on that score. Of course the price being 64s., the object was to reduce it, and immediately after the harvest a fall ensued; but on the whole, looking at prices since the harvest, I own I cannot see that any formidable objection is to be made to the law on that ground. Looking, then, at the objections to the law—looking at the frauds which have been checked—looking at the export of bullion which the hon. member for Wolverhampton himself allowed to have ceased. [Mr. C. Villiers: “I said it ceased when the importation was regular.”] The hon. member, in making that admission, spoke of last year—looking at the increased employment of British shipping—and looking at the state of prices which certainly have been steady, and not immoderately low—looking, I say, at these things, I do think that I am entitled to declare the present Corn-law to be an improvement on its precursor, and that it has worked any thing but injuriously for the commerce of the country. Upon these grounds, I see no reason for retracting the favourable opinion which I entertained and expressed of the present law. I think that frequent alterations in laws of this kind are in themselves to be deprecated. I think, also, that the existing law, offered as a compromise, was a fair adjustment of the question. I believe that there was as willing and as cordial an assent given to it by the agricultural interest as could have been anticipated. I think they gave that assent upon the assumption and in the expectation, that the law would not be again altered without good and sufficient reason. I do not mean to say that I could set up that as a ready argument against alteration of the law, if alteration were shown to be desirable; but, certainly, unless solid and sufficient reason for further alteration be shown, I think that that assent ought to prevail and hold good. Upon the subject of the Canadian Corn-bill, I do not now mean to enter; but I can state with truth, that the question of the admission of Canada corn was part of the original arrangement. It is no new measure, but one brought forward in execution of a promise given to Canada at the time this subject was under consideration, and which we feel it incumbent on us to fulfil. We know that the re-agitation of this question must expose us to difficulty, and must have a tendency still more to alienate the confidence of many who have supported us; but we consider that we have given an engagement to the people of Canada which it is our duty to fulfil—that we have held out to them expectations which it is our duty to realise. I hope, in the course of what I have addressed to the House, I have answered satisfactorily the question put to me by the noble lord. As I said before, we proposed the present measure of the Corn-laws, not with any secret reservation or secret intention of effecting another alteration; I contemplate no such alteration. My opinion is, that there has not been sufficient time allowed for trying the effect of the present law; but that, so far as a trial has been given to it, the effect favourably confirms the anticipations I formed respecting it. The noble lord, the member for Sunderland, has referred to my conduct on the Roman Catholic question, and stated that I should be prepared to make further concessions. The noble lord also spoke of my being desirous to please both parties; but be that as it may, if I have had such an object in view, I am afraid that I have failed in accomplishing it. Persons in my situation—in the situation of her Majesty's government—in endeavouring to steer a middle course, not adhering to one extreme or another, may expose themselves to that imputation. But that course was not taken with any other view than that of doing what we considered to be best for the public interests. I can solemnly assure the House that, in the course which we have taken—risking, as we did last year, the confidence and the friendship of many of our supporters—risking, I may say, the fate of the government—that course was dictated with reference to what was best and most advisable for the public interests. And when I say that the same regard for the public interests shall influence me and her Majesty's government, with respect to this important concern, I hope the House will believe that I do not make that declaration for the purpose of providing a refuge for myself and my colleagues against any political storms to which we may be exposed, but because I think it most suited to the magnitude of those interests and concerns which are placed in the hands of the responsible advisers of the Crown.

An animated conversation then ensued, and, several motions and counter-motions having been put and negatived, the House adjourned.

ARMS (IRELAND) BILL.

MAY 31, 1843.

Lord Eliot proposed the second reading of this bill. A very lengthened discussion ensued, extending over three nights, towards the close of which—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said—I do not consider, at this hour of the night, in the absence of many members of the late government, though I do not refer to the fact as any matter of blame, for I think the noble lord the member for London intimated his intention of giving his support to the bill—I do not, I say, consider it desirable at this hour, and remembering the nature of the question before us, to enter, in the absence of many whom I should desire to be present, into a general vindication of the conduct of the Irish government. When the proper time arrives, I shall be perfectly ready to vindicate the acts of the government in Ireland, and of the government in this country in connection with it. I shall be prepared to show, that I have redeemed every pledge which I have given with respect to the government of Ireland, and that the government here and the Irish government have attempted to administer affairs in that spirit of moderation, impartiality, and forbearance, with which I think the affairs of Ireland ought to be conducted. And I cannot accept the testimony which, with not a very laudable industry, the hon. baronet collected from every newspaper, as conclusive evidence of our failure in those attempts. Sir, before gentlemen not immediately versed in Irish matters, and not having any local experience in that country, draw an unfavourable conclusion with respect to the conduct of our government, I entreat them always to bear in mind the testimony, so honourable to himself, which we have just heard from the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir D. Roche). The chief charge alleged against us is, that we have appointed to the judicial office, two gentlemen of high professional distinction—Mr. Justice Jackson and Mr. Justice Lefroy. The hon. gentleman, hearing their judicial conduct attacked, he, a Roman Catholic—[Cries of "No."]—well, if not a Roman Catholic, and I beg the hon. member's pardon for the error, a gentleman decidedly friendly to Catholic claims—of strong political and party opinions—a gentleman connected with the liberal party in Ireland, cannot remain silent when he hears an imputation on those learned judges which he knows to be unjust; and he states therefore, from his personal experience of the conduct of one of those judges, and from his general knowledge of the conduct of the other, that the discharge of their official duties is free from all blame. He says, if there is any one respect in which they have failed, it is in too great humanity in the exercise of their duty. I say, then, remember the testimony so borne—a testimony so creditable to himself, and of such weight, from the disinterested character of the witness from whom it proceeds, before you place implicit confidence in the other charges against the Irish government; remember, I say, the refutation of the charges brought against them as to their judicial appointments. Sir, I wonder that hon. gentlemen do not exercise a little of that tolerance and liberality of which they profess themselves the champions. In speaking of the judges, and the performance of their judicial duties, they do not refer to these acts; they do not regard their professional eminence; they never refer to their professional claims, or ask whether they have entitled themselves to public approbation for the discharge of their judicial duties; but they ransack speeches made at a former period in a political character, and on some passages of those speeches hon. gentlemen condemn our appointments. If I had pursued the same course with regard to Sir Michael O'Loughlen, for instance, or with regard to the other Attorney-general for Ireland, elevated to the bench under the late administration, whose professional eminence, I admit, fully entitled them to the honour conferred on them, what would have been thought of me if I had said, "True, his professional rank supplies a claim to distinction; true, his judicial conduct has been above exception; but he held strong political opinions on some particular measures, and he is not therefore entitled to reap the reward of his professional merits." If I had taken such a course as that, in what light should I have been regarded by the House and the country. But, Sir, to confine myself to the particular measure before the House, I must say the hon. gentleman, the member for Waterford, has not answered the question put to so many others who have denounced this bill—"If you entertain the opinion which you now profess—if you believe this bill to be an insult to Ireland—if you believe the bill of rights conceded a privilege which this bill infringes, and infringes unjustly—if you think that, independently of the bill of rights, the common law of Ireland, as well as that of England, gave the subject this right, which he ought to continue to possess—if these are your opinions in 1843, why did you abandon your parliamentary duty, and give your sanction to a similar bill in 1841?" You say we found Ireland tranquil; you say that outrage was suppressed, there was no necessity for vigorous measures; and yet you, the representatives of Ireland, considering this as an insult offered to Ireland, did in the year 1841, when there was no necessity for vigorous measures—out of complaisance to the then government, consent to take this infraction of the common-law right of the subject, and without inquiry to vote in favour of it. And what says the hon. gentleman, one of the chief opponents of the present measure (Mr. O'Brien)? Why, that if we had not done him the favour of explaining the provisions of the former law, he should not have known what they were. He, a legislator, passes laws without knowing their provisions, and, as a magistrate, executes the laws without knowing what they enact! Sir, we thought it not right that we should re-enact the old law with a few continuing lines—that law which this worthy legislator and magistrate passed and executed, without knowing any thing of its provisions until we called his attention to them. And is that your zeal for the liberties of Ireland? I think better of you than you would lead me to entertain from this debate. I do believe you supported the bill in 1841, because you thought the peculiarity of the circumstances of Ireland justified a bill of that sort: that you did not think you were offering an insult to, or unjustly infringing on, the liberties of the people, by passing this act; but that, having an intimate knowledge of the circumstances at the time, and knowing the peculiar outrages and class of crimes against which it was directed, namely, the assassination of the peaceable and unoffending subjects of the Queen, you thought yourselves justified in making an exception to the general principle of the law, and in taking security for the life and property of those entitled to ask for security from the legislature under which they live. It is well to talk of general principles; but bear in mind the position of a man with a family liable to be attacked by assassins. If you can give him security against these, it is your bounden duty to do so. You can do nothing more likely to retard improvement than to banish from their residences those who are afraid of their lives. Read a description of any one of the murders recently committed, beginning with that of Lord Norbury, and coming to the last case of Mr. Gatchell, who consoled himself with the reflection,—“I took what security I could against assassination, but it was impossible to watch every bush that lay along my road.”

Take the details of such cases into your consideration, and then say whether you can refuse your assent to this measure. And when did we propose this act? Not now with reference to the present state of excitement. You know perfectly well that we gave notice, at an early period of the session, of this act, with reference to a totally different state of things, and intended for a different purpose—you know that there is no fair analogy between the extent of general crime in England and in Ireland; and that the question is, life not being secure, whether, on account of the possession of fire-arms, murder be not committed with greater facility, and the chance of escape increased, and whether it be not desirable, in order to facilitate the detection of the assassin, that there should be some regulation for the registration of arms. If the hon. baronet who just addressed the House had, instead of referring to scraps of newspapers, considered the provisions of the bill, he would not have fallen into the mistakes which he has committed. The hon. baronet said, that under this bill the Protestant yeomanry will be protected, whilst Roman Catholics will be prevented from having arms. The hon. baronet said he knew of districts in which the bill would have a tendency to facilitate the possession of arms by Protestants. I think I can satisfy the House, that the government have no desire to show favour to one class of her Majesty's subjects at the expense of another. By the existing law on the statute book, and in actual operation, an exception is made in favour of persons serving in yeomanry corps; they are exempt from the liability to register their arms. By the bill now before the House, the members of yeomanry corps are placed on the same footing as all other persons, and the exemption they now possess will no longer be extended to them [Sir H. W. Barron: There are no yeomanry corps now on service in Ireland]. I say that at present the members of yeomanry corps are not compelled to register their arms, and by our bill we compel them hereafter to register their arms. At any rate, that provision shows the spirit in which this bill is framed. The speech made on the night before last by the right hon. and learned member for Dungarvon, was characterised, as is usually the case with all the speeches made by that gentleman, by this peculiarity, that it contained a vindication of the measure which he so strenuously opposed. It was justly observed by my right hon. friend (Sir James Graham), that in the first part of his address, the right hon. and learned gentleman spoke with the calmness of a witness. In that speech, the right hon. gentleman, once the member for the county of Tipperary, one of the principal scenes of outrage in Ireland, and now, I believe, a resident, certainly a proprietor, in that county, knowing its local circumstances, acquainted with the disposition to outrage which prevails among the people, and aware of the peculiar character of the crimes by which some parts of that county had been disgraced,—the right hon. gentleman gave a picture of the state of Tipperary, which establishes that distinction between the circumstances of England and of Ireland, which justify the House in prolonging the duration of the measure now before them. I have heard nothing in the details of crime—I have seen nothing in the reports of police-offices—I have heard no opinions of magistrates on the subject, which have made half so strong an impression on my mind as the few sentences delivered in the character of a witness by the right hon. member. He said that the state of that country was such, that he thought crime could not be effectually repressed unless the landed proprietors came forward to serve upon the petty juries; and he advised that, as it was found difficult to induce persons to undertake the voluntary performance of such important functions, the landed proprietors should supersede the class of ordinary petty jurors, being compelled to serve under a fine of £500 or £600. That is to say, the principle of the law being "Judicium parium et lex terra;" that jurors shall, under ordinary circumstances, be selected from persons of the same class and position as the individual whom they are to try. "Such" (says the right hon. gentleman) "is the state of this district, with which I am perfectly acquainted, that on a fine of £500 or £600, I would compel the gentry and the lauded proprietors to come forward and perform the functions of petty jurors."

Why, what is the effect of such a course? The outrages being of an agrarian character, the disputes relating to the possession of land—the question at issue being between the tenants and the landed proprietors—the remedy proposed by the right hon. gentleman would enable the landed proprietors to sit as judges in cases between their tenants and themselves. What must be the state of this district when the right hon. gentleman, a privy-councillor, an eminent lawyer, considers it necessary, under a penalty of £500 or £600, to require the landed proprietors to perform such duties? "Then" (says the right hon. gentleman) "it is necessary, for the purpose of facilitating the detection of crime, that you should give full security to the witnesses."

These engagements to provide for the witnesses, unless entered with the utmost caution, partake of the character of an inducement to give evidence. The right hon. gentleman added, "I know a case in which a humble neighbour of mine prosecuted persons charged with murder to conviction; I applied to the government, I claimed their interference, and by the exercise of my legitimate influence I induced the government to provide for the expatriation of that man, and of his family, and for their continued maintenance in the colony to which they were sent." "And" (said the right hon. gentleman) "apply the same principle; invite witnesses to come forward; guarantee to them their removal to a distant land, and on their arrival there, subsistence for themselves and their families."

Sir, there are many things which whig and liberal lawyers will say, which, were they uttered by conservative politicians, would excite suspicion, and meet with grave condemnation. There are some who, when a whig government administered the affairs of this country, could reconcile it to themselves to give an unanimous vote for the second reading of this bill, but who, when the same measure is proposed by us, denounce it as an outrage and an insult to Ireland. I am sure the right hon. gentleman, in applying his principle, would, as far as possible, guard it against the possibility of abuse. He would, I am convinced, as far as possible, take care that this promise to provide comfortable appointments and subsistence in distant colonies, should not degenerate into an encouragement of false testimony. I am convinced that, if the right hon. gentleman's will could prevail, none but the honest witness—the witness determined to declare the truth—would be selected by him for this mark of favour—favour, at least, as compared with the consequences of continued residence in his own country. But, speaking not of honest and truth-telling witnesses, what is the state of a country as to the commission of crime, and as to the administration of justice, when he who is disposed to bring the assassin to punishment is obliged to flee his native country, and to seek refuge for himself and his family in a distant land? "And his family!" says the right hon. gentleman very significantly. Oh no! it will not be sufficient to remove the witness, it will not be sufficient to provide the man with employment; you must remove his innocent wife and children with him, or they will be the victims of the assassin's confederates. It is an easy matter to talk lightly of this way of providing for witnesses; but I ask you to consider what is the attachment of a peasant to his native land. You take this unoffending man—this man disposed to co-operate with you in the execution of the law, in furthering the ends of justice; you bring him to the witness-box; you ask for his testimony against an assassin. Compare the number of committals with the number of convictions, and is it improbable that the trial may result in the acquittal of the prisoner? He is restored to his family; he retires triumphantly from the dock in full possession of his liberty, laughing at the administration of justice. What, then, is to become of the honest man who gave unavailing testimony? He is not to remain in the country. The farm that he has cultivated he is to relinquish, and you think it will be a compensation to him, perhaps advanced in life, to offer him an asylum in Canada or some other colony! That is the scheme of the right hon. gentleman, and he says, too, he would apply the same laws to England and to Ireland. But I say, cannot we find better means of giving security to that witness, by facilitating the registration of fire-arms and preventing the improper use of them, than by admitting him to give his evidence on the expectation of our afterwards facilitating his expatriation to one of the colonies? I must repeat, that the picture of the state of society in Ireland which was drawn by the right hon. gentleman, coming as it did from such unquestionable authority, constitutes, in my opinion, a sufficient reason in itself for passing a law to provide greater security for life in that country. With respect to the character of this bill, I have heard in the course of this debate much declamation against unconstitutional bills; but I must say, that I have heard more unconstitutional doctrine from hon. members opposite than I ever before heard in the course of one session. When I heard an hon. and learned gentleman, in the midst of those expressions of respect which he was pleased to apply to myself,

Say that this detestable bill, if it had been proposed by Lord Morpeth, should have had his assent, I must confess my surprise. [Mr. C. Butler: I consider the bill a matter of indifference.] Then, according to the hon. and learned gentleman, this bill is a matter of such entire indifference, that his vote for or against it would be given according to the politics of the Irish secretary who might propose it; but I cannot accept that compliment to the bill. I consider it a measure of grave importance. It is with deep regret that I propose such a bill. I am sorry to maintain a distinction between England and Ireland in this respect. I do think that the obligation to register fire-arms, and the trouble you give, and the prohibition to bear arms,—all this I do think a matter of great regret, which nothing but necessity can justify; but that necessity would be equally cogent whether the bill was brought in by a liberal or a conservative Irish secretary. It rests for its vindication, not on political considerations, but it rests for its vindication on necessity—the necessity of taking security for life in a country where outrages of a peculiar description prevail. I cannot, therefore, admit that the bill is a matter of indifference. The question, then, for the House to consider is, whether, after the admission of the Irish members so late ago as 1841, that such a bill was necessary for Ireland, the whole difference being a change in the government, the House will take upon itself the responsibility by their vote of to-night of putting a stop to any measure for the registration of fire-arms in Ireland? Particular parts of the bill will be open to discussion hereafter; the question for to-night is, whether, with respect to a measure which has been felt to be necessary by successive administrations, which has not been brought forward in any spirit of insult, but in reliance upon the opinion of the magistrates, and the reports of those who are charged with the preservation of the public peace, who have stated that they consider such a measure necessary,—whether you (unacquainted as you are with the local circumstances of Ireland) will undertake the responsibility, by negating the second reading, of putting a stop to the system of registering arms in Ireland? As I said before, the measure was brought on at a period of the session which was too early to allow of its having been framed with reference to the present state of Ireland; in fact (as my noble friend behind me (Lord Elliot) states, and, I am sure, no hon. gentleman will desire to question his assertion, the bill was prepared last year, and therefore, I again repeat, was not brought forward with reference to the agitation that is now going on in Ireland. With reference to the other subjects, which, though not properly subjects of the debate of to-night, have, nevertheless, not unnaturally been brought on in the course of it, I shall be perfectly ready to go into them on other occasions. At present, I shall only say, on the part of the government, perfectly prepared as I am to vindicate, I trust successfully, the course which the government has thought it right to pursue—determined as we are to exercise every legitimate and constitutional power which we possess, for the purpose of contending against the accomplishment of those acts which the unanimous opinion of every member of this House, from England and Scotland, and of a great number of members from Ireland, declare to be equivalent to a dismemberment of the empire, and a separation of Ireland from the sister country—but postponing for the present the discussion of that question, and the consideration of other measures we have adopted, I ask the House, which will have the opportunity at a future time of considering the clauses of the present bill in detail—I ask the House not to take upon itself the responsibility of declaring by its vote that, with respect to Ireland, there shall be no special condition imposed as to the registration and the use of arms.

BILL read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

SUGAR DUTIES.

JUNE 22, 1843.

The House in Committee on the Sugar Duties Bill. On clause 1 being read,—“That the duties imposed by 6th and 7th William IV., chap. 26th, and 3rd and 4th Victoria, chap. 17, be continued till July 5, 1844.”—Mr. Hawes proposed, by way of amendment, to add the following words:—“Except so far as regards the duties on foreign brown Muscovado sugar, not being refined, which shall be hereafter charged at the rate of 34s. the cwt."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The right hon gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Labouchere), expressed a hope that some explanation would be given by her Majesty's government as to the course of negotiations on this subject, past or future—but the right hon. gentleman must be aware, that great embarrassment might result to the public service if any member of her Majesty's government entered into details with respect to matters of this nature. I may say, generally, that her Majesty's government have, within the last year, submitted propositions to the government of Brazil for the purpose of placing our commercial relations with that country, which will terminate in November, 1844, upon a basis which appears to her Majesty's government more satisfactory than that which at present exists. These propositions, so made by her Majesty's government to the government of Brazil, had reference to the article of sugar. We proposed to the government of Brazil to treat for the freer admission of Brazilian sugar into the markets of this country, on the condition that the government of Brazil should adopt some measures for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the slave population of that empire, and leading, not immediately, but gradually and ultimately, to the extinction of slavery in its dominions. It was unnecessary to enter into any discussion with the government of Brazil upon that basis, because the government of Brazil intimated to her Majesty's government, in the first instance, that they would not consent to treat upon any other basis than that contended for by the hon. member for Dumfries—namely, that the agricultural produce of Brazil should be admitted into this country, not only upon as favourable a footing as that on which the produce of any foreign country was admitted, but upon the same footing as that on which we admitted the produce of our own colonies. Subsequently, a modification of that proposal was submitted, permitting an advantage of 10 per cent to the produce of our colonies; but that was understood to be the ultimatum of the Brazilian government, and the negotiation with that government then terminated. Our treaty with the government of Brazil expires, as I have before stated, in November, 1844. The hon. member for Dumfries has frequently said, "If you object to make a treaty with Brazil, why don't you treat for the admission of Java sugar into this country, or for the admission of sugar produced in the islands of the Indian Archipelago or in China into our markets?" These are sources from which you may admit the competition of foreign sugar, free from the objection that that sugar is the produce of slave-labour."

The hon. gentleman says, "Here you may obtain sugar the produce of free labour; show a disposition to break up the West-India monopoly; and remove your prohibitive duties in favour of sugar which is produced by free-labour."

But the answer to the hon. gentleman, at present at least, is this, that by our treaties with Brazil and other countries producing sugar by slave-labour, we are not at liberty, during the existence of those treaties, to permit the importation into this country of sugar, the produce of free-labour. You cannot permit the introduction of China or Java sugar into this country, while your present treaty with Brazil continues in force; because that treaty gives to Brazil the right of insisting upon the admission of its sugar, though it may be the produce of slave-labour, to the exclusion of other sugar, although it may be the produce of free-labour. There is no stipulation in the treaty, I presume, that the conditions must be the same. You are not at liberty, I apprehend, to say to Brazil, it is true we admit Java sugar, but it is the produce of free-labour; yours is the produce of slave-labour. Brazil, I apprehend, has under the existing treaty a right to call upon us to admit her sugar on the most favourable footing. This is an answer to the argument of the hon. member for Dumfries as to the introduction of Java sugar. Well, then, Sir, I must still contend, notwithstanding that I admit, as I have before admitted, the benefits to be derived from a supply of cheap sugar, that in the existing feeling of the people of Brazil with respect to the slave-trade, it cannot be expected that this country, after our sacrifices for the abolition of the slave-trade and of slavery, and after the professions we have made in the face of the world, could admit, without fixing a stain on the character of the nation, Brazilian sugar to the British market, unless we obtained at the same time further concessions from them in favour of the suppression of the slave-trade. Sir, I am much afraid that the history of the slave-trade in Brazil will be found to reflect any thing but honour on that country, any thing but honour on their legislation, any thing but honour on their executive. Sir, when some time ago it became necessary to remove our fleet, which was stationed on the Brazilian coasts for the prevention of the slave-trade, to protect British interests in the river Plate, the Brazilians took advantage of its absence, and the slave-trade immediately rose again with a vigour never before known. I state this with confidence, for I have here a list of the ships that introduced slaves, with accounts of the artifices that were made use of, and the manner in which the slaves were conveyed. Representations, I need not say, were made by our minister to the Brazilian authorities, and the most earnest remonstrances addressed to them. But look at the extent of Brazil, and the vast tracts of virgin land in that country fit for the cultivation of sugar. Public feeling there (it is impossible to deny it) is in favour of the free admission of slaves, for the purpose of cultivating those tracts and raising sugar on them; and therefore, although, as the right hon. gentleman says—and the argument has some plausibility—we encourage slave-labour and the slave-trade by becoming the carriers of their produce in the way we do at present, and therefore we cannot consistently refuse to take their sugar; yet depend upon it, if you open the British market to their sugar, although there is some analogy to our present proceedings, the practical consequence would be, that you would give an immediate stimulus to the slave-trade. You would discourage the growth of that spirit which you have been fostering for years; you would be taking a different course; you would give rise to new exertions on the part of the slave-traders. There cannot be a doubt, I apprehend, that such would be the practical result of opening the British market to Brazilian sugar. It has been said by some hon. gentlemen that her Majesty's ministers are afraid to deal with monopoly, that we are afraid to come into collision with the West-India interest. Now, if we were to put aside considerations of justice, and looked only for popularity and support in this House, I do believe that the very best thing we could do would be to sacrifice the West-Indian interest. [An hon. member, "No."] The hon. member only heard the last part of my sentence, that the very best thing we could do would be to sacrifice the West-Indian interest. What I did say was, that if the government, casting aside other considerations, were to look only for parliamentary support, if they disregarded considerations of justice and sought only popularity, then their best course would be to admit to the British market the produce of Brazil and Cuba. That was what I said; but then it is said we have purchased the right by the grant of £20,000,000 of compensation money, of dealing as we like with the West-Indian proprietors. Now, if I take an individual proprietor, and say I purchased your slaves, and I have a right to deal with you as may appear expedient—if I take the case of a single proprietor, perhaps in strict justice I might have a right to say so. But still, I very much doubt whether on the whole a compensation in full has been given him for so great a change as has taken place. I have made anxious inquiries into this question; and in order to test the truth, instead of a vague statement, I asked for an account of the estate of an individual. On an average of years, previous to the commencement of the apprenticeship system, that estate was yielding about £10,000 a-year. During the apprenticeship system the average was about £6,400 a-year. But I wished to ascertain what were the returns now of payments made and profits received, and this is the account, the accuracy of which I have every reason to confide in. From the 15th January to the 31st of December, 1840, the payments for the wages of labour, the island taxes, the repairs of machinery and other things, amounted to £10,681; the receipts for the same period were £7,028. This was in 1840. For the same period in 1841, the payments were £9,889, the receipts £7,042. In the last year, when, as it was said, a sufficient interval—or, as the right hon. gentleman called it, breathing-time—had been given, when the experiment had been tried, what were the results? From the 1st of January to the 31st of December, last year, the payments were £9,795, the receipts £7,230. So that for the last three years, an estate from which the average returns were £10,000 a-year, averaged a net loss on the three crops of £3,081. [Mr. Hawes: The estate belongs to a resident proprietor]. No, the proprietor is not resident; and I admit that his being resident might possibly make a difference; but I was comparing the present with the former produce of the estate. Probably in former years also the residence of the proprietor would have increased the profits.

I was only showing, and I think conclusively, from this account, that though, perhaps, more than £10,000 or £14,000 might have been received in such a case from the slave compensation fund, still, noble as the gift was as respects us, it cannot be considered that the proprietor has received complete compensation for the change which has arisen from the abolition of slavery. However, I am not complaining of that abolition, or of the amount of the sum received; I am only dealing with the argument that we have paid you the £20,000,000, and therefore have a right to deal with you as we like. I say again, that if I take the case of an individual proprietor, it may be that he has in strict justice no reason to complain; but when I come to legislate on such a subject, I must look at the actual condition of the colonies and the nature of the connection which exists between them and the mother country. [An hon. member: "Divide, divide."] I am always ready to accede to the wishes of the House, and the more so on the present occasion; the subject being one which has so frequently been discussed, nothing new can be said upon it. I rose with pain, and should not have done so were it not that hon. gentlemen opposite taunted government with being silent. I had been asked what had been done with respect to the negotiations with Brazil? I have stated as distinctly as I can the course which has been pursued, and I now hope that the House will consent to the proposition of the government.

The committee divided on the question, "That the words moved by Mr. Hawes be added:" Ayes, 122; Noes, 203; Majority, 81.

POSTAGE REFORM—MR. R. HILL.

JUNE 27, 1843.

Sir Thomas Wilde having moved for a select committee to inquire into the progress which had been made in carrying into effect the recommendations of Mr. Hill for post-office improvement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, as an amendment, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the measures adopted for the general introduction of the system of penny postage, and for facilitating the conveyance of letters throughout the country."

SIR ROBERT PEEL felt, with his right hon. colleague, conscious that the government had done every thing in their power to give a full and fair trial to Mr. Hill's plan. It would have been a great dereliction of public duty, if any doubt they might have entertained at a former period, had led them to take any other course upon acceding to office than the course they had taken with regard to Mr. Hill, that, namely, of facilitating his plan in every possible way. He had never felt a doubt as to the great social advantages of lowering the duty on letters; the only doubt was as to its financial effect: in all other respects the result of any inquiry would show, that whatever might have been the loss to the revenue, much advantage had been derived in what concerned the encouragement of industry, and the promotion of communication between the humbler classes of the community. He had already, elsewhere, given his full testimony to the ability and disinterestedness of Mr. Hill, and he willingly repeated that testimony now. The right hon. gentleman had used the expression "dismissed" in reference to the government's having dispensed with the services of Mr. Hill. He did not think that a proper term to be used. He thought, as his right hon. friend thought, that those who originated the penny postage always considered Mr. Hill's appointment a temporary one—that they considered that for a certain period, in the first instance two years, it was desirable that Mr. Hill should lend his assistance to the Treasury in carrying out his plan. They afterwards extended the two years to three; but he certainly always had the impression that at the end of the third year, by which time the plan would be satisfactorily in operation, it was their expressed intention and intimation, that Mr. Hill's services were to be dispensed with. It was, therefore, no dissatisfaction with Mr. Hill's conduct, no indifference to his services, that led him and his right hon. friend to take the course they had taken; they took the course which, as they clearly understood, had been contemplated by their predecessors in office, and which—a point of still greater importance—they considered most consistent with the public interest. He differed from the right hon. gentleman opposite as to the course which ought to have been pursued. It appeared to him, that had it been deemed necessary to retain Mr. Hill's services, and had it been conceived that the post-office authorities were hostile to the plan, prejudiced against its principles and its details, and indisposed to lend themselves with zeal and cordiality to carrying it out, the plan should have been, not to retain Mr. Hill in control over the post-office (yet unconnected with it), but to have at once made him secretary of the post-office. That department would thus have been no longer in a position continually to obstruct—as the complaint was—the due execution of the plan; but Mr. Hill himself, the person so deeply anxious for the success of the scheme, would have the immediate control of it. The other plan, of keeping Mr. Hill on from year to year, uncertain of the tenure of his office, was, in every point of view, most inconsistent with the public interest. It was due to the character of the gentleman at the head of the post-office, of the men whom the former government had placed there on account of their knowledge and intelligence—it was due to the secretary of the post-office to say, that it was not possible he could have thrown any obstruction in Mr. Hill's way, or that he had not cordially co-operated with him to ensure the success of his plan. Colonel Maberly, however, when he was examined, was bound to explain his opinion, and express any doubts he might entertain of the success of Mr. Hill's plan. But it was doing Colonel Maberly a great injustice to suppose, that any such circumstance could interfere with the strict performance of his public duty, or to believe, whatever might be the nature of his opinions, that he had not exerted himself to the utmost of his power to promote the success of Mr. Hill's plan, though he had before expressed doubts of its success. Colonel Maberly was a gentleman who had sat in that House, and during the time he was in parliament had recommended himself to general esteem by his intelligence; and he certainly was not a man so imbued with departmental prejudices, that he should lend himself to any unworthy scheme, or fail to co-operate with Mr. Hill in order to ensure the success of his great experiment. Again, with respect to Lord Lowther, it was hardly necessary for him, after the testimony of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Wallace), whose political predilections rendered his judgment on this point unsuspected—after that hon. gentleman's praise of the manner in which Lord Lowther executed the office of postmaster-general, he felt it was not necessary for him to say one word respecting the qualifications of Lord Lowther. He was bound to say, considering his position and the high situation which Lord Lowther had filled, that he thought the noble lord had made a great sacrifice in accepting the office. On his own appointment to office he knew no other person of great talents, great intelligence, and great industry, who was so well calculated, if placed at the head of the post-office, and to answer for the fair trial of the experiment, as Lord Lowther. He had therefore asked the noble lord to accept the office; and he was sure that, so far from that appointment being intended to be an obstruction to the success of Mr. Rowland Hill's plan, that nothing was more calculated to ensure its success, and that he could not do a greater service to Mr. Rowland Hill's scheme than to appoint Lord Lowther to the office of postmaster-general. He differed from the hon. gentleman opposite, in thinking that a postmaster-general, of the intelligence and independence of mind of Lord Lowther, and who would not use the influence of his office improperly, was better to be at the head of the system than any number of commissioners. That Lord Lowther was ready to give his support to the system, he took all the assurance possible. He had examined the votes of Lord Lowther in the committee to inquire into Mr. Rowland Hill's plan, and he had found that the noble lord had voted for all Mr. Warburton's resolutions. He voted for the resolution that there should be an uniform rate of postage, which embodied the great principles of Mr. Hill's system. Lord Lowther had approved of the adoption of the plan, and was a decided friend to Mr. Hill's system. With respect to the committee to which his right hon. friend had assented, he thought the House was fairly entitled now to inquire, considering the time which had elapsed, into the working of the system. He should not enter into details, which had been fully explained by his right hon. friend, the right hon. gentleman opposite, and the hon. and learned gentleman who introduced the motion.

He hoped the committee would apply itself to the objects stated in the amendment of his right hon. friend, and consider what had been adopted, and its effects, and not attempt to subject to the supervision of parliament the whole of the business of the post-office, which would only make the committee, were it to do so, fail in its inquiries. It was generally supposed that the arrangements of the post-office were very simple; but in fact they were very complicated, adapted to the varying circumstances of different parts of the country, and none but those who saw the whole could form a fair judgment of the system. If the committee should think of supervising the treasury and the post-office, the public would derive no advantage from its labours. It was right that it should contemplate the general results of the new scheme, and inquire fully into its effects, both on the country and on the revenue; but it would not be right for the committee to supervise the public offices, which could only occupy the time of the committee with mere details, and lead to no satisfactory results. If the treasury and the post-office were to be subjected to the supervision of the committee, the public business would be paralysed. Separately, then, from inquiring into the departments of the government with which the system had no concern, he thought that government would not be justified in now refusing to allow a full inquiry into the progress and success of the great experiment. He considered it proper, as he had said before, to abstain from entering into details; but the House was entitled to know that a fair trial had been given to Mr. Hill's plan, to ascertain the extent of its social advantages, and its effect on the revenue of the country. While such should be the course of the House of Commons, he would assure them, that while he continued in office he would lend all his weight, influence, and authority, to ensure full justice to the new system.

The motion, as amended, agreed to.

STATE OF IRELAND.

JULY 11, 1843.

In the fourth night's debate on Mr. W. Smith O'Brien's motion—"That the House resolve itself into a Committee, to take into consideration the causes of the discontent at present existing in Ireland," &c.

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Sir, in considering the character of the motion which is now under discussion, and in noticing some of the topics which have been introduced in the course of that discussion, I shall commence by observing that I entertain the intention—an intention to which, I trust, I shall be enabled to adhere—of obliterating altogether the recollection of every thing which may have passed during this debate of a mere personal or party character. It may be necessary for me, in the course of my observations, to defend the government against charges which have been brought against it; but in doing so, I shall rest no part of that defence upon recrimination of others, or upon a vindication of the course which the government has pursued, by attempting to show that it has not been more objectionable than the course which others had previously taken. I feel too deeply the importance of the subject before us, not to wish not to be diverted from it by those considerations which are frequently introduced in the heat of debate, which perhaps are necessary in party conflict, and which adds so much zest and excitement to the debates. But, if I forego the advantages which belong to the interest that such topics excite, yet the attention with which all have been heard who have spoken in this discussion, and the disposition which seems to be entertained to attach due weight and importance to all that may be addressed to the House on the subject, convince me that I shall receive as much attention by confining myself strictly to the matter before us, as if I were to indulge in party feelings or recriminations. If I thought that the object of the motion which the hon. member has brought forward, were to obtain a calm and deliberate inquiry into matters connected with the condition of Ireland, my difficulties in opposing the motion would be immensely increased—but I do not believe that it has been brought forward for the purpose of producing that inquiry. We are charged with resisting inquiry—but many who support the motion admit that such an inquiry as I have described is not the object, and some will vote for the motion, because they believe it implies a want of confidence in her Majesty's government, and an opinion that the settlement of the questions involved ought to be transferred to other hands. No doubt the inference which the public must draw will be, that the carrying of this motion will be tantamount to a declaration of want of confidence in her Majesty's government; and if those who placed us here think that we are not fit for the settlement of affairs—that there is something of party connection which prevents us from taking a proper course—that there is something in the policy which we have pursued with regard to Ireland upon which they differ in opinion from us—then I agree with the hon. and learned member for Bath, that the present is too important a question to permit party connections or party considerations to prevail over their opinions. It will be better for hon. gentlemen to follow up a speech indicating any such feeling, by a vote to the same effect. It is with no unfriendly feeling that I say of this debate, as I say of the Arms-bill, that if any hon. member think the motion should be carried, and that we proposed measures connected with Ireland which have a tendency to offend, whilst no good can result from them, it is then the duty of those who entertain such opinions, whatever the consequence may be, to give the legitimate and practical expression to those opinions. So far from considering that hostile or unfriendly, I think it would be a more manly and parliamentary course, and one infinitely more friendly to the government, that they should thus practically express their opinions, than to imply a difference of opinion from the government, whilst they lent it a hollow support. I speak, Sir, not only of those who have expressed their opinions in this debate, but also of those who have not had an opportunity of speaking; and I say that no party or personal consideration ought to deter them, on an occasion like the present, from giving their honest and sincere opinion—that practical expression which is best implied by a vote. I must now revert to that part of the speech made by the hon. member who introduced this motion, wherein the hon. member said, that he intended his motion to be an arraignment of the conduct of the government, and of the Imperial Parliament, towards Ireland. I shall first refer to that part of his impeachment of the conduct of parliament, which relates to its conduct as to liberality towards Ireland in a pecuniary point of view. The hon. member says, that one of his reasons for being inclined, at least, towards the repeal of the Union, is a strong opinion, that the conduct of the Imperial Parliament towards Ireland, in respect of pecuniary grants for her peculiar domestic interests, has been parsimonious and niggardly in the extreme, and he also charges parliament with having shown a disposition to do injustice to Ireland with the pecuniary burthens imposed upon her. My firm impression is, that that accusation is unjust and unfounded. You may say, that these are matters of small importance; and I would not have noticed them if they had not been brought forward as one of the prime grounds for the impeachment of the Imperial Parliament. In point of fact, however, they are not matters of small importance, for they are calculated to make a deep impression on the minds of the people of Ireland. The hon. gentleman repeats, what has been said before, that Ireland has been treated in a parsimonious spirit. Now, Sir, these are topics that have undergone repeated consideration. They have been submitted to the tribunals best qualified to examine them with temper and impartiality, to committees of the House of Commons, composed of members actuated by no unkind or unfriendly spirit towards Ireland. There was a committee appointed, some years since, at the instance of a noble lord then a member of this House, from whom I differ in political opinions, but who, during his tenure of a seat in this House, was always remarkable for his attention to the affairs of Ireland, and for his desire to see justice done to her. I allude to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the present Lord Monteaigue. Charges similar to those now raised against parliament had then been brought forward, and I now hold in my hand an extract from the report of the committee on the Irish miscellaneous estimates, it says:—"That the committee, in discharging the duty intrusted to them by the House, felt it their duty to refer in the first instance to the principle under which the Irish civil estimates were originally made a part of the public expenditure. By a clause of the Act of Union, the parliament of the United Kingdom was bound to provide, that a sum not less than the sum granted by the parliament of Ireland, on an average of six years immediately preceding the 1st of January, 1800, in premiums for the internal encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, or for maintaining institutions for charitable and pious purposes, should be applied for a period of twenty years, to such local purposes in Ireland, in such manner as the parliament of the United Kingdom should direct."

That was the contract made. The report then proceeds—"The sum so voted by the Irish parliament was £73,277 per annum, which, for twenty years, would not have exceeded the sum of £1,465,540; but the parliament of the United Kingdom had not confined its liberality within the limits prescribed by a rigid adherence to that rule—for not only have those grants been continued, but considerably augmented."

I will not read the details; but the sums granted by the Irish parliament as the rule—if there had been a niggardly spirit in the Imperial Parliament—would have been £1,460,000, whilst the total amount for twenty-eight years voted by the Imperial Parliament was £5,348,000, making a sum exceeding in a threefold proportion the amount contemplated by the precise terms of the Act of Union.—"It was also necessary to call the attention of the House," proceeds the report, "to the additional sums voted under the head of Irish miscellaneous estimates and civil contingencies. On an average of six years preceding the 1st of January, 1800, they amounted to £127,860. The total amount for twenty-eight years since that time was £5,003,062, in addition to the other £5,000,000, making together a total of £10,000,000 under these two heads."

It is impossible, then, that the ground of accusation against parliament for want of liberality towards Ireland can be maintained. If I compare the sums expended on Ireland with those that have been voted for Scotland, I find an immense preponderance in favour of the former country. And here I entirely exclude the expenditure for the Lord-lieutenant's establishment, and other expenses connected with the civil government, which are necessarily much heavier in Ireland; but, excluding these, I find that the aggregate expenditure on Scotland in the last seven years, amounts only to £668,000, while that of Ireland is no less than £2,262,000. Do I grudge this expenditure? Do I say that this liberality has been misplaced? Not at all. And I would not even have referred to the subject, had it not been for my desire to disprove the allegation of the hon. gentleman, that parliament has acted in a penurious and niggardly spirit towards Ireland. If I take the fulfilment of the obligation contracted at the time of the Union, and test the liberality of parliament by that, I find that the sum voted amounted to three times the sum which parliament contracted to vote. And if I contrast the votes for Ireland with those for Scotland, I find the latter in seven years amounting to about £660,000, and the former to the sum of £2,260,000. So much for the contrast of parliament with respect to the votes. Now with regard to the burthen of taxation; can it be truly said that there is a spirit in the Imperial Parliament hostile to Ireland? The hon. gentleman referred to the scale of contribution proposed at the time of the Union, and considered that the 2.17ths required from Ireland, was too great an amount in proportion to her revenue. Surely the question now is, not what Ireland was required to pay at the period of the Union; the question is, what is now the animus and feeling of parliament towards Ireland?—what is the burthen Ireland is required to bear?—what is the confidence Ireland must feel that she shall have justice done to her in respect to taxation? If the two countries are to be united in respect to indirect taxation, it is exceedingly difficult to make any discrimination. The great object is, if you are to be united, to oppose no obstacles to perfect free inter-commerce—to have no system of drawbacks—to oppose no checks to Irish produce coming over to this country, or to the introduction of British produce into Ireland. And therefore, in respect to indirect taxation, nothing would be more difficult or unwise for Ireland herself, than an attempt to establish a discriminating duty. Your customs' duty, as a general rule, must be the same, or you would place impediments on commerce which would be highly injurious. With regard to the excise, the principle was nearly the same. But when there is a distinction drawn with respect to indirect taxation, it is just, perhaps, as it ought to be, in favour of Ireland. Then, as to direct taxation, what is the truth? Would Ireland benefit as to direct taxation by a repeal of the Union? Considering the establishment she would have to maintain, is it possible that a repeal of the Union would benefit Ireland with respect to direct taxation? They pay no window duty in Ireland, though every other part of the empire pays it. There are no assessed taxes there; but other parts of the empire are subject to them. And in a great financial crisis, when we found it necessary to raise a large sum of money by direct taxation—when we proposed the property-tax, Ireland was exempted from its operation. Now take the post-office. Why, at this moment, the whole of the post-office service in Ireland is conducted at the public charge. There was not, I think, in the last year, more than a sum of £1000 remitted from Ireland on account of the post-office, and perhaps the sum of £1000 in the year preceding; but with the exception of that £2000, since the new arrangement of the post-office duty, Ireland has remitted nothing. The whole advantage of the penny postage is given to Ireland gratuitously, at least the charge of the establishment is equivalent to the amount of the duty. Every other part of the empire has a duty upon soap; Ireland alone is exempt. Am I claiming credit for these things? Am I bringing them forward as a reason for especial gratitude upon the part of the Irish people? No. I would not have mentioned them, had not an overcharge of taxation been stated as a proof of our disposition to do injustice to Ireland; and I think the facts to which I have referred, afford conclusive proofs that there is no such disposition, either with respect to grants for the benefit of that country, or to the share she is called upon to take in the general burthens of the empire; and that the argument in favour of the repeal of the Union upon this ground is utterly unfounded. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to attack the executive government of Ireland, and others have followed in the same course. Why, what are the charges that have been brought against us? Have you charged us with any act of injustice or intolerance? Have you brought forward any proofs on our part, of a disposition to encourage or revive religious animosities? Have we rescinded any of the acts of our predecessors, done with the intent of marking disapprobation of a religious spirit hostile to the Roman Catholics? On the contrary; the only things you have to refer to as a proof of misconduct on the part of the Irish government, are almost confined to the appointment to judicial offices of two gentlemen, against whom it seems the only objection is, that they may have been too merciful in the administration of justice. Sir, I am surprised to hear such sweeping condemnations of the government, and to find, when we come to facts, that they rest on such narrow foundations. It is disparaging to Ireland to hear such peculiar importance attached to what relates to judicial patronage. The hon. gentleman says, that one of his charges is, that Ireland is made use of to provide for the dependents of ministers. [Mr. S. O'Brien: I stated it merely from the papers.] Yes, you stated it from the papers; but you went on and adopted the charge, and you repeated that patronage was made use of in Ireland for the benefit of the friends and relations of ministers. Now, if there is one source of patronage in Ireland likely to be more fruitful than any other, the hon. gentleman will probably admit that it will be found in the Irish church. Now, in vindication of myself and the government, I shall take the liberty of reading the first letter written by me to the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland on the subject of the patronage of the Irish church:—"Let it be understood, that in respect to the church preferments you will act upon your own sense of duty, and on the result of your own inquiries; and, if that sense of duty prompts you to prefer the claims of professional merit, let your inquiries be directed to the ascertainment of those claims."

I am perhaps unwise, in some respects, in reading this letter. But we are charged with being subservient to party, with thinking of nothing but parliamentary support, with sacrificing the interests of Ireland to our political friends. I believe, however, the communication I have just read, and which was addressed by me to the Lord-lieutenant, is calculated to disprove the charge. This communication will, indeed, account for some of the difficulties we have had to contend with, in attempting to govern Ireland otherwise than by the intervention of a party. My letter proceeded,—“It is absolutely necessary, for the best interests both of church and state, that the patronage of the Irish church should be applied on such principles. I will willingly forego any parliamentary support which would only be conciliated by the disregard of those principles; though, indeed, the fact is, that (if such considerations are to be attended to) the interests of government are in the long run much better promoted by the honest exercise of patronage than by administering it to favour individual supporters.”

That letter, Sir, I addressed in September, 1841, to Earl De Grey, little thinking that an occasion would ever arise when I should be called on, in reply to an unjust charge, to refer to what I then wrote. The hon. gentleman has also referred to Mr. Purcell's mail-coach contract. For the sake of Ireland, not for the sake of the government, I deprecate such charges made in the old spirit of Irish partisanship. For what purpose has this House directed contracts to be made by public tender, but to prevent unfair favour by encouraging open competition? Public notice of the contract was given. The Irishman was at perfect liberty to underbid the Scotchman or the Englishman. The result of the open competition is, that the Scotchman offers to take the contract for two thousand pounds less, and the Scotchman gets it. And then we are told that we are insulting Ireland by transferring the contract from an Irishman! I regret that the contract passed out of the hands of an Irishman. I wish most heartily that an Irishman had made the lowest offer, and I did what I could do, consistently with my public duty, to prevent any injury in the individual case; but you are disparaging Ireland when you make a public grievance out of such matters as this—[Hear; Yes.] These are small matters, but they make a great portion of the charge against us—[No, no.] Then you concur with me that these things are not worth notice?—[Yes, yes.] I am glad to hear it; but still these charges have been made against the government. Then on the subject of education a most ungenerous charge has been made against us. Had we on this point been disposed to consult party considerations, with a powerful majority in this House, had we determined to withdraw the vote of public money from the national system of education, or had we been disposed to follow a course recommended to us by many plausible arguments, namely, to establish a separate system for the members of the established church, we should have gained great additional support. The strongest feeling existed on this subject in Ireland, and I was urged from many quarters to establish a separate system of education. There is no one act by which we could have more conciliated the conservative party in Ireland; no act which would have been attended with less danger to us in this House, than by yielding to the representations of our friends. We carefully examined the advantages of the present system, and the dangers of the separate system, and we hoped that, by persevering in the continuance of the national system, we might lay the foundation of an abatement of religious animosity, and in that hope we determined to adhere to the national system, though we thereby incurred much hostility. And what is now the return made to us here in the House of Commons? Why, the hon. gentleman says that the Protestant clergy are disgusted with the course we have taken, and he goes on to say that they have good reason to be so; and he makes himself the advocate of a spirit, to which, if I had acceded, no charge would have been urged against me with so much pertinacity. So much for the charges urged against the executive government by the hon. gentleman. I can truly say the intention of the government has been to act fairly towards all parties, to follow out the spirit of the law, which, by abolishing the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics, established equality between them and the rest of their fellow subjects. The hon. gentleman accuses the government of neglect towards Irishmen, and he read a number of appointments which Irishmen have not received, as if the test of good government was appointing his countrymen to efficient situations. He charges us with not having given a sufficient number of good things to his countrymen. I deny the charge altogether; but it applies to the noble lord opposite rather than to me, and I must allow him to answer for himself. The original Poor-law appointments, the commissioners of police, and several others, were all made by the noble lord. But the hon. gentleman should not confine his views exclusively to Ireland—he should have inquired whether there was not a corresponding number of Irishmen employed in England. I am sorry to hear such charges brought forward; but as they have been, I must observe, that I recollect that some years ago I had to appoint two commissioners for the metropolitan police. Now, these were two exclusively local appointments, and I remember that I neither thought of the religion, nor of the country of the persons I appointed; but it so happened that I selected two Irishmen to act in England, and I never heard a question raised as to the propriety of that appointment. I believe that the same principle holds in other appointments, and that the fact of a man's being an Irishman never operates to his prejudice. There is only one occasion on which I have heard the question raised. I had recently to appoint, in consequence of the liberality of parliament in voting monuments to naval heroes, to be placed in Greenwich, three sculptors; and it so happened that two out of the three were Irishmen; and the first time I heard of the fact, was in consequence of a paragraph in a newspaper, in which it was said that such is the favour shown to Irishmen, that two out of the three sculptors were Irishmen. I hope that this will remove from the hon. member's mind the impression, though the noble lord is responsible for the appointments in the police and the poor-law, that Irishmen are not equally favoured with Englishmen and Scotchmen. I am convinced that at least the desire of the government is to do equal justice to all three parts of the empire, and whether a candidate be an Irishman or a Scotchman, to appoint the man best qualified for the situation. In the course of the debate, it has appeared that the chief grievances of Ireland may be arranged under three heads—the social grievances, the political grievances, and the religious grievances. By the social grievances described those are meant—and it is impossible to deny their existence—which are connected with the state of the peasantry and of the great majority of the people in Ireland, the demand for land, which, on account of the poverty of the inhabitants, is the only source of existence, and the relation of landlord and tenant. I will first address myself to this social grievance. No man, Sir, can deny its existence; but it is not now known for the first time. It has formed the subject of repeated inquiries, and there are reports of committees of this House whose labours have lasted through whole sessions, containing the fullest information as to the state and condition of the peasantry of Ireland. No man can deny that it is most unsatisfactory, both with respect to the demand for labour and the possession of land; but when hon. gentlemen press the government to apply an immediate remedy, does not experience and common sense teach them, that it is impossible for the government or the legislature to devise an immediate remedy for evils of this nature? It is said, amend the law of landlord and tenant. With respect to any such amendment, my opinion is, that any alteration of the law which seriously affected what I understand by the right of property—namely, the free possession of property—any alteration of that great principle which distinguishes civilized from barbarous communities, would be most injurious to the interests of Ireland. If we tell the possessor of wealth that in Ireland the purchase of land will not be uncontrolled, we shall, in my opinion, strike a fatal blow at property. I speak, however, generally of the rights of property, and not of its abuses. If the hon. gentleman had proposed a committee of inquiry into the state of the law in England and in Ireland, which regulates the relation of landlord and tenant, who is there who would have opposed such an inquiry conducted on a fair principle, for ascertaining whether there is any difference in the law between the two countries, or whether there exists in Ireland any law which inflicts injury upon the people? I, Sir, for one, would certainly not have offered any opposition to such an inquiry; and it is fair to say, that if a remedy can be devised for an undue exercise of power by the landowners in Ireland, without affecting the rights of property, I will give my most attentive consideration to the subject. If you tell me that a tenant-at-will improves the property he occupies, relying on the justice and generosity of his landlord, and that, having so improved that property, he gives a vote, or does some other act, hostile to the feelings of the landlord, and is ejected from his tenancy, no compensation being made to him for his outlay,—if the landlord takes advantage of such hostile vote or act, for the purpose of availing himself of any benefit he may gain by taking possession of the land without affording compensation to the out-going tenant,—that is undoubtedly a gross injustice. I trust, and believe, that this is a case of rare occurrence; and if so, it may be difficult to apply a legislative remedy. But if such cases were of frequent occurrence, and a legislative remedy could be safely applied, I think it would be the duty of the House to afford such remedy. It is, however, a subject of great difficulty. Do not charge the present government with the neglect of it. The hon. member for Rochdale (Mr. S. Crawford), in a previous session, brought in a bill to apply a remedy. I was not a party to oppose that measure. I think, that the most vigorous opposition came from the hon. member for Limerick, [No.] Did not the hon. member vigorously oppose the bill of the hon. member for Rochdale, for regulating the relation of landlord and tenant? At any rate, words to that effect were attributed to the hon. member for Limerick—but as he says, that the words are not his, he could not have used them, but he is reported to have said, that he would not permit the bill to be introduced without the fullest explanation, as it would establish a dangerous precedent. [Mr. S. O'Brien: I have not looked at the report, but I cannot have used those terms.] It is evident there has been some mistake. The noble lord, the member for Sunderland, suggested measures of a very comprehensive nature, for the purpose of remedying some of the evils connected with the condition of the Irish people; and the noble lord expressed his opinion, that this House would act wisely in making grants on a very extensive scale for the construction of railways in Ireland. The noble lord went so far as to say, that if even a sum of £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 was expended in the formation of railways in Ireland, he thought it would be a cheap outlay on the part of this country. If I could agree with the noble lord, that such expenditure would really conduce to the permanent advantage of Ireland, I should be very little disposed to grudge a considerable outlay in order to lay the foundation of ultimate tranquillity. But I do entertain strong doubts as to the policy of making such extensive outlays for the construction of public works, unless you are most cautious as to the principle on which you proceed. Nothing is more fair than to apply the capital of a country to the execution of such works, if you are perfectly certain those works will succeed as a speculation—that profit will be derived from them, and that from the profit so obtained there may be a return for the advance of capital. But if that is not to be the case—if the railway is to be unprofitable—if there is to be no equivalent return, I doubt the policy of taxing the people of one part of the country for the purpose of erecting public works in another. As I said before, I do not object to the principle of the application of capital, provided the work you undertake to execute is likely to succeed, and to lay the foundation of permanent benefit; but if this is not the case, what is it but applying a temporary stimulus to the industry of the country? What will be your situation after this extensive outlay has been made, when there is no further demand for labour? But the noble lord the late Secretary for Ireland (Lord Morpeth) said, “I would demand a security from the Irish public. I would take a collateral guarantee, by requiring the counties to assess themselves to repay these advances.”

I confess, I greatly doubt the policy of establishing such a relation between the executive government and the counties of Ireland. The same result would follow which has been witnessed in the case of the union workhouses. You advanced some £1,200,000 or £1,500,000, for the purpose of building workhouses in Ireland, requiring repayment from the poor-rates. While the workhouses were in progress there was apparent satisfaction; the masons had plenty of work, and the carpenter was covered with chips, but the time came when they were finished, and the Poor-law brought into operation—they had then to be paid for; and you so contrived it, that the charge fell upon the poorest occupiers—the people were assessed at their twopences and fourpences. [Lord J. Russell: The parliament?] Undoubtedly, for I gave my vote in favour of the bill; but still the fact was so. Then, Sir, came a sudden fall in prices—consequent distress; and, to add to it, came the demand for the repayment of the advances made on account of the workhouses. I mentioned the sudden fall of prices, but, let me add, not in consequence of the tariff of last session, but in consequence of the abundant harvest of the last year. However, that fall in prices naturally enough produced discontent; and what has passed in Ireland since that period, proves that any immediate or sudden disturbance of the laws relating to the introduction of corn into this country, without some special legislation for the case of Ireland, must tend very much to aggravate the distress which now prevails there. Then, Sir, with respect to railways—the noble lord proposed, that we should get a guarantee for our capital from the counties of Ireland in which they were formed. But, Sir, suppose the railways completed, and I must say there seems to be a very mistaken notion very prevalent in the public mind as to the effects of railways. If they are the connecting links between two great manufacturing towns, or pass through a largely mercantile country, then no doubt they must naturally prove of the greatest advantage to those towns; but as to the country through which the railway itself passes, I cannot think that the passage of the merchandise contributes to promote any great prosperity. It is a convenience to the inhabitants; but as to the railway, except as the connecting link between large places, I doubt its great advantage. After we have executed the railway, however, unless it be a profitable undertaking, I conceive we should have made a bad application of the national wealth, and we should establish a conflict between the land and the executive government; for we should have to come upon the land and demand repayment, and it would be very difficult to adjust the proportions, or to say, that those parts of the country which are distant from the railroad should pay as much as those which are near. There can be no relation between the government and the land in Ireland, which can place them in a worse position than by calling upon the land, years after the work has been executed, to make a repayment. It is therefore on this account that I distrust the recommendation of the noble lord to execute the great lines of railroad, except on a guarantee for the repayment of the advances, by the personal security of those who are willing to undertake the speculation, or from the natural source of the returns from the speculation. I think, Sir, that another recommendation of the noble lord, to promote emigration as a means of relieving the distress of the people, is better entitled to serious consideration than the factitious stimulus to industry by the promotion of public works; be it understood, however, that I am not speaking of the application of the public revenue to the undertaking of works which are likely to be profitable, to which I think we ought to limit the advance of public money. With respect to the social condition of Ireland, therefore, there can be no party question—there can be no difference of political feeling; and in my opinion the interest of the landlord is mainly concerned in giving security to the tenant, and in inducing him to effect improvements in the land. So far as the condition of the country in its social relations is involved, there is fortunately no difference of opinion or of party views; and we are all at liberty, without reference to party considerations, to consider how far the law can be improved to redress the social grievances of Ireland. Now, Sir, with respect to the political condition of Ireland. In my opinion, and to the opinion I have often given expression, there ought to be perfect civil equality. There is an equality so far as the letter of the law is concerned, and I have stated before, when I sat on that side of the House—and if I had any interest in exciting prejudices, that was the time to raise them—that the government ought to act strictly upon the law, recognizing practically its spirit. If I am asked now, whether there ought to be any objection offered to the appointment of a person to civil office because he is a Catholic, or differs from me in religion, I say that there ought not. I know of no civil office for which he ought to be so disqualified. If it be a judicial office, I say there is no disqualification. If the claim of a Catholic entitled him to the judicial seat, he ought not to be excluded from it. In no civil office ought the fact of a man's being a Roman Catholic to be an impediment to his obtaining it. The noble lord says, that attacks were made on the late government in consequence of the appointment of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Sheil), of the right hon. gentleman the member for Kildare (Mr. O'Ferrall) as Secretary to the Admiralty, and of the hon. gentleman the member for Waterford (Mr. Wyse) as a lord of the treasury. I recollect, Sir, to have distinctly stated my opinions on this subject in a debate in this House, and it is too much to hold any government responsible for the violent speeches out of doors of hon. gentlemen professing to be its supporters. I never complained, nay, I entirely approved, of the selection to office of those gentlemen, and I cannot be charged with sanctioning these unjust imputations, for I distinctly stated to the House that I did not countenance that objection. Then the noble lord complained, that we have not removed from the statute-book an oath that is hurtful to the feelings of the Roman Catholics, and he has said that every person taking it charged Roman Catholics with idolatry. This, Sir, only shows that impressions of a grievance may be excited which are not perfectly well founded. I may, Sir, claim credit to myself for having been the person who removed from the statute-book this oath, which the noble lord thinks now remains, and is an offence to the feelings of the Roman Catholics. On proposing the Roman Catholic Relief Bill in 1829, I said, "It is proposed to repeal altogether for parliament, and for office generally, the declaration against transubstantiation. There is no object in retaining it as a test to be taken by the king's subjects, in respect to any office or franchise for which the Roman Catholic is to be hereafter qualified. It was applied originally solely as the instrument of exclusion. It is the mere abjuration of belief in certain doctrinal tenets of the Roman Catholic faith; and I believe there are few Protestants who would not have rejoiced in being relieved from the necessity of making that declaration as a qualification for the enjoyment of a merely civil privilege, even if it had been determined to continue Roman Catholic exclusion, and if other means of effecting it could have been devised. But when exclusion is to cease, let us be spared the pain of pronouncing an opinion for mere temporal purposes, in regard to the mysteries of religion, and branding as idolatrous the belief of others."

That, Sir, was the spirit with which I was actuated in 1829, and the way in which I gave practical effect to that spirit was, by repealing altogether the declaration against transubstantiation as a qualification for office. Now, I hope that the noble lord will think that answer satisfactory. Proposing then to omit many things heretofore in the oath, likely to be offensive to the feelings of the Catholics, I said: "It will perhaps be observed, that this form of oath omits some abjurations and disclaimers which are inserted in the oaths now required from Roman Catholics. Sir, it does so, and purposely and advisedly. Why insult the Roman Catholic, on whom we are about to confer the equality of civil privilege, by compelling him to reject, in terms, 'the impious position that it is lawful to murder heretics,' or to record his detestation of the 'unchristian principle, that faith is not to be kept with heretics?' We cannot suspect the Roman Catholics of these countries of entertaining such opinions; and if we do suspect them we have been wrong heretofore in giving them their existing privileges. I will neither detract from the force of those disclaimers, which the oath will contain, by the addition of useless incumbrances; nor mortify, by galling and unjust suspicions, the fellow-subjects whom we are inviting, in the spirit of peace and confidence, to share the blessings of equal and indiscriminating laws."

I am quite sure that the noble lord could not wish me to have expressed myself in a spirit different from that; and that is the spirit in which I believe the legislature is now disposed to act in respect of those persons who profess the Roman Catholic religion. Then, with respect to the franchise, I will not follow the noble lord through his speech on this subject. From my respect for his great abilities, and the experience I have had of the general tone of the speeches which I have heard him deliver, I confess I was sorry that, on this occasion, he occupied so great a portion of his speech with accusations. I shall not follow him through those charges which he brought forward. I will not enter into that question; but I will refer to the bill for the registration of voters, brought forward by my noble friend (Lord Stanley). My noble friend, then in opposition, sensible that there were very great evils admitted by all—that there was very great opposition and inconvenience in the registration of voters—did attempt to apply a remedy, without at the same time feeling himself competent to introduce any complete and satisfactory law on the subject of the franchise. Well, we came into power; you say we have a majority, but at any rate we have not used it for the purpose of diminishing the privileges of the Roman Catholics. We were not induced, by the possession of a majority, to persevere in a measure which was said to be a restriction on the franchise. But why should we not have persevered in our own course, if we had been disposed to act in a spirit of hostility? Give us, at least, the credit for having been unwilling to apply our majority for the purpose of working injustice. There are other causes not connected with the registration of voters which tend to diminish the number of voters in Ireland, and we are not willing to propose any measure which shall have the effect of diminishing the franchise, without, at the same time, introducing other measures which shall provide an ample and just compensation for any diminution of the franchise caused by the amendment of the law. What the exact principle of such a measure may be, this is not the time to inquire. You say, give us the English franchise; but I greatly doubt if we gave to Ireland a law precisely like that which prevails in England, with the same construction of course which is applied to the English law, whether the franchise in Ireland would not be very much limited. I except the case of the 40s. freeholders in fee-simple; but if this class of voters were introduced into Ireland, under the same rules which exist in England, I do not think that the franchise would be very greatly extended. But without reference to the circumstances of the two countries, if you apply the same law to the franchise in both countries, you must in that case adopt the construction put upon the English law as to beneficial interest; and if you did that, you would inflict the greatest injury upon the elective franchise as it exists in Ireland. There cannot be a question upon that subject. I say that in the case of the application of the English law to Ireland—of a literal, exact application of it—so far from its being beneficial in your sense, I believe that it would be of great injury to that country. But I do not wish to act on that narrow spirit; I wish to consider what was really the intention of the Reform Bill; to carry out that intention, and to make compensation for any diminution of the franchise which amending the registration may have caused. I approach now a much more difficult and important part of the question—I mean the ecclesiastical establishment in Ireland. The hon. and learned member for Bath (Mr. Roebuck) calls on me to give a pledge that I will consent to the abolition of the Established Church in Ireland; and he tells me, that if I am not prepared to give that pledge, some other person will be found to give that pledge who will receive the place which I hold. I concur with the hon. member in thinking, that on such a question the defence of power is a most subordinate consideration. I do hope that, if I believed it to be for the public interest to propose an alteration of the law in respect of the Established Church in Ireland, that it is a matter of so much importance, that I should not be deterred from acting on my honest and conscientious conviction, by the fears of the public sentiment on the subject, or of the consequence of finding a majority in this House opposed to me. If I believed that the public necessity required, or the public interests would be promoted by any particular course, I should feel it to be my duty, as a Minister of the Crown, to recommend that course to the adoption of parliament, and to take all the consequences of that act upon myself; and I should not consider it a sufficient excuse for forbearing to submit a proposition to parliament, on a matter of great importance, that the state of public opinion would, in consequence of taking that step, prevent me from continuing in office. I am prepared, therefore, for the consequences of not giving that pledge required of me by the hon. and learned member, and to devolve on others that responsibility which now rests on me, if it can only be returned by pledging myself to destroy the Established Church of Ireland. The hon. and learned member proposes that the whole of the ecclesiastical revenues in Ireland should be appropriated to the purposes of the State. The hon. and learned gentleman considers the Established Church as a badge of slavery—as a proof of dominion—as an insult to the people of Ireland. I cannot regard it in that light; nor do I believe that the people of Ireland so regard it. The hon. and learned member who has expressed himself the most explicitly of all who have spoken on that side of the House, said, he would not say that he would confiscate, but that he would take possession of the whole of the revenues of the Church of Ireland on the part of the state, and leave for subsequent consideration whether any portion of them should be applied to the maintenance of religious establishments, or whether religion should not in all cases be left to the voluntary principle, and those revenues be applied to state purposes. Which of the two should be done he did not state; on that point he has not quite made up his mind; but if the revenues were to be applied to purposes of religion, they ought, he said, to be applied to all religions alike. Sir, other opinions have been put forward in the course of this debate. The noble lord, the member for Sunderland, does not go the whole length of the hon. and learned member; he is not prepared to extinguish the Protestant Church in Ireland. Then the noble lord, the member for London, is prepared to maintain the Established Church as he finds it; the noble lord doubts whether or no that Church is not too liberally provided for, and whether some portion of its revenues might not be diverted to other than ecclesiastical purposes; but he would maintain the Established Church, because, considering its history, and considering the relation in which it stands to the established churches in other parts of the empire, he thinks it would be dangerous to sweep it away. I am sorry that the noble lord does not take some higher ground for maintaining the Established Church than this; for I think that all apprehension of its affecting the Established Church in other branches of the empire is not either a valid or satisfactory ground of argument. The noble viscount, the member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston), has expressed also his opinions upon this subject. If I understood him, he would maintain the Church upon its present basis: he thinks that the tithes having been transferred to the proprietors of the land, and they being generally Protestants, it is not felt by the people generally as a burthen. I did not understand from the noble lord that he was prepared to curtail the revenues of the Church, but he proposes a qualified establishment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, to be effected by a communication with the See of Rome; and one particular measure which he suggested was, that permission should be afforded to individuals to grant endowments to the Roman Catholic clergy. While these are the suggestions of the hon. and learned gentleman and the two noble lords, it is contended by others that there should be perfect equality between the two religious establishments—Protestant and Roman Catholic. [“Hear.”] The noble lord (Lord Palmerston) then maintains that principle? Will the noble lord inform me what he understands by equality of religious establishments? Does he mean an equality of revenue? The noble lord said, and said justly:—“Before you disturb that which is established, look well at the consequences; see what are likely to be the legitimate consequences of your first step, and take care that you do not make one which can only lead to conflict and contention. Carry out your measure to its full and legitimate length when you determine upon taking the first step.” What then does the noble lord mean by “equality of the religious establishments?” Will the allotment of the revenue in proportion to the population be that equality for which he contends? Shall I give to the Roman Catholics who constitute, say six-sevenths, or whatever the proportion may be, of the population of Ireland—shall I, after I have appropriated to the department of the woods and forests the whole of the ecclesiastical revenues of the Church in Ireland—shall I apply six-sevenths of that revenue for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion, leaving the one-seventh in the possession of the Protestant establishment? If I do that, will it produce contentment? Will the noble lord be satisfied? Will others be satisfied after I shall have adopted that proposal? What shall I do with respect to the religious edifices? If I adopt the principle that the Protestant establishment is to have only one-seventh of the revenue of the Church, shall I maintain for him the possession of the whole of the churches of the establishment? When I have reduced the means of serving those churches, shall I leave them still nominally appertaining to the Protestant establishment, or will not the noble lord press me to go one step further, and after I have divested the Protestant religion of six-sevenths of the revenue of the church, won't he then tell me that the churches are too abundant—that the Roman Catholics stand in need of religious edifices, and that I must carry out my principle further, and appropriate the churches of the Protestant establishment to the Catholic worship? [An hon. member: “Certainly.”] Certainly! Well, but when I have done that, will that be equality? The Established Church stands in a certain relation to the State. It is represented as a part of the State. Its members occupy seats in the House of Lords. Will it be equality if I leave the Protestant bishop, with his seat in the House of Lords, and tell the Roman Catholic prelate that he is to have no corresponding voice in that House? Will not the principle of equality, then, extend either to the exclusion of the Protestant prelate from the House of Lords, or to the admission of the Roman Catholic prelate into that branch of the Legislature? If the principle of equality applies not merely to ecclesiastical revenue, but to the political relations of the religious establishment with the State, all that I can say is, that the change you propose to make is of a much more extensive and complex nature than that which you may at first contemplate. If that is to be the relation of the Roman Catholic and Protestant establishments in Ireland, as between them and the State, what is the arrangement I am to make with respect to the Roman Catholics in this country? Are the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland to have seats in the House of Lords, and the Protestant bishops of this country to have seats, and yet the Roman Catholic bishops of England are not to have seats? What relation is the Roman Catholic Church in England to bear towards the State? Should the hon. and learned gentleman succeed in his measure of confiscation of the revenues of the Church, or should the noble lord succeed in his more limited application of that revenue to general ecclesiastical purposes, it appears to me that they will have many important matters to consider before they shall have established that perfect equality for which they both contend as being essential to the ecclesiastical establishments of the country. Now these, I admit, are extreme cases. There may be some principle in the course which the hon. and learned gentleman proposes. I think it unjust—I think it most unwise—I think it most disadvantageous, so to alter the relation in which the Protestant religion stands towards the State in this country;

but, at all events, I think the proposal of the hon. and learned gentleman is established upon some principle. But with respect to the two propositions which the two noble lords opposite contemplate, partial in their extent, they would merely have the effect of weakening the foundation and lessening the security of that which they would leave to the Church, without giving any satisfaction whatever to the Roman Catholics, whom they wish to serve. Why, supposing I should say—I will consider what livings exist in Ireland, where there is a very small population of Protestants—I will respect existing and vested rights, and will merely provide that in cases where there shall be only forty or fifty inhabitants—some ten years hence, the revenues of those livings, amounting to £300 or £400 a-year each, shall go to constitute a fund for the use of the Roman Catholics in those parishes; let me ask, in the first place, what would such a fund amount to? And, secondly, let me ask, supposing I did apply that fund to the purposes I have mentioned, should I give the least satisfaction to the Roman Catholics of Ireland? Supposing the noble lord (the member for Tiverton) would invert the proposition of the noble lord (the member for Sunderland), and instead of giving six-sevenths of the revenue of the Church to the Roman Catholics, he would retain six-sevenths to the Protestants and give one-seventh to the Roman Catholics, I ask whether an arrangement of that kind would be in the slightest degree satisfactory? Would it not, if there exist now any objection to a dominant church, leave that objection as perfectly in force as ever? But by establishing that principle, should I not have made it infinitely more difficult to adopt those other means which the noble lord opposite proposes for me to do? I must, therefore, take the opposite extreme. I look to the Act of Union, but I at once admit that no contracts of that kind can be successfully pleaded, if necessity requires their alteration. I should think it most unfortunate to be compelled to depart from it. I should think it would have a great tendency to shake public confidence in contracts of that kind, if any thing short of absolute necessity made me to depart from it. Such acts are great national compacts. You overcome great prejudices and obstinate objections by making such contracts. You give them all the force of law. You guarantee, as far as the legislature can guarantee, a permanence in their duration. It has a great tendency to shake public confidence in the measures of the legislature, to depart from them without the strongest proof of the necessity of such a course. You may again have to overcome violent objections and prejudices; you may have again to offer equivalent measures, precautions, and securities, for the purpose of abating the force of those prejudices. If you preserve your former compacts with them, the public may place reliance in your new assurances, may accept your new securities, and may again relinquish to you long-cherished prejudices. But if they find they cannot place confidence in you, that after having entered into a compact of this kind, you break that compact with them, your future acts will be accompanied with this great objection, that you diminish your power of doing a public good, by diminishing public confidence in your measures. In 1825, what were the assurances given to the people of this country by the greatest advocates of the Roman Catholics? An hon. gentleman has referred to the speech I made on that occasion. I certainly did say, that I feared that the predictions of those eminent men would not be fulfilled. I hope the hon. gentleman will at least believe, that I might have been sincere as to my apprehensions of the result of the concessions at that time proposed to be made; that I might have mistrusted those who gave us the assurance that the removal of the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics would not in the slightest degree affect the stability of the Protestant Church. No one could doubt that there was great objection on the part of the people of this country to those concessions being made. But the "influence of argument," the apprehension of greater danger if they were withheld, and the positive declarations of the most eminent men, tended to remove the strong objection which had existed against the removal of those disabilities. Mr. Grattan, who boasted, and with justice, of the desperate fidelity with which he adhered to the cause of Ireland, and to the interests of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen—Mr. Grattan positively assured the House and the Protestant subjects of the Sovereign, that in his opinion the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities would add new security to the Established Church. In the preamble of the bill proposed and brought forward by that right hon. gentleman, there was distinctly stated and embodied a declaration to maintain the Established Church in Ireland; and in addition to this often expressed determination of that eminent man, I find that Mr. Canning concurred in this determination, and even that Mr. Plunkett concurred in it. All these eminent men agreed in saying, that they never would be parties to any act by which the foundations of the national Church would be shaken. The maintenance of that Church, therefore, was not only provided for by national engagements, but also by the most positive asseverations and declarations made by the most eminent and distinguished advocates of the Catholic claims. Unprepared, then, as I am to travel one step in the direction pointed out by the hon. and learned gentleman, shall I advance with the noble lord the member for the City of London, and the noble lord the member for Tiverton, as far as the Established Church is involved, and try to purchase a supposed preservation of it by the relinquishment of a small portion of its revenues? I doubt whether I should succeed in the latter; nor do I think that it would stand on sounder or better ground. I say this with the more confidence, seeing what were the engagements and assertions of the most eminent advocates of the Catholic claims—seeing the engagements that were made at the time the Relief Bill passed—seeing what has been done with respect to the Established Church in the reduction of the number of its bishops, in the reduction of its ecclesiastical revenues—seeing that provision has been made for a new appropriation of them, and a new distribution of them, so that there should not be excess here and starvation there—seeing that the people have been relieved from the payment of church-cess—seeing also, that we have taken the payment of tithes from the occupier, and transferred it to the owner—if all this has been unsuccessful in giving content and tranquillity, am I to expect to obtain it by a partial concession like that which the noble lord proposes? Is it likely, I ask, that the appropriation of so small a sum as by such means could be applied to the Roman Catholic religion, would be productive of general satisfaction? Seeing no advantage that is likely to arise from the adoption of a proposition of this partial nature, I therefore am the more disposed to stand on the law as I find it. After all these attempts that have been made to remove abuses that existed in Ireland, I hope and trust that the great body of the Roman Catholics of that country will not be induced to view the Protestant Church there in the light which the hon. and learned member for Bath did, or that they would be prepared to give their support to any such proposition as he has suggested. The noble lord alluded to some kind of qualified established Catholic religion in Ireland, and some objections were made that, at the time when I brought forward the measure for the removal of their disabilities in 1829, I did not take the opportunity of placing on a more satisfactory basis the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. I am satisfied that if any provision or proposition respecting the relations of the Roman Catholic religion with the State had been united to the bill for the removal of the Catholic disabilities, that it would have obstructed the success of that measure. The expressions used by me on this subject in 1829, namely, as to the relations of the Roman Catholic religion to the State, were as follow:—"I am not insensible to the force of those arguments which have been urged in favour of admitting the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland to a qualified and subordinate establishment, by giving stipends to the Roman Catholic priesthood from the public funds. This was the measure contemplated by Mr. Pitt in 1801, and uniformly urged by Lord Castlereagh, as an arrangement which ought to accompany the removal of the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics. But, on the other hand, there are formidable objections to such an arrangement. . . . Such interference, if accomplished by measures for connecting that Church with the State, would provoke much greater objections throughout the country, and would give much greater offence, than the mere relief of the Roman Catholic from civil incapacities. If we treat the Catholic question as a question of policy, and confine ourselves to the grant of civil privilege, we shall rest the discussion upon grounds totally different from those upon which we should have to discuss it, if we were to imply any sanction of the tenets of the Roman Catholic faith, or to make public provision for the inculcation of its peculiar doctrines."

These were the grounds which induced me in 1829, to think that it would be most unwise to mix up the religious question with the political question, and being most anxious to carry the political measure, I thought the government adopted a wise discretion in refusing to enter upon the subject. I think also, that at the present time it would be most unwise to make a declaration on this subject. I think, that if the government made a sudden declaration that it intended to attempt the establishment of a concordat, and to make provision for the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland, that it is as doubtful whether, instead of allaying excitement and agitation, it would not rather have the effect of increasing dissatisfaction in Ireland.* The noble lord, the member for Tiverton, spoke of permitting individualism to make some provision for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic church, by giving small portions of land as glebes to the Catholic clergy. On that subject, also, I shall decline expressing any opinion rather than in a general debate of this nature going into the subject. I am, therefore, forced back on the proposition of the hon. and learned gentleman. I do not believe that it would be wise to make such concessions as the hon. gentleman and others have recommended, or that they could be granted consistently with the public interests. I cannot consent to do so, or to agree to adopt any of the propositions that have been suggested. But if others, and this House, and the majority of it, believe that the time has arrived for considering any further concession, let them fairly express their opinions by their votes. I believe that the best mode of arranging matters of this nature is by looking to public opinion, expressed by its proper organ, namely, the majority of this House; and believing, if such should be the opinion of this House, that these questions could be much better arranged by others than by myself, or by those who have concurred with me in opinion—I trust that no partiality for the present government—that no former declaration of intentions to support it—that no false delicacy—will permit hon. gentlemen who entertain opinions contrary to those which I have expressed, from recording their votes in accordance with their opinions in a matter of vital importance to the empire. I approach the last subject to which I shall advert, namely, the question of the Repeal of the Union. On a former occasion, I stated that it was the determination of her Majesty's government to use all the power and authority which office can confer, to maintain inviolate the legislative union between the two countries. I then understood, and I still understand, that upon that subject there is an almost unanimous feeling in the House. By the late government, his Majesty King William was induced to announce to parliament that he considered that the repeal of the union was tantamount to the dismemberment of the empire, and a public and solemn declaration was made by both Houses of parliament, and by the Crown at the instance of the government, that all the power and authority of the State should be exerted for the maintenance of the union, and the Crown appealed to all its loyal subjects to co-operate in support of this object. All the members of the then government who gave their opinions upon the subject now under the notice of parliament, declared in the most emphatic manner that there was no extent to which they would not resort for the preservation and the maintenance of the legislative union. Of course, when they talked of resorting to extremes, they did not allude to constitutional attempts that might be made in that House to get a repeal of the union, but to all attempts by physical force or intimidation that might be made to attain that object. I was sorry, however, to hear the noble lord say, that he regarded the discussion of the repeal of the union as on the same footing as the repeal of any other act of parliament. Does the noble lord mean to say, that after the declaration on the part of the Crown to which I have adverted, that there is to be an equal liberty of discussing the repeal of the union, as the rescinding any common act of parliament? I apprehend that in regard to other measures, such a declaration on the part of the Crown would not be resorted to. Surely the Crown would not pronounce with respect to any ordinary act of parliament, that under no circumstances—under no consideration—could its repeal be entertained—that the Crown would do every thing in its power to prevent such repeal, and that, in fine, it considered the repeal of the union would be tantamount to severing the two countries, and a dismemberment of the empire. Surely, with respect to the Corn-law, or other acts of parliament, it would not be the case that all loyal subjects should be called upon to combine in resistance against agitation for its repeal. It is undoubtedly a question of discretion and policy. The Crown did pursue an unusual course in declaring that opinion with regard to the repeal of the union. It was the opinion of the government then in power. The opinion of the present government is the same. We consider the repeal of the union tantamount to a dismemberment of the empire. We hold that it would be utterly impossible to conduct two independent legislatures under one executive. In the case of war what are you to do? Is the Irish parliament to have perfect liberty to take its own course with regard to war? In the case of revenue, what are you to do? Is the Irish parliament to have its own cruisers for the purpose of protecting its revenue? Is the Irish parliament to have its own army? If it is to be perfectly independent, why not? If it is to have these things, is it not perfectly clear that the seeds of collision are immediately sown, and that there must be war? The interests of the two countries might be differently affected. The hon. member for Limerick talks about non-intercourse. Sir, of the consequences flowing from the establishment of two independent legislatures, one of the least noxious would probably be, that protective duties would be immediately applied, to the detriment of industry and the interruption of commerce. For if you are to have a separate revenue, if you are to have a separate government, if you are to have a separate army, if you are to have a separate fleet for the protection of your revenue, how you are to continue to act harmoniously under one executive, for the period of one year, is a problem that utterly passes my comprehension. Sir, I consider that the injurious effects of a measure of this kind are comparatively and fully demonstrated; but, independently of that, you have the solemn declaration made from the Throne to parliament—made from the Throne by the advice of the late government, which could leave no doubt on the minds of his Majesty's subjects as to the construction which his Majesty and the government put upon this important question. We therefore have, without seeking for any new laws, felt it to be our duty to exercise all the authority of the government, for the purpose of discountenancing the agitation of the question. We have also taken all the measures in our power to adopt for the purpose of preventing the disturbance of the public peace. But I am asked what course I intend to pursue? I am told—Declare your course. Sir, I am prepared to pursue that course which I consider I have pursued already; namely, to administer the law in Ireland upon principles of justice and impartiality. I am prepared to recognise the principle established by the law—that there shall be equality in civil privileges. I am prepared, in respect to the franchise, to give substantially, although not nominally, equality. In respect to the social condition of Ireland—that point upon which, as I have said, no party feeling can prevail—with respect, I say, to the social condition of Ireland, as to the relation between landlord and tenant, I am prepared to give the most deliberate consideration to the important matters involved in those questions. With respect to the Established Church, I have already stated that we are not prepared to make any alteration in the law by which that church is maintained. But, Sir, it is said, Why do you do nothing? Why do you stand with folded arms? Why do you not bring in measures of coercion? I know well what a tendency there is to press for measures of coercion; and, not content with pressing for the employment of the powers and means in the possession of the government, to demand the instant proposal of new coercive laws, and to rely upon them for the suppression of agitation. I claim for the government the entire right to judge with regard to the discretion to be exercised whether as to the application of the existing law, or as to the appeal to parliament for new laws and new powers. I am not ashamed, Sir, of acting with forbearance and moderation in a matter of this kind. I believe, whatever may be the clamour for new restrictions and new coercion, that the hasty and precipitate demand for them does not add to the strength of the executive. I think that the agitation which exists in Ireland, cannot proceed without ranging on the side of the government many who must be alarmed for the consequences which must infallibly flow from it. I speak not now of Protestant or Roman Catholic—I will make no distinction between them. But I ask, can the Roman Catholic proprietor, or can the Protestant proprietor feel himself safe if the principles which are contended for in the course of this agitation are to prevail? What will be that constitution in Ireland which is to be founded upon their appeals to the passions, their appeal to the credulity of ignorance or to distress? Do you believe that the first act of the Irish parliament—if you were to carry your repeal—will be one to realise the expectations that have been excited? As loyal subjects, can you join in the appeal to foreign countries without dishonour? I will not do you the injustice to suppose that you participate in such disloyalty. If the necessity should arise hereafter, I know that past forbearance will only strengthen the claim of the government upon the assistance of parliament. Some, from weakness or timidity, may have been driven down the stream, and swept into the vortex of this agitation; but as regards the calm, intelligent, and reasoning men in Ireland, I cannot believe that this display of physical force will induce them to join in the ranks of repeal, or blind them to the danger to property, to peace, to security, which is inseparable from this agitation. For myself I say, in answer to these demands for measures of coercion, that I feel a source of strength to the government in showing confidence in the loyalty of those who I believe are well affected to the government. And I believe that forbearance in a government, when it can safely be maintained, will rather add to the strength, than cause the weakness of that government. I say then, Sir, our firm determination is to do every thing that can be done by authority, or by power, to resist the success of the repeal of the union by any other mode than the constitutional one of a deliberate act of the legislature. The Roman Catholics say to me, "If we support you against repeal, what arguments can we assign to our constituents?" Surely this—that you are convinced, after full consideration of the relations between the two countries—after the endurance of the union for the long period of forty years—after the proofs you have had of the consequences of a separate parliament—after the demonstrations that must have been shown to you, that the re-establishment of a really independent legislature must lead to collision and to war, and that the arena of that dreadful warfare must probably be your own island—surely, I say, you can state that as a reason for refusing to support the agitation for repeal. Other reasons, too, I submit, with all deference, you may assign to your Roman Catholic constituents. Review the events of the past fourteen years, the immense social revolutions that have taken place. Consider that in that period you have been placed on a footing of civil and religious equality with the Protestant part of the community. I speak not of this as a concession; I claim no gratitude for it as a concession; it was entirely a sense of duty which compelled me to do what I did. But it cannot be denied, that in that period there has been a great transfer of power—the municipal franchise, it may be, is still incomplete and imperfect, but still there has been a transfer of power from the Protestants to you, the Roman Catholics. Has there not been manifested, on the part of the Imperial Parliament, towards you, and towards the country to which you belong, the most kindly feeling? Can you doubt, that on the part of the Imperial Parliament there exists that kindly feeling—evinced, as it has been, by a sincere desire, amid all our difficulties, to promote the social welfare of Ireland; by the whole events of the period of which I have spoken; by the indications which have from time to time been manifestly given of the gradual disappearance of the hostility which once grew out of religious differences. Let me appeal to you, by one common fame, by one common glory, by the remembrance of the conflicts in which the men of the two countries have been engaged, and by which they have achieved higher renown than any other country ever yet attained—let me appeal to you, whether the honour of our common glory, the fear of common distress, are not arguments upon which you, in turn, can successfully appeal to your constituents, and your fellow-countrymen—whether these are not a sufficient justification of your resolution to stand by us in our determination to resist the agitation for the repeal of the legislative union of the two countries?

The debate was again adjourned, and on the following day the House divided, when there appeared for the motion, 164; against it, 243; majority, 79.

STATE OF THE NATION.

JULY 28, 1843.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply—

Lord John Russell rose, and, without making any definite motion on the subject, brought under the notice of the House the great distress existing in all parts of the kingdom. The noble lord, after taking an able review of the home and foreign po-

• lier of the government, and acknowledging the preponderance of power possessed by the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) in that House, concluded a most eloquent and impressive speech by calling upon the government to add to the means of the country, by introducing measures calculated to increase its material wealth, augment its commerce, and make it still more powerful as a nation.

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—It is not my intention to find fault with the noble lord for the course he has thought fit to pursue on the present occasion. I admit, that it is perfectly open to him, in the discharge of his constitutional duty, on a motion for a Committee of supply, to deliver his sentiments with respect to the conduct of the government and the position of public affairs, without being under the necessity of testing the opinion of the House by any distinct proposition implying censure on, or a want of confidence in the government. At the same time, I think, if the government deserve the character which the noble lord has attempted to give them, that the noble lord might in that case with perfect success have adopted the more direct and open course of calling on the members of this House, as the representatives of the country, to imply a want of confidence in the government; and if we did deserve the character which the noble lord has given us, not only the House of Commons but the country also would be content to respond to that call. The noble lord has abstained from taking such a course on the present occasion, following the advice which was given him by the noble lord sitting on his right hand (Lord Palmerston), or at least adopting that noble lord's suggestion, which implied, that even if the present government were voluntarily to retire from power, there was such a distrust in the country of those who had preceded them, that the present government, contrary to their own inclinations for retirement, would be forced by the public voice again to assume the direction of affairs. This is the opinion of the noble viscount (Viscount Palmerston), who sits on the right hand of the other noble lord (Lord J. Russell), as to the claims of the probable successors of the present government on the public confidence; and therefore it is, I presume, that the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) acted not only on the suggestions of his own mind, but also on the suggestions afforded by the practical experience of the other noble lord, and his modest estimate of his claims on public confidence. I was rather surprised, considering the very gloomy view which the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) has taken of public affairs, that he should have indulged in that preliminary levity which prefaced the very doleful account he had to give of the condition of the country, and in the course of which he referred to the tunes which he thought "the harmonious instrument" might have been expected to play. I think that the noble lord, if he really entertained so gloomy an opinion of the condition of this country, would have hardly condescended to indulge in what, I should deem, would in such case have been misplaced, and not very successful irony. The noble lord alluded, in the first place, to the progress made in legislation; and he said that nothing would be more easy than to draw up an account of the measures with which we (the government) commenced the session, and in respect to which no progress had been made in bringing them to maturity. It is quite true, that in the execution of our public duty we were desirous, in conformity with the recommendation contained in the Speech from the Throne, to suggest to the consideration of the House measures connected with the improvement of the law, and the domestic condition of the people. It is equally true, that we have been compelled to relinquish the hope that those measures would be brought to a successful result. We proposed measures for facilitating the recovery of small debts, for improving the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the country, and for the purpose of extending throughout the country—at least in the manufacturing districts of the country—the advantage of moral and religious education. Is it our fault that, with respect to these measures, we have been unable to make any progress? Have we shown any unwillingness to devote our time to the consideration of measures in the legislature? The noble lord says, that we command a great majority in the House. Does that circumstance enable us to prevent the discussions which have taken place in this House, or to control the opposition by which some of the measures of the government have been met? Is it our fault that a practice has grown up of continuing, from night to night by adjournment, debates on public affairs? If at any time we suggest that the time has arrived for closing the discussion, and even if our suggestion be in conformity with the general sense of the House, has it not been the practice to meet that suggestion by motions of adjournment? Is it not notorious that it is not in the power of a majority, however united, to control these discussions if a small party be determined to force on motions of adjournments? On three several occasions, in the course of the session, each debate has continued for five nights; and I ask, whatever the majority of the government might be, what measure could be had recourse to in order to prevent those discussions? The noble lord knows, that though the government were desirous of bringing forward their own measures, to which they attached great importance, they nevertheless did not attempt to interrupt the progress of the debates to which I have alluded, by preventing them from coming on, on days appropriated to government business. Those debates might have been justifiable, and might have been important, and a discussion of five nights each might not have been more than sufficient to legitimately exhaust the subject. But granting all this, do not these debates oppose impediments to the progress of public business? And can any minister, whatever majority he may command, so control the deliberations of this House as to prevent the occupation of time by debates? On the motion of the noble lord opposite (Lord Howick), on the motion respecting the Corn law, and on another motion relative to the policy of the government towards Ireland, five nights were occupied on each of these occasions in the debate. Then there was the debate relative to the conduct of a noble friend of mine, Lord Ellenborough, which occupied three nights, I think. We brought forward, in the discharge of our public duty, the Irish arms bill. We brought it forward because we felt that to be our duty. Ten nights have been occupied in that bill alone in committee, and seventeen nights upon the bill altogether. On two several nights, there had not been less than twenty-two or twenty-three divisions taken in reference to that bill—no doubt from conscientious motives. I presume that no man who originated any of these divisions, several of them on verbal questions rather than on questions of very great importance, acted otherwise than from a sense of public duty. But could we control these divisions? So many divisions in one night, each division occupying ten minutes, or a quarter of an hour, would consume a considerable portion of time. Thus, then, I have mentioned that there were fifteen nights consumed in debates on three questions of public importance; and seventeen nights occupied by the Arms bill. [A cheer.] The hon. gentleman who cheers may not have thought that bill necessary; but if the government felt it necessary, viewing the outrages which took place from the possession of fire-arms, to take security for the maintenance of the public peace, we could not shrink from the discharge of that duty, and from asking for the sense of parliament with respect to the measure which we proposed. Parliament had a perfect right to subject the measure to the ordeal of discussion; but after having done so, do not blame us because we have been in consequence unable to proceed with those measures which we thought important, calculated to improve the administration of justice, and introduce useful reforms in other matters connected with the domestic condition of this country. The noble lord spoke with a taunt of our abandonment of the education plan. At any rate, we brought it forward not for the purpose of increasing our own power, or of giving undue power to the Church, but as the result of a careful revision of the condition of the manufacturing population, and of a deep impression that other measures than coercion and force were necessary for laying the foundations of good order. We had a sincere and earnest hope, that there was a wide-spread conviction throughout the country, that a measure of this kind was necessary, and we entertained the expectation, that some scheme of combined education, founded on religion, and inculcating the great truths of Christianity, might be proposed to parliament, and that the Church and Dissenters would be content to acquiesce in its execution. This was the motive alone which induced us to prepare and propose the measure to parliament. It met with very general consent in the House of Commons. I think, speaking generally, the majority of the House of Commons was in favour of that measure, that is to say, on its abstract merits; but as there was no hope of the successful working of that measure, even if the majority of the House consented to it, unless we carried with us the cordial co-operation of those who dissented from the Church, we thought it a wiser course, and one less likely to continue religious animosities, to abandon the measure, than trust to the mere force of a majority for carrying it. This measure differed from others in this respect—that after a majority consented to it, its success depended on the cordial co-operation of all parties. Supposing the Houses of Commons and Lords, and the Crown, consented to the measure, and supposing it passed into law, yet, unless men were content to abate something of their own prejudices, and to bury in oblivion some of their animosities, there was little chance that ultimate good would have resulted. A determination to persevere with the measure without the cordial co-operation of those who dissented from the Church, might not only have precluded the success of the measure itself, but might have laid the foundation for new and still-bitter religious animosities. But were we not justified in making the attempt to prevail upon the Church to relinquish and surrender some of its feelings and prejudices on the subject of a combined system of education? and were we not equally justified when, despairing of cordial concert and harmonious co-operation, we, like prudent men, did not persist in forcing a measure against the will of those classes without whose co-operation and concert and assistance we could not hope for a successful working of the measure? With the opinions expressed by the noble lord opposite upon the first statement of that measure, looking at the amendments which the noble lord gave notice of his intention to propose, and after the approbation which I understood the noble lord to express upon the ultimate relinquishment of the measure, I own I am somewhat surprised at the tone in which the noble lord has spoken of the course which her Majesty's government has taken with reference to the relinquishment of the bill. The noble lord next proceeded to discuss our foreign policy, and the single charge which the noble lord has brought forward against us, connected with our foreign policy, is not the course which we have thought it right to take with regard to Scinde, but our unwillingness to present to the House at this moment the instructions which we have felt it our duty to give with respect to the affairs of Scinde. I know not how it has happened that the noble lord has glanced so lightly over our foreign policy. I should have supposed, that the noble lord, in dealing with that part of the question which he himself has raised, would have contrasted the position of this country now with the position in which the present government had found the foreign policy on their accession to office, not merely with regard to the United States of America, but with reference to the feelings prevalent in France as to this country. As, however, the noble lord has included Scinde and the transactions there, he might, on looking at the map of Scinde, have cast his eye a little to the north-east of that district of country, and have alluded to the position in which her Majesty's present advisers found British power in Afghanistan. For this position the noble lord has omitted the slightest commiseration. I apprehend, however, that at no very remote period it is intended to bring the whole of that question before the House, and in two or three days those documents which, consistently with their sense of duty, the government can produce, will be presented and laid upon the table. The noble lord asked,—“Why not lay before the House the instructions you have given, and enable us to judge of the course you mean to pursue?”

Lord J. Russell, I said I think there may be good reasons for postponing the production of your instructions, but not for withholding the expression of your opinions upon the subject.

Sir Robert Peel: What is the difference between communicating the instructions and stating the views and intentions of the government? Are the operations in the field yet concluded? In one despatch, it is true, it was stated that not another shot would be fired. I am not so sanguine, and I cannot undertake to say that the military operations in that district are entirely concluded; but I can undertake to say, that it is not consistent with the duty of the government, while military operations are proceeding, to lay before the House, in the shape of their instructions, their views as to the course to be pursued in the future government of that country. I can believe that a premature disclosure of those views and intentions, might seriously compromise British interests in that part of the globe. The time will come when her Majesty's government will state the course they have taken; but until I know that the military operations have been concluded, that peace has been restored, and that tranquillity has been established, it is our duty to withhold the production of the instructions we have issued, and which the noble lord seemed so anxious to peruse. I do not apprehend that the noble lord himself will think, that while operations are going on in Afghanistan, or in any other part of the globe, that we ought to encounter any risk by laying before parliament the instructions we have issued to our naval and military forces. It is difficult to lay down any rule or precedent; you must place confidence in the government with respect to the instructions they issue, and while there remains a chance of British arms being engaged in warfare, or the risk that British interests will be compromised, I trust the House will not call upon the government for a premature disclosure of its views and intentions. The noble lord then proceeded to take a review of the commercial policy of the country, and alluded in particular to the nature of the commercial transactions between this country and the United States, and between this country and the Brazils. No doubt it is greatly to be lamented that our commercial intercourse with the United States has greatly diminished. However, at various periods, that intercourse has been subject to great and considerable fluctuations. The noble lord referred to several years in succession, and took the average of those years as exhibiting our commercial intercourse with the United States. Now, from the papers which the noble lord has quoted, I will read some of the instances in which very great changes have taken place with regard to our commercial intercourse with the United States. In 1836, the declared value of our exports to the United States, amounted to £12,427,000. In the next year it fell to £4,695,000. In the year following, it was £7,585,000; and in the year after, £8,839,000. In the year following the declared value of our exports suddenly fell to £5,200,000. In the next year they rose to £7,098,000; and in the last year, 1842, they were unfortunately reduced to £3,528,000. Here was striking proofs of the fluctuations which had taken place in this trade. But the noble lord says, that it is the immediate duty of the government to take steps for increasing our commercial intercourse. The noble lord says that it is to be done through the operation of commercial treaties, or by means of reducing the import duties on articles the produce of the United States. I should not consider it at all prudent, on a question like the present, to express any positive opinion with respect to commercial treaties; but I must say, the experience of recent attempts has not been very favourable to the noble lord's views. The conclusion does not depend on the will of one party. You enter into negotiations; hopes of a successful issue are continually entertained, and as continually postponed; new proposals are made, there is a natural indisposition to terminate the negotiation, and in the mean time the trade greatly suffers. In experiencing difficulty and failure in negotiating commercial treaties, this country has not been singular. Other countries, from similar motives, have desired to receive in return for concessions, similar concessions from those countries with which they have negotiated. A similar policy has been pursued with regard to the treaties with Portugal and France. On entering office we found negotiations pending with those two countries, and sanguine hopes entertained that they would be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. I will not attempt to lay down any abstract rule with regard to commercial treaties, nor to pronounce any positive opinion on the subject. There may be circumstances which justify us in making reductions on the produce of foreign countries, though you cannot gain a corresponding concession. No doubt, if that foreign country will at the same time reduce the import duties on your productions, you gain a greater advantage than if you merely make a unilateral reduction, by reducing your own import duties only. I shall, therefore, abstain from laying down any abstract dictum on this subject; but I must observe that the course which was pursued with regard to America—as to the reduction of duties on American produce—was not so immediately followed by any reduction on the part of the United States as we had every right to expect. And when the noble lord confidently predicts, that if we make further reductions, we shall be met in a corresponding spirit by the United States, all I say is, that past experience hardly justifies the noble lord in uttering that confident expectation. We made last year in the tariff a material reduction in the duties of articles introduced into this country by the United States. We gave the United States great facilities in carrying on an increased intercourse with our colonies. That tariff included many articles, the produce of the United States, on which a material reduction was made. But what was the course which the United States pursued? The government of the United States was aware that these reductions were proposed to parliament, and that they would probably meet with the assent of parliament; and yet in the month of July last—in July, 1842—notwithstanding the example of liberality which we set, without calling for any corresponding concessions, that government imposed the high tariff against our productions, to which high tariff must be attributed the diminished value of our exports to the United States. I do not say that we are to abstain from reducing our duties on American productions because America does not reduce her duties upon ours. I do not maintain that doctrine; but it does not follow that the example which we set will be followed by the United States in an equally liberal spirit, and to its having not been, the failure of our commerce with the United States must be greatly attributed. This, however, be it remembered, was not the act of the British government, but that of the United States. It was they who imposed prohibitory duties on our produce, a few months after we had made the most important reductions on theirs. I cannot deny the value and amount of the traffic between this country and the United States; but, at the same time, I cannot admit that the noble lord's view of the state of our commercial relations generally is correct, and if it were, it is a condemnation of the very policy which he recommends. But it is to me a satisfaction to find, that within the last six months there have been striking indications of improvement in some of the great branches of the commerce and manufactures of this country. I hold in my hand a return of the exports of British produce and manufactures from all the ports of the empire for the six months ending the 5th of July, 1842, and on comparing the declared value of the exports of these six months with the declared value of the exports for a similar period of the present year, though there is not the improvement we could wish, there is at least a material improvement in some of the great branches of manufactures. The declared value of the exports for the first six months respectively of the years 1842 and 1843, ending July 5, each year, was of—

COTTONS, first six months, 1842	-	-	-	£7,087,000
Of LINENS, first six months 1842	-	-	-	1,294,000
Ditto 1843	-	-	-	1,361,000

In the linen there is but a slight increase, but still there is an increase. In the woollen exports, a trade which was in the course of the last year so greatly depressed, the increase is much more marked:

WOOLLENS, first six months 1842	-	-	-	£2,226,000
Ditto 1843	-	-	-	3,035,000

That is the case with respect to the woollen manufacture, which was so materially depressed last year. I speak not of the exports to the United States and Brazil alone, but of the exports to all countries, including Brazil and the United States; and, comparing the first six months of last year with the six months of this, I find a considerable increase. The improvement is still more marked, if you compare the first month, ending July 5, 1843, with that ending July 5, 1842. The declared value of the exports of

COTTON was, in the
Ditto, 1843,	-	-	-	1,445,000
Of LINENS—
Month ending July 5, 1842,	-	-	-	201,000
Ditto, 1843,	-	-	-	271,000
Of WOOLLENS—
Month ending July 5, 1842,	-	-	-	408,000
Ditto, 1843,	-	-	-	791,000

This latter item gave a most remarkable indication of improvement, and that in a trade which was most depressed. Therefore, on the whole, comparing the six months of the present year with the past year, there are cheering indications, although I admit that from a single month no confident expectations of permanent improvement can be gathered. It was, however, certainly stated that, had as the cotton manufacture was last year, the depression would be greater this year. That prediction, fortunately, has not been realised. The extent of the cotton manufacture, during the first six months of the present year, has greatly exceeded that of 1842. The total consumption for the six months of this year was 688,000 bags, a greater quantity than was ever known. [An hon. member: "It is re-exported."] I admit that the price of the raw material is low, and, as the hon. member says, there may be an export; still there must be a great demand for the article, and the amount of raw material consumed is very remarkable. The years 1835, 1836, and 1837, were years of great prosperity in the cotton manufacture. What was the consumption in the first six months of those years? From the return which I hold in my hand I find that, in 1835, there were 451,984 bags of cotton taken for consumption; in 1836, 474,902; in 1837, 497,302; and in the present year, 1843, the number was 688,584 bags. This is a most remarkable increase, comparing the first six months of the present year with the first six months of those most prosperous years. But to pursue the comparison further, I will take some of the other exports of cotton. The cotton yarn exported in the first six months of 1842 was 58,000,000 lbs., in the first six months of 1843, 62,000,000 lbs.; cotton thread exported in the first six months of 1842, 935,000 lbs.; in 1843, 1,324,000 lbs.; printed calicoes, first six months of 1842, 123,781,000 yards; in 1843, 145,295,000 yards; plain calicoes, first six months of 1842, 152,827,000 yards; in 1843, 253,318,000 yards. In this latter item the increase was enormous, but in them all you find indications of an improved and more healthy condition of our manufactures. How, then, can it be said with justice, that the measures taken by her Majesty's government in the course of last session, either with respect to the Corn-laws or the tariff, have been so fatal to the great branches of our manufacturing industry as was confidently predicted? The noble lord complains that, in the course of the present year, we have not brought forward extensive measures for the alteration of the Corn-laws. If we had done so, I doubt whether the noble lord himself would not have been the first to tell us that we ought not to have opened the question of the Corn-laws last year, unless we had then determined what relaxations we were prepared to bring forward, and that to propose a new law, year after year, was destructive of all confidence, and injurious to the country. But the noble lord says it was inconsistent with that course to bring forward the Canada Corn bill. The noble lord, however, knows that her Majesty's government did not bring forward that measure as a spontaneous act, or on an abstract consideration of policy, but to redeem a pledge made last session, when the Corn-laws were under consideration; and when it was held out to the Canadas that, if they passed certain measures, farther facilities for the importation of their corn into this country would be given. It was not in the contemplation of her Majesty's government to disturb the existing law, but merely to fulfil the expectations which had been held out to the Canadas. The noble lord also referred to our financial policy. I wish the noble lord had referred also to the condition of this country in that respect, when we succeeded the last government. The noble lord now says, the measures which he proposed with reference to sugar and corn would have supplied that deficiency; but I think it capable of demonstration that, on his own showing, they would have been insufficient. We thought more decided means were necessary, and that a vigorous effort should be made to equalise the expenditure with the revenue. The noble lord says that we have equally failed, and that in the April of the present year there was a great deficiency. No doubt there was; but the whole of the property-tax had not then been collected, and my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that circumstance to the House. Sir, we not only introduced a measure imposing a taxation upon property, rather than a measure imposing a tax upon consumption, but we at the same time removed many of those duties which imposed restrictions upon the commerce of the country, as well as some of those duties which pressed upon articles of consumption. In many essential respects the tariff of last year has not as yet come into effectual operation; and, considering the nature of some of the articles affected by it, I do not think the house is at present in a position to pronounce a positive opinion as to its success. But so far as the experiment has gone, and as far as its effects are known, I think it is satisfactory. My firm opinion is, that the vigorous measure we resorted to for replenishing the public coffers—the levying of a tax upon property—was absolutely necessary for the public credit of the country. My belief also is, that the reduction of duties upon articles of manufacture, and upon some of those of consumption, have had a salutary effect. Further experience will prove the policy and wisdom of the course so pursued. The noble lord complains of the reduction of the duty upon timber. We have had that subject frequently under consideration. He compares our measure with that which he contemplated, which was a very considerable increase of the duty upon colonial timber, and a very small decrease of the duty upon foreign timber. We thought it advisable to remove that upon colonial, and make a considerable reduction with regard to foreign timber. The noble lord condemns that policy. I greatly doubt whether experience will not prove our policy to have been the best. It was the observation of Mr. Hume, that England possesses iron and coal, and that all she wants to give her an unlimited power over manufactures, is a free access to wood. [Mr Hume: And food.] I was, Sir, quoting the opinions of Mr. Deacon Hume, and not of the hon. gentleman. “It is,” said Mr. Deacon Hume, “therefore, the true policy of the country, to facilitate the importation of timber.” In pursuing that policy, Sir, we differed practically from the noble lord; but though a reduction in the amount of revenue derived from the article of timber has been one of the consequences of the course we took on that occasion, I firmly believe that it will be ultimately and permanently for the advantage and benefit of the country. The noble lord then adverted to the domestic circumstances of the country, in connection with our government, and first he spoke of the present unfortunate disposition to insurrection which pervades Wales. The noble lord says that a sufficient explanation of the causes which led to that state of things has not been furnished; and he inquires whether or not we mean to suppress it by force of arms. Sir, we do not propose to pass over the causes of the present movement in the investigations which we are making. The noble lord knows perfectly well that it is quite unconnected with politics, and that these causes, whatever they may be, imply no blame on her Majesty’s government. But, Sir, when the noble lord casts blame upon the government, for their conduct in regard to the suppression of the insurrection in South Wales, he might have recollected what had taken place in the same part of the country when he was a minister of the Crown, and what course the government of which he was then a member took to suppress the rebellion that then existed in the principality. The noble lord might have remembered the cordial aid he received, without reference to political or party distinctions, for the purpose of strengthening the hands of the government. Does the noble lord recollect what took place at Newport? Does the noble lord forget the loss of life which happened upon that occasion? Does the noble lord recollect the attack upon that town which was led on by Mr. Frost? Does the noble lord recollect his own proposition for an increase of the military force, to the extent of 5000 additional men, in the year 1839, for the purpose of suppressing the disturbances in Wales at that time? The noble lord made a proposition to increase the army by 5000 men; and he dwelt, in making that proposition, chiefly upon the disturbances that had recently taken place in Wales. The noble lord then stated, that the government had been taunted with apathy and remissness in the execution of their duty. The noble lord went very fully into the difficulties which there were in immediately suppressing those disturbances by the force of arms. The noble lord said—“There were numerous meetings at which the most inflammatory language was used, and where treasonable and seditious words were spoken. He was most unwilling to resort to new measures of force; he thought that every effort ought to be made by the exertion and vigilance of the government, and by the application of the ordinary powers of the law to suppress those disturbances.”

And the noble lord added:—“But while I always held these opinions, I at the same time, thought, before I had myself any experience with regard to this subject, that there was a power in the ordinary law of the country which might be easily resorted to, in order to put down such mischievous projects and such injurious proceedings. I must say, that the experience I have had teaches me, that although the laws are themselves strong, and apparently efficient, yet that there is great difficulty in putting those laws into operation. With regard to one instance, with respect to which I have seen many observations made—and at various times violent speeches were made on various occasions—every one has seen in the newspapers the strongest excitement to violence, rebellion, and alarm of every kind; and it has naturally been observed, with regard to such language, that it was seditious, if not treasonable, and that the law ought to be put in force to suppress it. That was my own feeling likewise; but, when I came to any particular instance of such language, the obtaining of evidence and procuring a conviction was not a matter of so much facility as it appeared."

Well, then, the noble lord having acquired that experience in office, he should not be too forward in blaming those who have succeeded him, if, when newspapers report violent and seditious language, the government may not find it so easy at once to punish those who are alleged to hold that language or to suppress such meetings. [Lord J. Russell: I did not confine my observations to Wales, I referred to Ireland also.] The noble lord has spoken not of Ireland only, but of Wales. The noble lord did seem to imply that because there had been violent proceedings in Wales, there had been great apathy and indifference on the part of the government towards their suppression. The noble lord asks, "How can these things be? How is it that the government have permitted them to arrive at such a degree of violence?" I will tell the noble lord that the government have neglected no measure of precaution; they have determined to enforce the law; they have taken every means at their command for the purpose of maintaining the public peace; and they are determined to persevere in that course, and they do hope that the readiness which they evinced when the public peace was before in danger to strengthen the hands of the government will be shown by those who now act in opposition to them. The noble lord received support not merely by the consent given to an increase of the military force when he proposed his 5,000 men, but by the ready and cordial concurrence in the oblivion of all political differences, and the determination to uphold the authority of the law, which added still more to the strength and influence of the executive government. And, Sir, whatever may have been the original causes which led to these outrages in Wales, they were apparently slight; but a slight cause often leads to considerable excitement, which spreads with great rapidity. It is greatly to be deplored that excesses have been committed, and that such a bad spirit exists. As I said before, they are not traceable to discontent with the government—to political discontent. But, at the same time, there cannot be a question that it is the duty of government, even for the preservation of those who are now concerned in these outrages, and in the promotion of these excesses,—it is, I say, true policy and true humanity with respect to them, to use the most vigorous efforts to restrain those parties, to support the law, and to suppress those outrages. I trust that her Majesty's government will not be exposed to quibbling censures upon their conduct with reference to matters of this kind; but that there will be a general and marked disposition on the part of this House to aid the government in the maintenance of the public peace and in the suppression of insurrection. And I hope that no false impression will go forth that any party who is disturbing the public peace will receive any encouragement or sympathy from any quarter of that House. With respect to Ireland, Sir, I must also say that the course which her Majesty's government have taken with regard to that country has been the subject of discussion to a great extent and that very recently; and we are told that in the course of next week the state of Ireland is again to be brought under the consideration of this House. Why, Sir, the ministers of the Crown have already explained to the House the course they have pursued and intend to pursue. They have explained that it is their determination to leave no effort untried for the maintenance of the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland. They have also stated that they would not be impelled by remonstrances, or by threats, or by apprehensions, or by alarms, beyond their sense of duty, to resort to unusual measures of force; that they would, as far as possible, trust to the efficacy of the ordinary powers of the law, and would take every precaution against disturbing the public peace; that they would make every preparation for the maintenance of tranquillity, but that they would reserve to themselves the unbiassed judgment as to the time and circumstances in which it might become necessary to appeal to force and arms. I believe that the course they have pursued in that country has met with general approbation. Sir, I regret to hear the noble lord censure the government for the course they have pursued for the purpose of marking their disapprobation of the efforts that have been made to destroy the legislative union, by the exercise of the prerogatives vested in the government. We have not asked for fresh powers; we have acted with forbearance in the application of those that we possess. We have shown our confidence in the powers of the law; we have not sought to irritate by a premature and hasty application of force; but we have felt it our duty, at the same time, to advise the Crown to exercise its prerogative for the purpose of marking its disapprobation of the conduct of those who have joined in the attempts which have been made to promote the repeal of the union. We have noticed the multitudinous assemblies that have been held, and the inflammatory language used at them; we cannot blind our eyes to the danger to the public peace which they excite. Therefore, we have felt it our duty to advise the Crown to withhold its confidence from those who take an active part in the promotion of those meetings, and we did recommend her Majesty to remove from the commission of the peace those who held such language, or were present at those proceedings. And what course would the noble lord advise the government to take? He says—"Do not apply force hastily." When the noble lord was a minister, he advised the Crown to declare that "the severance of the union would be fatal to the integrity of the empire, and to the existence of this country as a powerful state." We concurred in that view, but the noble lord quarrels with the exercise of the same prerogative of the Crown; now we give a practical proof that we hold the same opinion, by advising the Crown to remove from the commission of the peace those who exercise that commission in giving countenance to those proceedings. I shall not upon this occasion anticipate the debate which is to take place in the course of next week, upon the motion which I conclude it is the intention of the hon. gentleman opposite to proceed with. The noble lord and the right hon. gentleman opposite had a full opportunity of stating their views in the late debate, and I think it unnecessary to enter into the discussion of them again. But, I must say, that we have governed, and are prepared to govern, Ireland in a spirit of justice and impartiality. We have tried to govern it, not through the exclusive agency of a party, but we have tried to govern it upon the principles of justice and impartiality. We know what has been the consequence of that. We know your taunts in some respects to be just, namely, that we have not conciliated the goodwill of one party, and we have lost the confidence of some of the other. We know we might have gained the confidence of one by governing exclusively through its agency. We have not attempted to govern exclusively through a party, but upon more enlarged and more comprehensive principles; and the consequence has been that which was predicted, and with which we are now taunted,—that if we had governed Ireland exclusively upon the principles of party, although we might have exasperated one party, we should preserve the confidence of the other. Still I shall not despair, nor will those who are united with me in the government, that when our intentions are manifested—when it is seen what is the course we have pursued, and that which we are pursuing—we do not despair that there will be a general confidence in the justice and impartiality of our government, and that the applause of rational men, attached to the interests of the country and desirous of its peace and tranquillity, will be the reward of the conduct which we have pursued and are determined to pursue. Sir, I trust the House has not forgotten the position in which we found the government when we were called to office; I trust that they have not forgotten the position of affairs in Canada, the position of affairs in India, the state of the finances, the unfinished war in China, and the state of our trade. I trust they have not forgotten all the difficulties which encompassed the government at the time we assumed the direction of public affairs. I trust they will have seen that the military force in Canada has been materially reduced. I trust that they will have seen that the causes of the differences with the United States—those at least which even threatened us with hostility—have been removed; that those feelings of hostility towards this country which prevailed in France have, I think, been greatly abated, that many of the causes of the differences which obstructed a good understanding with that country no longer exist, and that some of the disputed points between this country and France either have been adjusted, or are in a train to be satisfactorily adjusted; and I trust the House will not overlook, that though the present amount of the revenue may not be sufficient to meet the whole of the demands upon it, yet that the great financial effort made by the country last year has laid the foundation,

In my opinion at least, for equalizing the expenditure and the revenue. It is true that trade is still depressed, but I think I have given some proofs that with respect to the great articles of manufacture, there are at least indications of a revival of trade. Trade is depressed, chiefly, in my opinion, in consequence of the succession of those unfavourable seasons which, for years preceding the last, had of course a material effect upon the capital and industry of this country. The hostile tariff of America, and the deranged state of the circulation of America, no doubt, has contributed still further to increase our commercial difficulties. But still the measures taken in the course of last year and the improvement in the tariff will, I trust, lay the foundation for the repair of the evils that have been felt, and for the increase of the commercial prosperity of this country. I trust the House will not consider that we have been unfaithful to the trust reposed in us; nor that we have forfeited any claim to that confidence which was given to us when we accepted office and entered upon the administration of affairs. By the course we have pursued, we have occasionally, in the execution of our public duty, disappointed the expectation of our friends. They may not have realized the hopes which they were led, as the noble lord says, to entertain, that protection would be carried to the extremest point, or that the agricultural produce of this country would be favoured by still higher duties; but, whatever expectations have been entertained, there was no declaration made either by my colleagues or by myself which could justify our friends in supposing that we would sacrifice our public duty to their expectations. We have exercised the trust reposed by the country in our hands in such a way, I trust, as not to have forfeited the confidence which our friends were disposed to place in us when we came into office. In our endeavours to retain that confidence, we will apply ourselves to the discharge of our public duty, with a firm belief, that whatever may be the threatening aspect of public affairs in particular quarters, there is that energy and public spirit in this country that will enable us to surmount them all, and to place this country, in reference to its domestic affairs, and with reference to its foreign relations, in that proud position which it ought to maintain. Sir, if the noble lord had upon this occasion proposed any vote for testing the confidence of this House in her Majesty's government, we feel that that confidence would not have been withheld from us; that no partial dissatisfaction—no partial disappointment—has alienated from us the approbation and support of our friends, and so long as they are continued, we shall persevere in the discharge of our duty.

At the close of the discussion the order of the day was read. Committee postponed.

SUPPLY—OPIUM COMPENSATION.

August 4, 1843.

The House in committee of supply. On the first vote, "That £1,281,211 be granted to certain individuals, the holders of opium surrendered to the Chinese government in 1839, as the amount of compensation due to them, under the 4th article of the treaty"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said—It is nothing, Sir, but a very strong sense of duty that can induce persons in the situation of my right hon. friend and myself, presiding over the treasury of the country, and having great public duties to perform—I say it is nothing but a strong sense of duty that can induce us to refuse our acquiescence in claims of this nature. It was easy to foresee that there would be raised, partly from sympathy, and partly from other causes, a feeling in favour of such acquiescence. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has referred to a letter which he has lately received from a distinguished native of India, in which he said that the natives of India had no representative and no organ in this House. I entertain a different view upon that subject from that individual. I am perfectly convinced that party opinions and party considerations will not operate in matters of this kind; and if we wished merely to consult our own ease, and abandon our own duty, we should rather have acquiesced in claims of this nature than have resisted them. But the facts of the case cannot be overlooked. A treaty was entered into by which the Emperor of China stipulated that 6,000,000 dollars should be paid as the value of the opium that was surrendered to Captain Elliot. Why was that sum fixed upon by Sir Henry Pottinger? Because, as I apprehend, that sum was named at the instance of the noble lord then the secretary for foreign affairs. I have not the document by me, but I have a strong impression that the noble lord, in writing to Sir Henry Pottinger on the subject of the demands that should be made of the Emperor of China for the debts of the Hong merchants, for the indemnification of the expenses of the war, and for compensation to the merchants who had delivered up the opium, named 6,000,000 of dollars as the amount that ought to be demanded as compensation; and the reason why 6,000,000 dollars were demanded, and subsequently inserted in the treaty was, that the noble lord the member for Tiverton and Sir Henry Pottinger concurred in opinion that the 6,000,000 dollars would be a fair compensation. But, Sir, reference has been made to the nature of the trade in opium, and the hon. gentleman who commenced this discussion thought that there was great inconsistency in my making a public declaration that Sir H. Pottinger had been instructed by the present government, not on account of our possession of Hong-Kong, to give any facilities for carrying on a smuggling trade that was interdicted by the Chinese laws, while yet the government of England at the same time encouraged the growth of opium in India, and derived a profit from its monopoly. Now, I confess that I do not see any such inconsistency. [Mr. Mangles—I said making it to suit the Chinese palate.] I find that the course pursued in this respect by the present government is precisely the same as that adopted by the preceding one. It is quite notorious that the growth of opium has been encouraged by the government of India, and that that government has derived a considerable revenue from the sale of it; and yet, at the same time, distinct intimations have been given to the persons who carried on the trade on the coast of China that if they violated the laws of the Chinese government, the British government could not interfere to redress any injury they might receive from loss, but that they must themselves be responsible for that loss. The noble lord opposite (Lord Palmerston), in writing to Captain Elliot on the 15th of June, 1838, gave precisely the instructions I have just referred to. The noble lord was quite aware of the fact that opium was grown in India, and he could not have been ignorant that part of that opium was sent by private individuals for sale to China; yet he told these individuals expressly in that letter that they must bear all the consequences of any violation of the laws of the Chinese government. On the 15th of June, 1838, the noble lord (Lord Palmerston), wrote to Captain Elliot—"As to the smuggling trade in opium, which forms the subject of your despatches of November and December, 1837, I have to state that her Majesty's government cannot interfere for the purpose of enabling British subjects to violate the laws of any country to which they may trade. Any loss, therefore, which such persons may suffer in consequence of the more effectual execution of the Chinese laws, with respect to this subject, must be borne by the parties who have brought the loss on themselves by their own acts."

Those were the words of the late minister for foreign affairs, intimating that there was a distinction between a traffic legalized by the Chinese government, and which was in conformity with its laws, and a trade that was prohibited by those laws. Had there been an interference with the legal traffic of British subjects, in that case there would have been a claim on the British government for redress; but if the traffic was illegal and forbidden by the laws of China, then it is intimated by the noble lord that the parties so trading must themselves be responsible for any loss, and that the British government could not give them any guarantee. It is because the traffic in opium partakes of the nature of a gambling speculation, owing to its being subject to interruption from the Chinese laws, that there are such great vicissitudes in it, such differences in the profit derived, and the loss sustained. It has been justly remarked by my right hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn), this description of the gambling nature of the trade is the language not of the government only but of the merchants themselves; persons conversant with the state of the trade in India, and actually carrying it on. In the evidence given before the committee of 1840, I find distinct admissions to this effect. I will refer to the evidence of Mr. Inglis. He was asked:—"Then the profits of the opium trade were very high?—They were sometimes very high and sometimes very low; I have known people totally ruined by it; there is an instance of a gentleman now living in China, at Macao, who, many years ago, was totally ruined by fluctuation in price; he lost a large fortune in it. To what would you attribute the great fluctuation in prices?—Sometimes in India, for instance, we have had a report from Malwa of some 6000 or 7000 chests more coming on in the season than had ever come on in any season before from Malwa; it perhaps has not turned out eventually that so much did come; but that report has immediately operated upon the market to a most fatal extent. Have those losses and variations in price ever arisen from the acts of the Chinese government?—Of course, every temporary stoppage of the trade, occasioned by the mandarins, probably to enhance their own squeezes, had the effect of altering the price. The parties engaged in that trade were glad to do it, with the prospect of very high profits, and sometimes they were subject to great losses?—Of course it was, in its very nature, a very gambling trade: of course, every one who went into such a trade must be prepared to meet large losses. Those extreme fluctuations were not felt in the cotton or linen trade?—Not such violent fluctuations; the opium trade is more like the stocks, or things of that kind in this country; a mandarin going up to Peking, for instance, would make a rise in the price of opium, because there has been 100 or 200 chests supposed to be carried up smuggled in his baggage; and you will find in the price currents things of that kind stated as reasons for a rise of price.”

Why do I quote these opinions? It is to show the fluctuation of profit and loss in this trade, and that those who embark in it do it with a full knowledge of its illegality, and of those fluctuations being greater on account of that illegality than if it were a trade in accordance with the laws of China. Well, a great crisis arose, and, in circumstances of great difficulty and danger to British subjects, Captain Elliot, the superintendent, required from them the surrender of the opium in their possession. I agree with the hon. and learned gentleman that if those British subjects had suffered death, or torture, or great indignity, in consequence of the non-interference of Captain Elliot, he not being at the time authorised to interfere, still he would have been exposed to blame; but I also think that Captain Elliot acted wisely under the circumstances in taking the authority on himself. However, the opium was given up, and given up on these conditions:—“It is specially to be understood that the proof of British property, and the value of the opium so surrendered, are to be taken on the principle and in the manner to be hereafter defined by the British government.”

Now, the hon. member for Guildford tells us that they were entitled to receive the invoice price, which he contends would be the just price. [Mr. Mangles—would be considered just.] If the parties thought the invoice price a just price, why did not they stipulate with Captain Elliot for that price at the time the opium was given up? What could have been more easy? [Sir T. Wilde: It might, then, have been worth more or less?] Yes; but they expressly left it to the British government to determine what the principle of payment should be. The hon. and learned gentleman tells us that our concern is not with the parties who delivered up the opium, but with our own subjects—the natives of India, the producers of opium—who consigned it to British merchants in China, and whose claim, therefore, is not on the Chinese government, but direct on the British treasury. But the late government did not admit any such claim. Applications were constantly made to them before the value could be ascertained, to advance, on account of the distress of the parties, instalments from the treasury, which should be repaid on the recovery of the money from the Chinese government. The late government expressly denied that there existed any such claims on the British treasury. Their answer was, that they would attempt to recover the money from the Chinese government, but that they would not admit any claim on the British treasury. Nothing can be more express than the language used by the late government on those occasions. The noble lord the late Secretary of State for the colonial department will no doubt remember what he said on the occasion of such an application being made. He said,—“The government did not consider it to be consistent with their public duty to recommend parliament to lay such a burthen on the public, and they could not make any proposal to parliament for a grant for the purpose.”

Such a claim, therefore, was not admitted, and the estimate of Sir H. Pottinger of the amount that would be required from the Chinese government for compensation was 6,189,000 dollars, subject to some possible abatements. It was because the noble lord and Sir H. Pottinger concurred in thinking that 6,000,000 was a sufficient sum, that that amount was inserted in the treaty. That sum has been paid to us—it is now in our possession, and we propose to appropriate it in compensation for these demands. But it is said that the sum is inadequate, and as far as I can collect from the speech of the hon. member who spoke last, the amount which he considers we ought to pay would be much nearer 12,000,000 than 6,000,000 dollars. He thinks that the natives of India are not merely entitled to the £1,300,000 which we have recovered under the treaty, but to a further sum of £1,300,000 also. From what fund is that additional sum to be derived? Are we to go back to the empire of China, and after having agreed by treaty to take 6,000,000 of dollars, to tell them we made a mistake and must have more? No one will contend that such a demand on our part would be a just one. So far as China is concerned, you have closed the account, by requiring the Chinese empire to pay the 6,000,000 dollars; and nothing could be more iniquitous, supposing the treaty to have been ratified, and an amicable arrangement concluded, than to go to the emperor, and tell him we had made a mistake and must have more. But if the hon. gentleman's demand for an additional sum be a just one, and if it be admitted that we could not go to China for more, the fact that any such additional sum must come out of the British treasury imposes on us the necessity of still greater caution in coming to a decision. It was left to the British government to determine on what principle compensation should be made, and the question now is, what that principle shall be? The hon. and learned gentleman says, there are two modes of settling the price to be paid—either it shall be the invoice price, that is to say some speculative price agreed to be given at any preceding period, or you shall determine the price in each case by what would have been the value of the opium delivered up to Captain Elliot, supposing it had not been delivered up, and the party had waited for a better market and sold at a higher rate of profit. Why, how could such an inquiry be conducted—an inquiry not only into the cost price, but also into the cost of conveying it to China, varying in each particular case? If the invoice price be paid, it might be the price of a period long before, and if the other principle of the hon. and learned gentleman were adopted, the indemnity must be one for imaginary profits. I hold that the public could have no means of inquiring into what such profits would be. Now, what is the course taken by the government for the purpose of ascertaining the amount really due to the holders? They bore in mind, in the first instance, that this was a trade subject to great fluctuations, on account of its being a gambling speculation in violation of the law. We do not urge the illegality of the traffic as a reason against paying it all. No, we do not say that; but we do urge the illegality as a reason why the parties should bear such loss as would arise out of the risk and hazard of the trade; and we say, that in determining the amount of the compensation, we have a right to ascertain what was the value of the article at the time it was delivered up, remembering the principle on which the opium trade was carried on. We, therefore, did institute inquiries to ascertain the value; that is to say, the value at the time in India and China, not the value of the opium in India, after the account of the detention of British subjects and the seizure of the opium had reached India; but what was the selling price in India previous to that time; and if the price at the time of the seizure was lower than the price became after that news had arrived, then we did think it conformable to equity that we should compensate according to that reduced price, and not according either to the invoice price, or to any vague calculation of future possible profits. The clause in the treaty by which the 6,000,000 dollars were stipulated to be paid, gave the British government full latitude to adopt that principle. Suppose that 100 dollars had been given for a chest of opium in the year preceding, and that on the delivery of that opium the real value was not more than sixty dollars, why then that price of sixty dollars represents the real value of the opium at that time in the market. My hon. friend behind me tells me that I promised last session to grant inquiry. [Mr. Lindsay: Yes, a full and searching inquiry.] A full and searching inquiry! What occurred last session at the time referred to? The noble lord opposite said, if the government were likely to give the subject an effective consideration, then he would recommend the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lindsay) not to divide, though if he did divide, he should divide with him. But if he could get such an assurance from the government, he recommended him not to divide. My hon. friend behind me then said, if her Majesty's government would give the parties an opportunity of proving the value of the opium, and advance money on account, that would be perfectly satisfactory. I replied that the hon. member must use his own discretion; the government would prosecute inquiries in India, but could not pledge itself that those inquiries should be followed up in this country. The hon. gentleman, I said, must decide for himself, and my hon. friend was so dissatisfied with this answer, that he divided the House. The inquiries I was then referring to were inquiries we had directed three several authorities to make on the subject of these opium claims in India. It has been said that we were in possession of exactly the same information last March. I certainly was very much surprised to hear that assertion made. The date of Lord Ellenborough's letter, reporting the result of his inquiries, is March 22, 1842; the debate in this House took place on the 17th of March, 1842; the letter of Lord Ellenborough, therefore, was not actually written till a few days after that debate. The reply of Sir Henry Pottinger to the reference made to him, by a most singular coincidence, bore date the very day in which the debate took place in this House. His letter was dated Hong Kong, 17th of March, 1842;—it was, therefore, perfectly clear, that when government spoke in March, 1842, they could not be in possession of the replies from Sir Henry Pottinger and Lord Ellenborough to the references for inquiry which we had made to them. We had the letter of Captain Elliot, undoubtedly, which was one of the three, but we had no answer to the inquiries instituted in India for the purpose of ascertaining the value of this opium. Who were the parties we consulted? Were they persons likely to be prejudiced against the fair claims of the owners of opium? The hon. and learned gentleman passed a high eulogium on Captain Elliot; he mentioned the testimonies borne to his character by Lord Melbourne and the Duke of Wellington. Captain Elliot has, since his return from China, been appointed to a high situation in another part of the world. I, myself, when attacks have been occasionally directed against Captain Elliot, have taken the opportunity of his name being mentioned to bear my testimony to the high character, for moral as well as personal courage, which he has shown on several occasions, under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty. I have also borne willing testimony to his high character for disinterestedness and integrity. If he deserves that character, as unquestionably he does, could there be a man better qualified than Captain Elliot to give an opinion on this subject? He was the party who entered into this contract, and he was the best judge of what was the fair understanding, the spirit of the engagement, the intentions of the parties who surrendered to him their opium, in respect of which these claims now arise. Supposing Captain Elliot was perfectly disinterested, could there be one better qualified from his personal knowledge of India and China to pronounce an opinion on this subject? By what other process of inquiry could we ascertain the point? Appoint what commission we might, it would be impossible for them to determine the value of the opium on any such tests or principles, as those laid down by the hon. and learned member for Worcester. We had no alternative but to deal with the question on general principle, and for the purpose of ascertaining that general principle, the authorities to whom we referred were authorities certainly not prejudiced against these claimants. Captain Elliot was one of those to whom we referred. If there was any situation which could induce any man to take a favourable view of these claims, it was the situation in which Captain Elliot had been placed. The loss would not be with him. He was perfectly certain that the government could not resent the delivery of any opinion he might give, favourable to the claims of the holders of opium. He had every conceivable motive, if he were inclined to swerve from the direct path of public duty, for magnifying their claims. He says so expressly in the letter which he wrote. He says,—“ I certainly do admit I have a leaning, and I hope it will be thought natural that I should have, to the side of the best price to which I think the opium claimants have any sustainable title in the most liberal consideration of their case.”

I do entreat the attention of the committee to this opinion of Captain Elliot—this man of high integrity, and of the greatest disinterestedness. Admitting that he had a leaning in favour of the claims on which he was called to pronounce an opinion, he adds—“ On the other hand, I must uphold this principle, that you shall not exact from the Chinese government a greater sum than you could be fairly entitled to demand, looking to the market price of the article.”

Captain Elliot was under the impression that the demand was to be made on China, whose laws interdicted the introduction of opium; and is it unnatural, when he admitted his leaning in favour of the claims, that he should say, like an honourable man,—“ On the other hand, it would not be proper to exact from the Chinese government a larger price than there is reason to believe would have been recovered for that class of opium if it never had been taken from the merchants?"

Are not those the two principles which ought to have guided an honourable man in deciding such a case? He says—"I was the party that compelled the surrender of this opium; to protect the lives of British subjects who were detained, I asked the surrender of the opium; it was delivered to me in honourable confidence—I promised indemnity."

We admit the facts, and we refer to him who promised the indemnity, and say:—"You who were on the spot, you who knew the value of the opium, you who knew the principle on which the surrender took place, tell us your opinion as to the principle which should guide us in giving compensation."

Captain Elliot says:—"I will. My leaning is in favour of the claims, but, on the other hand, you cannot exact from the Chinese authorities a greater sum than that opium, if sold in the market at the time, would have brought to its possessor."

So much for Captain Elliot. We also referred to the Governor-general in council. You dwell, and justly, on the peculiar circumstances of the native Indians; you call attention to the fact, that they are not very conversant with our laws, that they see the growth of opium encouraged by the Indian government, that they consign it to British subjects living at Canton,—but who are their natural protectors? Surely the Governor-general in council. What prejudice can they have against the claims of the native merchants? The Indian revenues are not to bear the loss. No one supposes that the charge is to fall on the finances of India. It is admitted it cannot fall on China; it is clear if the sum is inadequate the charge must fall on the British treasury. The finances of India being exempt from all liability, there again we refer to an authority above all suspicion of being interested in favour of the British government and adverse to the native owners of the opium. We selected the particular authority charged with the protection of native Indian interests. The governor in council considered the principle on which compensation should be made; they came to the same conclusion that the selling price in India at the time immediately previous to the detention of Captain Elliot and British agents should be the rule observed in this case. They, too, had come to the conclusion that the selling price in India, immediately previous to the detention of British subjects, should be the rule observed in this case; and this principle, if practically carried out, would give the sum of 6,000,000 dollars, which was stipulated in the treaty as the amount by which the owners of opium should be compensated. The third authority who has been consulted is Sir Henry Pottinger, who contracted the treaty, and who had carried out the instructions of the noble lord; he proposed 6,000,000 dollars as the sum which the British government should require, and that demand was made and acceded to by the Chinese government. Sir Henry Pottinger stated:—"The inquiries which I have instituted have only tended to satisfy me that it is impossible to arrive at any conclusive or satisfactory opinion as to the value of the opium delivered in."

Sir Henry Pottinger thought then, that without further inquiry in India, which would lead to no practical result, the British government might form an opinion. That opinion the government has attempted to form, and it was in general conformity with Sir Henry Pottinger's report. Some hon. gentlemen might think that the principle of compensation ought to be carried further, but the opinion of the government is in general conformity with those of Captain Elliot, Sir Henry Pottinger, and the Indian government. If the government had stated to the House that the sum recovered under the treaty with the Chinese government was the value of the opium, and if at the same time we had proposed to carry the principle of compensation further, we should have been considered unfaithful guardians of the public purse, and to have shown undue favour to those on whose behalf the claim was made. It is impossible that the government could have any other desire than to do justice. In regard generally to claims of this kind, I think the chief security to the public against lavish expenditure is the treasury, and not the House of Commons. I have seen various claims of the kind brought forward in that House—as the Danish claims, for example—but resisted by the treasury on precisely the same principle as that on which the government resisted the present one. The government might have conciliated favour in that House, and might have spared themselves the oburgation of my hon. and valued friend behind me, which I am sorry to have incurred. I felt certain that if the government adhered to the course we have chosen, we should be liable to the imputation that has been cast upon us; but, on the whole, we consider that our public duty requires us to adhere to it. If the House of Commons entertains a different opinion—if they think that good faith requires that another million of money should be advanced from the treasury for the purpose of satisfying the demands of the opium merchants, the House has the power of expressing that opinion. With all deference, however, to the House, I retain my own opinion on the subject. I can assure the House that it was from no indifference or neglect to the subject I have come to that conclusion, but from a conviction that the ends of substantial justice will be satisfied by the arrangement I have proposed.

After a lengthened discussion, the vote was agreed to.

SLAVE-TRADE SUPPRESSION.

August 18, 1843.

On the question that the Speaker do leave the chair, to go into a committee on this bill—several members thought it would be advisable, in consequence of the late period in the session at which the bill had been introduced, to defer its further consideration.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should support the motion for going into committee on this bill. He did not think, that the fact of the bill having been brought down to the House late in the session should be made a reason for refusing to go into the consideration of it. The House had not refused, on the ground of the late period of the session, to go into other measures of importance: and it was a dangerous doctrine to lay down that, because it was the month of August, the House should not proceed to the consideration of such a measure. Though the bill was not brought down from the House of Lords till the month of August, there was a distinct notice given last year that the attention of parliament would be called to this most important question—whether British capital should be permitted to be employed in foreign countries in the encouragement of the slave-trade, and whether this mode of evading the provisions of the Consolidated Slave-Trade Abolition Act should be allowed to continue? That notice was given by Lord Brougham, and he was very sorry to hear any remarks made upon the character or motives of that noble and learned lord in connection with this subject. Who had laboured more successfully in the abolition of the slave-trade than Lord Brougham? By whose exertions had more important measures for the purpose been carried? Whose perseverance had done more for the abolition of slavery than that of Lord Brougham? So far from a notice from Lord Brougham that he should bring in a measure on this subject being calculated to produce indifference, he should have thought both from his past conduct, and from the success that had attended his past exertions, that such a notice was liable to have quite a contrary effect, and to have made the parties who were interested fully alive to the possible effect of his proposal; and when the government were charged with indifference and neglect, he must be permitted to say, that the parties who felt an interest in the subject ought to have exerted themselves to ascertain the character of the bill, how far it affected them, and in taking steps, if necessary, by a timely representation to the government, to oppose it in the other House; for it could not be denied that the recommendation of the House of Lords to a measure was a powerful argument in its favour when it came before the House of Commons, more especially when that recommendation was in favour of a bill which, like the present, involved high and important legal considerations. But the representations made to the government were not against the whole bill, but against particular clauses. [An hon. member: And those were not altered.] No, but let them go into committee to discuss the details. To the great principle of the bill no objection was made; that great principle being—as it right, after all the sacrifices made by this country, and still making, in respect to our commerce with the Brazils, with the view to abolish slavery—looking also at the suspicion attaching to us in foreign countries as to the honesty and genuineness of our motives in this respect, was it right that, having prohibited the slave-trade, and the employing of British capital in the slave-trade in our own dominions, we should connive at the employment of that capital, directly or indirectly, in the slave-trade in foreign countries? That was the question the House was called upon to decide—that was the principle upon which the bill proceeded.

If they were prepared to allow British capital to be so employed in foreign countries, why prevent its being employed in the same manner in our own colonies? Because then it would be under the control of the legislature; they could make regulations for it from time to time, and it would be subject to the influence of the public opinion of this country. But if they desired that the slave-trade should be carried on in such a way as that the greatest enormities might exist, and the greatest cruelties be perpetrated, without the control of the legislature or the checks of public opinion, then we should only continue to permit that capital to be so employed in foreign countries, and all the suspicion now entertained by those foreign countries as to our motives would be confirmed. Then, what was the situation of the West Indian proprietor? You tell him, we not only shall not carry on the slave-trade, or cultivate the estate you have purchased, so as to enable you successfully to compete with the foreign sugar grower, but you will permit that British capital, which might be employed in enabling you to maintain the profitable cultivation of your property—if you were allowed to avail yourself of slave-labour—but we will subject you to the additional disadvantage of having that capital employed in encouraging the slave-trade, and slave-labour in foreign countries. Why, there never was so grievous an act of injustice committed as would thus be inflicted on the West Indian interests—those interests which had strong claims on the justice of the House and the country. It was true we had paid the West Indian proprietors twenty millions as compensation when we abolished slavery—a large sum for us to pay, undoubtedly; yet, so far as a permanent compensation to them for the loss sustained by our act, perfectly inadequate, especially when the difficulties of their position in competing with the foreign slave owner were taken into account. It was true, they could not give any additional compensation, but the West Indian proprietors had at least a strong claim upon the justice of the House, and were entitled to demand that parliament should prohibit British capital being brought into competition with them by its being employed in maintaining the slave-trade in foreign countries. Suppose they were to throw open the British markets to the sugar of the Brazils and of Cuba, and bring it into competition with the produce of our West Indian colonies, was it to be tolerated that British capital should be employed, (no effort being made to suppress the slave-trade in those countries,) in bringing that sugar into competition with the West India sugar by means of slave-labour? We had treaties with the Brazils. Did they know that the law of that country prohibiting the slave-trade, was openly violated—that gangs of slaves were marched in open day through their principal towns, and that our treaties were utterly ineffectual, and the Brazilian laws perfectly powerless in preventing that trade. Why, some months ago, while our cruisers were absent from the coast of the Brazils, in protecting British interests at Monte Video and Buenos Ayres, the import of slaves had increased to an enormous extent. Our West India colonies were subject to natural disadvantages—in the quality of the soil and in the climate—as compared with the Brazils; and if, by means of the application of British capital, advantages of cultivation, in addition to those natural advantages, were given to other countries, the fate of the West Indian colonies was sealed, and their ruin would be completed. He spoke only of the great principle of prohibiting the employment of British capital to the encouragement of the slave-trade. An assertion of that principle was necessary to the character of this country. The enormous increase in the cultivation of foreign sugar proved the increase of the slave-trade. He understood that 80,000 or 90,000 slaves had been imported into Cuba. Was there sufficient capital in Cuba to carry on this immense trade? He feared that the application of the capital of other countries must be responsible for the greater part of it. He should wish the House to go into committee, in order to consider the clauses of the bill, but he should hope that no clause would be passed that would tend to defeat its main object. It would be better to defer the bill to another session than to legislate precipitately. If the examination of the bill by legal minds suggested any doubts that did not occur to the House of Lords, perhaps it would be better to defer them for inquiry by a future committee.

The House then went into committee, the various clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

THE ADDRESS.

Lord Clive proposed, and Mr. Cardwell seconded, the Address, in reply to her Majesty's speech.

Mr. Sharman Crawford proposed as an amendment, to add the following words to the tenth paragraph of the Address:—"To assure her Majesty that her faithful Commons will be always desirous to vote such supplies as may be found just and necessary for the public service; but that under the existing circumstances of the country we shall deem it our first and most important duty to inquire into the various grievances complained of by her people, and to devise such measures as may be most effectual for redressing all just causes of complaint."

SIR ROBERT PEEL:—Before I notice the motion which has been made by the hon. gentleman, the member for Rochdale, and on which I apprehend the first division will be taken, or make any remarks on the observations which have fallen from the noble lord, and the hon. member for Montrose, I am sure you will excuse me for expressing, in concurrence, I believe, with the general feeling of the House, the satisfaction with which I heard the speeches of my noble friend and the hon. gentleman who moved and seconded the Address. The hon. gentleman, the member for Montrose, a political opponent of theirs, stated distinctly that he recollected on no occasion to have heard an Address to the Throne moved and seconded with greater judgment and greater ability than have been displayed on the present occasion. I am sure that the ability which my noble friend and the hon. gentleman manifested, accompanied with a sincere and unaffected diffidence and distrust of their own powers has, I will not say won for them, but confirmed them in the general favourable opinion of the House; and I trust that the possession of that favourable opinion, as indicated more than once, will induce them to overcome that feeling of distrust and diffidence in their own powers, and stimulate them to apply their abilities to the public service of the country. Sir, it is my intention to offer a decided opposition to the motion of the hon. member for Rochdale,—more from what has passed in other places than from what he distinctly intimated to-night. I apprehend that motion is intended as the foundation of measures to be adopted for the purpose of stopping the supplies; and, Sir, if I concurred in opinion with the hon. gentleman—if I entertained the opinions which he entertains with respect to the advantage of introducing more of the democratic or popular influence into the constitution of this country—I should be equally energetic in deprecating his motion. I can conceive nothing more injurious to the popular principle of the constitution than to abuse the privileges we possess, and which are calculated for our guidance on great occasions. The power of moving constant adjournments is a power of which it may be right that individuals or a minority should continue in possession, but it is intrusted to them, like other powers, under a great responsibility; and they are seriously affecting the popular principle, and injuring those interests of which they are, I am bound to suppose, the sincere and strenuous advocates, if they lightly call into action instruments which ought only to be invoked on great occasions. The hon. gentleman says that he will stop the supplies until the grievances of the country are redressed—why, what various opinions are entertained both as to grievances themselves and as to the best mode of their redress? If the hon. gentleman, and those who concur entirely in opinion with him, were to form the government of this country, and possessed a great majority in parliament, they would be setting an example fatal to their own power, if they allowed a small minority, differing from them as to the nature of grievances and the mode of redress, to obstruct the conduct of public business, by abusing privileges conferred on them for the public benefit. The important privilege of moving an adjournment is conferred on the minority as a protection against an oppressive majority. I myself have seen no case in which the majority have been disposed to act in such a manner as to justify the adoption of such a course. But, above all, that great instrument of which we are in possession—namely, the power of stopping the supplies—is one which it is of the utmost importance that we should maintain intact, and refrain from impairing its efficiency in a great emergency by an inconsiderate and unjustifiable use of it, because a small minority differs from a great majority as to what constitutes a public grievance. I have known many occasions on which both the hon. gentleman and the hon. gentleman on his left (Mr. Wallace) have come forward with strong declarations as to their intentions; but in the course of the session their own good judgment and sense of public duty have prevailed over their rash declarations made at its commencement; and I have that confidence in the good sense and judgment of both the hon. gentlemen the members for Rochdale and Greenock, that I am inclined to think they will feel, on reflection, that being the guardians of the great popular instrument by which popular privileges, popular interests, and popular rights, may have to be defended—namely, the power of stopping the supplies—they will not discredit it by resorting to it on any trifling and unjustifiable occasion. Now, with respect to the speech of the hon. member for Montrose, I agree with the noble lord the member for the city of London much more than with the hon. gentleman, that in these times, and according to the practical working of the constitution, it is much better, if we can, to avoid wording the address in a manner that shall compel a division, and on this account, that a government might have great advantage in unfairly resorting to the opposite course. They know what is to be the nature of the speech, and the nature of the address; they might, therefore, if they were inclined, relying on a large majority, get a pledge on some particular question by summoning their friends to attend on the first night of the session. If I, as a minister, wanted to elicit from the House of Commons any declaration on the first day of the session in favour of a particular act of the government, or a particular line of public policy, I should feel it but fair to give public notice of my intention, in order that the opponents of such a measure might be enabled to attend and discuss it. The hon. member for Montrose said there were twenty-three paragraphs in the address, and how is it possible for us to express a deliberate opinion on each of them, worthy of the House of Commons, on the first night of the session? He says, give us at least twenty-four hours to consider. Well, now, if I gave the hon. gentleman twenty-four hours to consider these twenty-three paragraphs, I very much doubt whether, considering the importance of the subjects to which they advert, the interval of twenty-four hours would enable the House of Commons to come to a very satisfactory decision on each of those questions. The hon. gentleman did not show quite so much modesty and distrust in his own opinion as I should have expected, from the demand he made of twenty-four hours' delay; for he came forward with three or four amendments ready prepared, and said the House ought not to allow one moment to pass before it affirmed his opinions. When he called for time to consider the topics mentioned in the address, I certainly expected that he would have followed up his own advice, and not called on the House to pronounce a positive opinion in concurrence with his own on these four or five important questions introduced by him into this debate. Sir, the subjects adverted to are of so much importance, that it is infinitely preferable for the public interests, and the conduct of public business, that we should reserve each for separate discussion rather than attempt to pronounce any collective opinion on all the matters referred to in the speech and the address. I should be sorry to see the practice revived of reading the speech at the council the day before the meeting of parliament, and I think the present practice most fair and most advantageous. I think it advisable not only that a minister should avoid introducing into the speech of the Crown any subject that might provoke warm, perhaps acrimonious, debate, or on which political opinions might differ; but I think it advisable that he should avoid committing the House of Commons without full notice on any question introduced, rather than read the speech the day before, and expect the House of Commons to be ready to discuss all matters that might be contained in it. Sir, I am glad to hear that the general tenor of the speech meets so much the approbation of the noble lord. Reserving himself entirely on the question of Ireland, with regard to which the noble lord has given a distinct notice, I must say I heard with great satisfaction the noble lord means to give to the address his hearty and cordial concurrence, which more than consoles me for some of those taunts in which he has indulged in the course of his speech. With respect to France, the noble lord in his own vindication thought it necessary to refer to the period when there was an unfortunate and material discordance in sentiment and action between France and this country. I shall not indulge in any acrimony or refer to what were the causes of that difference. I contemplate, as I believe the House contemplates, with great satisfaction, the re-establishment of better feelings between the two countries; and I think it is infinitely better not to disturb it by any reference to the period when there might have been a difference of opinion. If we were to attempt to assign the precise amount of blame to which each party might be liable, I think we should be much more likely to run the risk of reviving animosity than allaying it; but on the main fact, the policy and advantage, not to this country, but to the interests of peace and of civilisation, of maintaining a friendly understanding with France, I have the satisfaction of thinking that this great popular assembly is almost unanimous. Referring to the course which I took in opposition, I never have concealed my sentiments as to the policy of establishing that good understanding, and I will explain fully what I mean by that good understanding. I do not mean any secret engagements between France and this country which can give offence to any of the other powers of Europe: our understanding ought to be patent and open to all the world. We seek not to interfere with or prejudice the rights of any other country—we covet no invasion of the territory of any of them—we wish not to diminish the just influence and authority of any of them—we wish not to propagate particular opinions in other countries with reference to systems of government—we do not wish to shake the attachment of any subjects to their sovereigns; but the time is come when we ask ourselves in France and England this question,—Are our interests so opposed to each other that there is a necessity for our fomenting party interests in other countries, and placing ourselves at the heads of rival factions, because the forms of government are different from our own? If there is no such opposition—if we are agreed in the general principles on which a good understanding should exist, I say again it is for the interest of humanity and civilisation that that good understanding should be permanently established. Does England covet any portion of France? Does France covet any portion of England? Do we seek any extension of territory at the expense of each other? Are our institutions opposed to each other? Each has a popular form of representative responsible government. This I say, on the part of this country, that I am perfectly certain that that good understanding with France would not be a cordial, and could not be a permanent one, if it were purchased by either country at the expense of the concession of one single point of national honour or the compromise of any one principle. In two countries of such high honour and of such great power it is absolutely necessary for the cordiality and for the permanence of that good understanding, that there should neither be any secret engagement, or special contract with which any other country can find fault; neither should it be in the power of the minister of the one country to boast that he has promoted, or attempted to promote, that accord, by obtaining for one any advantage over the other. On the part of France, I say at once, that no such concession has been made by the French government—there has been no compromise of any right; on our own part also I make the same declaration. There has been no concession on our part; no compromise of any right, or of any principle whatever. Now, what is the position of the two countries? We stand each of us at the western extremity of Europe, governed by similar institutions, and if we are not agreed our disagreement must influence the policy of every country with which we are connected. We are also in contact not only with the western states of Europe, but more than other countries with that great quarter of the globe which lies on the other side of the Atlantic. If we are to have different interests, if there is to be an English party and a French party in every state, I can only say that England and France will be the curses of the world, there will be no advance in well-constituted institutions; we shall be powerful enough to obstruct; but, for want of concord and agreement, we shall be unable to promote the successful results of the domestic policy of any state. This very day I read a letter from our representative at Athens, a very able and distinguished man, Sir Edmund Lyons, referring, I will not say to the conflict, but to that great discussion which is going on in Greece, and which, I trust, will be most favourable to the future interests of that country with respect to the establishment of a free constitution; the advice given by Sir E. Lyons is in conformity with the public sentiment in this country. His advice is in favour of the establishment of such institutions as are most in consonance with a limited monarchy, with all the privileges of a limited monarchy, and yet, at the same time, with a free expression of the popular will. If there is discordance between France and England at a period of such a great social revolution in Greece—if, as I said before, there is an English party and a French party, and this man is at the head of the English party, and another man at the head of the French party, there is little probability that the march of events will be smooth, and the result of that effort to establish these institutions successful. But when Sir E. Lyons is enabled to write on the 10th of January last, as he did write, and as I read this day.—“This is the advice which, when consulted, I have given, and I rejoice to say that I can rely upon the entire, the cordial, the persevering support, of the same opinions from M. Piscatory, the minister of France,”—I ask, is not that alone a decided proof at such a crisis of a nation's fate, of the great advantage of agreement between two such countries as England and France? The hon. member for Montrose, who is the representative of one set of opinions in this House, I presume I may call him the organ of extreme popular opinions, and the noble lord, the member for the city of London, the representative and organ of a great party in this House opposed to the government, have declared their concurrence in the sentiment I have ventured to express as to the importance of that agreement. I believe they are the feelings of the great body of the people of this country. There is no wish here to recur to past animosities, or revive those feelings of national antipathy and hostility, which ought to be converted on account of our vicinity into sentiments of reciprocal and mutual good-will. Such feelings are, in fact, entertained, notwithstanding our past conflicts, by the great body of the people. We admit the glory of France; we admit her military renown. No country in the world has attained a higher reputation in war, by the skill of her great commanders and the intrepid valour of her soldiers, than France. I do hope that great and powerful people will feel so conscious of their honour and renown, that they will not think it necessary to countenance feelings of hostility, or recur to past military operations for the purpose of securing to France that reputation of which they don't stand in need. I believe the cordial concurrence of the House in an address, declaring satisfaction at friendly relations between the two countries, will go far to satisfy the people of France that such are our honest and unaffected feelings. Sir, with respect to Ireland, I shall follow the example of the noble lord. Her Majesty declares her reluctance, while the legal proceedings are pending, to refer to those proceedings; and it is indeed impossible to refer to parties connected with affairs in that country without in some way alluding to the trials now going on. The noble lord has named a day (in anticipation that those trials will then be closed) when he intends to bring forward the affairs of that country; and I am on that account the less disposed to refer to those matters. Sir, almost the only other subject of importance to which the noble lord alluded was that of the Corn-laws. The hon. member for Montrose stated, that in 1841, I complained of the then government for not intimating in the royal speech their intention of bringing forward that subject, and I recollect observing that, considering the magnitude of the subject and the complicated interests it involved, when the government had made up their minds to bring it forward, they should have taken that course which the present government pursued in 1842, when there was a distinct reference in the royal speech to the Corn-laws, and a recommendation to take them under consideration. The hon. member added, that as the subject is not mentioned in the speech this session, we do not, he supposes, intend to alter the existing law. Sir, he is right in that supposition. Had the government entertained any such intention, they would have intimated it in the speech from the throne; and he is, therefore, correct in the inference he draws from our silence. The noble lord said, he thought the agriculturists—whom, sometimes, curiously enough, he defends against me, while at others, he attacks them him-self, have reason to complain of my conduct. He says, there are three classes of opinions on the subject of the Corn-laws. [Lord J. Russell: “On commercial policy, generally.”] I thought the noble lord spoke with reference to the Corn-laws. One opinion, he said, was, that it was desirable to protect native produce; that the present protection was not sufficient, and that it ought to be carried to a greater extent, regardless of our foreign trade. Another opinion, he said, was, that there ought to be an immediate and total repeal of all duties on corn; that if taxation existed, it should exist only as the means of raising revenue, and should not be instrumental to “protection,” properly so called. A third opinion, he said, was (and he added that he thought I had the honour to concur with him in the general principle), that although it might be true that in a new state of society, and abstractedly speaking, there should be no protection for native interests, yet in a country like ours, with such complicated relations and such large vested interests, and with so vast an amount of taxation, it would be dangerous to apply principles even abstractedly right, incurring the risk of a great disturbance of capital and of great injury to those engaged in existing arrangements. Sir, in that general principle I do certainly concur. I believe the abolition of the Corn-laws would produce great confusion and distress. There is, however, this difference between us—the difference between the fixed duty and the graduated scale. Now, here I retain my own opinions. Agreeing in the general principles as I have stated, with the noble lord, he proposes to secure his protection by a fixed duty, and he says members of parliament are liable to the invidious imputation of being actuated by personal interests in advocating the sliding-scale. Surely the same suspicion attaches to the fixed duty plan. The noble lord might say, I propose this fixed duty for the purposes of revenue, but if that duty be carried high, though intended by him for revenue merely, it operates in the same way as a graduated duty—it operates as a protection. If the noble lord intend it for revenue merely,—if he think there is no claim on the part of the agricultural interest to protection in any shape whatever, then I retain my opinion that the noble lord will find it extremely difficult to resist the argument, that if this duty be laid on foreign corn for the purpose of revenue only, and not for protection, why not apply it to corn of domestic produce? When the noble lord is defending his fixed duty on wheat as a fixed duty imposed, not for protection, but for revenue, he will have the case of barley and of malt quoted against him, and will be told that with respect to other descriptions of corn, such as barley, we do raise a large revenue from our domestic produce, and that if you do think it right to have a duty on wheat, not for protection, but for revenue, why not lay a tax on wheat ground at the mill, and not confine yourselves to taxes on the imports. Why not pursue, with respect to wheat, the course you have taken with respect to barley, and subject both foreign and home produce to equal duties—provided you are sincere in enforcing your duty, not on account of protection, but really mean to impose it on account of revenue. And what would you say to the representatives on whom you say it is so invidious to bestow protection on their own interests? Would you say, “I am exceedingly sorry to give you protection; it is a very invidious thing, and I think you have no right to it, but I am obliged to confer this unexpected benefit on you most reluctantly, because I mean to enforce my duty on foreign corn, not for protection, but for revenue.” The noble lord, I think, would find it difficult to prevail on his constituents to adopt that distinction. Sir, I stated last year—not because I contemplated alteration in the law at any future period, but because the question was put to me, that the government were not then prepared to alter the existing law. But when pressed on the part of the government to make a declaration that at all times, and under all circumstances, I would adhere to the existing law, I said that such a declaration on my part was inconsistent with the duty which I owed to the Crown, but I did not state that for the purpose of reserving to the government any escape from this question. The hon. gentleman has said that you have three courses open to you; that you may either repeal that law, for as far as a fixed duty is concerned, says the hon. gentleman, it is utterly impossible for you (the government) to propose it. I do not know what it is impossible for any man to do. I hope hon. gentlemen do not think that her Majesty’s government are making any reservation with respect to this. But when the noble lord shall think that, in the opinion of the agricultural portion of the community, protection may be set aside in favour of total repeal, whenever that alteration in public opinion shall have taken place, I am strongly inclined to think that the noble lord will be the party to propose a fixed duty, and not myself. But the experience of the present Corn-law has not in the slightest degree shaken my opinion in preferring the principle of the graduated scale to that of the fixed duty. I gave it the preference at the time I proposed it; and nothing that has yet happened has induced me to change my opinion. I say, therefore, now, as I said last year, though I should not, on the part of the government, think it consistent with my public duty to conciliate support by an engagement to adhere, under all circumstances, to a particular law respecting the imposition of duties—yet I can with equal truth say, I have not contemplated, and do not contemplate, an alteration in the present Corn-law. Why should the government contemplate such an alteration? I believe the prices of corn since the alteration of the present law have been at least as fixed, and subject to as little alteration, as at any previous time. Look to the prices of corn during the last three or four months. It is very difficult to find any period when the prices of corn were more regular or more fixed, with fewer variations than in any former period. The price has varied from 50s. to 52s.; and, I believe, that for the last three or four months that has been the extent of the variation. And then as to the price of corn in relation to dearness. I have here an account of the average prices of corn for the last fifty-four years, from 1790. I find that the present average price of wheat is 50s. 1d. Out of the fifty-four years there are only seven in which the average price has been less than the present price; whilst in forty-seven years it has been higher. Consequently, neither on account of the price of corn, nor on account of variations in that price, am I led to form a more unfavourable opinion with respect to the operations of the present law, than I entertained at the time when, on the part of the Government, I proposed it; and I can consistently again say, that the inference drawn by the hon. gentleman from the silence on this subject in her Majesty's speech is correct; and that, though the government do not bind themselves by engagements inconsistent with their duty to the Sovereign and the country, they have not contemplated, and do not contemplate, any alteration of the law which at present regulates the importation of corn. Sir, I do earnestly hope that the general state of the country justifies the expression with regard to it introduced into the speech from the throne. I do believe there has been a material improvement in some important branches of manufactures and trade. There was a great change in the customs duties in 1842, and there was, I think, a disposition to draw too hasty a conclusion as to the operation of that change. Government asked for time, in order to have an opportunity of judging what would be the effect of the alteration. When we mentioned, last year, that we thought there were indications of improvement, though the noble lord says he joined us in the expression of that opinion, yet I recollect well the statement was doubted by gentlemen on the other side, and we were told we had nothing but prospects of increasing depression. I hope that it is now admitted that a material improvement has taken place in some branches of manufacture. The iron trade, I am aware, is still in a state of depression; but, as was justly said by my hon. friend, the demand for increased means of communication throughout the country, the proposals for new railways, the increased prosperity of those manufactures which require a considerable quantity of iron, will all have the effect of increasing the consumption of that article; and I do trust that the operation of these causes will influence the iron trade in turn, and that we shall not only find indications of, but substantial and active improvements. With respect to the revenue—her Majesty's government, professing not to represent it in too bright colours, state a fact to the House which is consistent with truth, viz., that in the present year the course of deficiency has been suspended, and that the revenue of the present year will at least be amply sufficient to meet the existing charges. I trust, therefore, that the House believe that we do meet parliament in the present year under improved circumstances. Looking to our foreign policy, and to the questions which we have arranged with the United States—a country with which we maintain relations probably as important even as those we maintain with France—if we have not settled all the questions of difference with that country, we have at any rate removed those immediate obstructions to a good understanding which, two years ago, threatened the relations of amity that subsisted between us. With France, without concession or compromise on the part of either government, we are justified in stating, that the most friendly understanding prevails; and we have found that friendly understanding telling with advantage in every quarter of the globe in which the interests of the two countries come in contact. The balance between revenue and expenditure is equalised; and at any rate we have this year put a stop to the accumulation of debt. That depression which visited some of the great interests of this country, and which caused such deprivation and suffering amongst the working classes, is at least in a considerable degree converted into growing prosperity—a prosperity which, I trust, will become still greater. I know perfectly well that, although suffering and privation are relieved, there still exists, in many parts of the country, distress which we cannot view without sympathy; but this, I trust also, is in the course of being lessened, if not removed. And, on the whole, I do trust that I am justified in stating, that in the performance of our duties towards the Crown and the country, with respect both to foreign relations, the condition of trade, and the state of the revenue, that we are enabled to present ourselves before the assembled parliament of this country as having fulfilled the expectations which we held out as to the prospects of the empire, and the effects of the measures we proposed, and that you will deem we have not been wanting in the duties which we owe to our sovereign and the country.

The House, after a long discussion, divided on the question, that the words proposed by Mr. Crawford be inserted: Ayes, 29; Noes, 285; majority, 256. An amendment by Mr. Hume was also negatived, and the House adjourned.

STOPPING THE SUPPLIES.

FEBRUARY 6, 1844.

Upon the Order of the Day being read for going into Committee of Supply—Mr. S. Crawford proposed an amendment, to the effect, that it was the duty of that House, as representing the people, to inquire into the various causes of complaint under which the people were suffering, and that those complaints, if justly made, should be redressed previously to granting the supplies.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I am very willing to admit that the hon. gentleman opposite is fully entitled to that credit which he took to himself of having discussed that motion he has this night brought forward, with moderation and temper. I think it is impossible for any man who has listened to the observations of the hon. gentleman not to admit this—and I think, also, that it would not be just to attempt to raise any prejudice against this motion by imputing to the hon. gentleman the possible design, at any future period, to obstruct the business of this House by frequent and vexatious motions of adjournment. Whatever course the hon. gentleman may be hereafter advised to adopt—and my confidence in his good sense leads me to hope that unless supported by a very large body of the people out of doors, and by a majority within the House, he would not consider himself justified in pursuing that one to which I have just referred. Of the motion of the hon. gentleman we must judge by a reference to its own merits; and I am sure that he will admit that I have met it in a corresponding spirit with that in which the hon. gentleman has brought it under our notice. I take, therefore, this resolution as it is, and I ask the House at once whether, or not, it be for the public interest that this House should pass a vote in favour of it? The resolution, Sir, consists of two parts. The first insists on its being the immediate duty of this House to make inquiry into grievances alleged or complained of; and the second point denies the competency of the House to grant supplies or to perform any legislative functions whatever, by a defect in its constitution. Why, Sir, if this resolution were to be carried, the House of Commons would, to use a quotation of the hon. member opposite, pronounce itself criminal in the face of the country, and the sooner it abandons its duty the better. This resolution, as well as the speech of the hon. gentleman, is an impeachment of the power and competency of the House, the remedy suggested for which would be the greatest social revolution which any country has ever witnessed. Sir, the hon. gentleman enumerates, among the grievances of the people, which he alleges require immediate redress, the monopoly enjoyed by the East India Company, and the monopoly granted to the Bank of England. He there complains of the passing of the New Poor-law, and considers that it affords a just ground of complaint, and requires, with these monopolies I have named, an immediate inquiry. The hon. gentleman then passed on to the Church Establishment, and stated, that the people of this country were disposed to complain of the existence of the Church Establishment in this portion of the empire, whilst in Ireland he considers it to be a still greater grievance than in this country, in consequence of the peculiar state of society in that part of the kingdom. Even in Scotland, too, says the hon. gentleman, the people begin to complain of a Church Establishment. Not satisfied with these complaints, the hon. gentleman even includes in his catalogue of grievances the new police force of the country; and among the various establishments respecting which he prefers charges against parliament, is that of the old office of constitutional constable of the abolition of which he complains, and of its supersession by a hired force. The Corn-laws constitute, also, another great grievance; and what the hon. gentleman proposes is, that we should withhold supplies to the Crown until all these various matters—the charter of the East India Company, the Bank charter, the new Poor-law, the Church Establishment, the Corn-laws, and the constabulary force—shall have been investigated; in short, until the House of Commons shall have passed a resolution to make one simultaneous inquiry into all these questions—that is to say, the supplies having been voted for the service of the year, from April 1843, until April 1844, the House of Commons shall institute such an inquiry as this, into the entire social state of the three constituent parts of the United Kingdom, and of our colonial dependencies. Such a course of proceeding, Sir, is perfectly impracticable. And does the hon. member suppose—even if his own views of the state of society justify him in asserting every thing that is contained in his resolution—does the hon. member seriously think that it would conduce to the remedy of any one of these complaints he has preferred against us, or that it would lead to a satisfactory conclusion of any question connected with a complicated state of society such as our own, that we should proceed to pass a resolution such as this? In the first place, how, let me ask, is such an inquiry to be made? The hon. gentleman does not mean to bring forward a motion for a committee of the whole House for the purpose of embarrassing the government. We understand that—we know that such a motion implies a want of confidence in the government. The House, generally, on such a question, looked upon a motion involving it as representing the views of one party in parliament in opposition to those of the other; but what the hon. gentleman proposes is, that before we grant to the Crown the usual supplies for the public service, we shall resolve ourselves into a committee of the whole House, for the purpose of instituting an inquiry into all these various and important matters. Why, Sir, what would be the effect of such a step, even were it possible? Its effect would be to raise expectations we could never gratify—whilst the still more probable result of such a resolution would be a perfect conviction of the folly of the House which should agree to it. But the hon. gentleman is not contented with affirming the policy of his resolution; he goes still further, and, in the second portion of it, he says, that “This House can have no right to vote supplies, except, as being the representatives of the people, it is imperatively necessary that the charges brought against its present constitution and competency in the petitions which have been received and recorded among its proceedings, should be inquired into, and, if found to be justly made, redressed before this House shall proceed to the voting of supplies.”

And then the hon. gentleman refers to a petition presented some two or three years ago, and very numerous signed, which impeached the competency of the House, and asks us how we can with decency enter upon the duty of voting supplies for the service of her Majesty before we have inquired into all the charges contained in that petition. Why, that petition demanded a complete and radical reform in parliament as essential to redress the grievances of the people. The hon. member who seconded this resolution, stated that there are six millions of adult population in this country, and that only one million of them are represented in the legislature—that the House is guilty of having subjected the remaining five millions to taxation, without giving them, at the same time, a fair and adequate representation in parliament; and his proposition is, that we shall confer the right of the suffrage upon the whole of them. The hon. gentleman does not come forward as the advocate of household suffrage, but maintains that the right to possess the franchise shall be co-extensive with taxation. But if that principle be a just one, I confess I do not see how he can refuse the right to the female portion of the community. Though the hon. gentleman says that it is unjust to subject five millions of people to be taxed without possessing the right of the suffrage, he is obliged to limit his proposition to something less extensive—and excludes females, while on his principles both the male and female portion of the community ought to be invested with the right to vote. The hon. gentleman appears to say, that they ought. I can only say, then, that the hon. gentleman comes forward as a more comprehensive reformer than any that has hitherto appeared in this House. But why limit the right of suffrage to adults alone? You subject parties under age to taxation, and you make the youth of eighteen years of age liable to serve in the army, and according to the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman, if you impose taxation on such a person, you ought, at the same time, to give him the right to the suffrage to an equal extent. Indeed, the hon. gentleman's proposal is neither more nor less than this, that the whole of the population of this country, and of every part of the United Kingdom, who pay taxes through the operation of indirect taxation, shall, both male and female, have a share in the representation of the people. If the principle of the hon. gentleman be a just principle, is it possible he can contest this conclusion? and depend upon it, his new House of Commons will very speedily be liable to the same charges as are brought against the present, and that a petition will necessarily be soon numerous signed by females and youths and presented to it, saying—"We are entitled to the right of the franchise"—and the new House, arraigned by hundreds and by thousands of persons, will end in being bound to admit its own incompetency, and be exposed to the same charges as are now brought by the hon. gentleman, and those who think with him, against the present House of Commons. From the speech of the hon. gentleman I should have thought he was contending for a repeal of the reform bill—and for a return to the old boroughmongering parliament; for his argument was, that the infusion of the democratic principle into this House has disappointed the public expectation, and inflicted a heavier burthen of taxation on the country than it had before been required to bear. The hon. gentleman did not, certainly, bring this forward as a taunt against reformers—he was not prepared to twit the noble author of the reform bill on this account—but he brought his estimates with respect to different periods together, and shewed that, under the reform bill, there had been an addition of £10,000,000 to the burthens of the people. He says that, in the year 1822, the more moderate parliament of that day had a standing army of only 91,000 men—that you have reformed the parliament, and the army is now augmented to 137,000, and the taxes also are very heavily increased. It would be a legitimate conclusion from the hon. gentleman's principles to go back to those happy times when the army was no greater than the amount he states, than to follow the hon. gentleman in the perilous career he proposes—for his whole argument went to show that economy of the public money, and a resistance to oppression, do not depend upon the constitution of this House, but upon the virtue of the men in it. The hon. gentleman went back to the year 1692, and says, that the House of Commons of that day claimed for the people the right of having frequent parliaments. William the third, a powerful monarch, departed from the engagement he had entered into in this respect, and the consequence was, that the House of Commons determined to refuse the supplies till the public faith, which had been pledged by the Crown, should have been fulfilled. But that virtuous parliament, which, in two successive years—backed, too, by the House of Lords—controlled, and justly controlled, the will of the Crown, had a much less free constitution than the present parliament enjoys; and I must say, judging from the speech of the hon. gentleman, I should have inferred that he is no friend to the present parliament, and that he is making an ingenious argument to show his preference to be in favour of going back to that of 1822—nay, still further, if you have the courage to do so—even to the parliament of 1692.

But again, the hon. gentleman's condemnation of this present parliament was somewhat qualified, for the hon. gentleman, paying a compliment to myself, for which I beg to return him my sincere acknowledgments, said that when it became necessary for us to make a great exertion to equalise the revenue with the expenditure, o the country, the present parliament did, what? Impose additional burthens on the poorer classes, and duties upon articles which though not of exact necessity, yet in a great measure, partake of that character? No; the hon. gentleman's charge against the present parliament was not that they included in their taxation articles of general consumption, but that they were contented to lay an additional burthen upon themselves, instead of trying to lay it on the great body of the people. And they did so—but I cannot see that, in doing so, they betrayed a keen desire to increase the burthens of the people—or that they by any means deserve that blame which could justify these charges against their competency. Take the Poor-law Act, for instance. The hon. gentleman refers to that law as one great grievance. Did the legislature pass that Act merely from a wish to make an alteration in the law? Was it without inquiry that we passed the Poor-law bill? No; commissions were appointed expressly to inquire into every part of the subject, and the great and crying abuses of the late system of relief of the poor were brought to light; and a government, having no other view with reference to that law than to remedy the evils of the old system, which threatened to destroy the comfort and undermine the private character of the bulk of the population, incurred without flinching great unpopularity by introducing the bill in which their remedy was embodied. Again, with respect to the charter of the Bank of England, I should like to see how the hon. gentleman, having obtained his committee, and a resolution to inquire into the subject of the bank charter having been concurred in—I should like to see how the hon. gentleman would go on? Is he aware of the inquiries which have already been made upon this subject? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to conduct such an inquiry? Is he aware that, for three sessions, one branch of the subject alone occupied the attention of a committee of this House—that another committee was subsequently appointed to investigate it, which did not make its report until the end of the then Session of Parliament? Is the hon. gentleman ignorant of all these inquiries? If not, how can he come forward and say that into none of these grievances has inquiry been made? If he thinks that the subject of the charter granted to the Bank of England was not fully investigated, I wish him joy of any inquiry at the bar of this House which he could institute into the whole case of the bank charter. And what, I should like to be informed, are we to do with regard to the church establishment whilst that inquiry is going on? I will venture to say, with reference to the duration of such an inquiry, that the hon. gentleman will find such a variety of opinions upon every part of the subject—so much business added to the investigation in reference to country banks, and to joint-stock banks—so much discussion connected with the question of the Currency-bill of 1819—that I am sure he would be obliged to postpone ad Græcas Calendas all the other questions which his resolution embraces. With respect to the other questions, the church establishment, reform in parliament, and so fourth, they are subjects to be decided on by the deliberate sense of the House, after full and adequate discussion, by select committees of the House, or by committees of the whole House. These, then, Sir, are the grounds on which I resist this motion. I say that it is impracticable, and that it would be absurd, to pass a resolution pledging ourselves to inquire into eight or ten different subjects, embracing the entire state of domestic society in this country. For the House of Commons to make a public confession of its own incompetency, and to declare itself “criminal,” because a petition was presented two or three years ago, charging it with such imputations, appears to me most extraordinary, and I must say, it is equally improbable that the House of Commons will consent to place itself in such an anomalous position. The hon. gentleman entered into a variety of details, but the House will, I think, agree with me, that this is not the proper time for discussing such matters. The deep importance of the various matters to which the hon. gentleman adverted I am perfectly ready to admit, but I am not prepared to admit that this House is in a situation to enter upon inquiries into the several questions with respect to taxation to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. The hon. gentleman, among other instances of unjust taxation, mentioned the article of tea, and he said it was a gross and scandalous injustice to the poor to lay an equal duty on all descriptions of tea. The House must be aware that there was a discriminating duty on tea, which duty was established from a desire to consult the interests of the great body of the consumers. Why was it abandoned? It was not abandoned as the act of the government, or from any wish to interfere with the interests of the consumers, but after a laborious investigation by a committee of the House of Commons, which led to the conviction that the difficulty of collecting the duties was so great as to render the imposition of an equal duty indispensable. That was the opinion of a right hon. gentleman opposite, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then held office as one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, and whose opinion had great influence with the government; and I think I may appeal to the right hon. gentleman to confirm me in what I say, that if an equal duty on tea was substituted for a discriminating duty, it was not with any view to bear hardly on the working classes, or consult the interests of the government, but merely to give facilities for the proper collection of the revenue. If you could, without fraud, raise an equal amount of revenue from a discriminating as from an equal duty, the government would have no objection whatever to apportion the duty to the quality of the tea; but that was found to be impracticable, and therefore it was that the equal duty was substituted for the discriminating duty. Sir, with regard to the article of beer, I think that the comments of the hon. gentleman cannot have any weight, at all events in reference to my right hon. friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, for it was on the advice of my right hon. friend that the government consented to abandon the tax on beer, considering it to be untenable as distinguished from the duty on malt. The House seeing in the proposition of my right hon. friend a means of adding to the comfort of the people at once acceded to it. The House, therefore, agreed to a diminution of the revenue in this particular instance, for no other purpose than that of adding to the comforts of the people; and, consequently, I deny the charge made against this House, of being inattentive to the wants of the people, and of having no disposition to undertake any inquiry which we think may conduce to the advantage of the people. On all the subjects to which the hon. gentlemen have adverted, there have been full and frequent inquiries, and that, I say, shows that there is a strong desire, in reference to taxation, to consult the interests of those on whom taxation falls; but, at the same time, I conjure the House not to lower themselves in the eyes of the country, or injure their character by such a declaration as that we are incompetent to legislate, because a petition numerously signed has claimed for the whole people a right of suffrage, and has branded the House as the unworthy representatives of the nation.

The amendment was negatived by a majority of 108, and the House went into Committee.

VOTE OF THANKS TO SIR C. NAPIER, AND THE ARMY IN SCINDE.

FEBRUARY 12, 1844.

SIR R. PEEL said, Sir, I rise for the purpose of moving that the thanks of the House be given to a portion of the British army, and to its gallant commander, for services recently performed under very critical circumstances, and during very important operations on the banks of the Indus, which army has, under these circumstances, and during these operations, exhibited proofs of discipline, of constancy and of valour, which have sustained and even exalted the high character of the British army, and have entitled that army and its commander to the public expression of our thanks. With the policy of the measures in the execution of which that army has been employed, I have, upon this occasion, nothing to do. Whether it were justifiable and politic to exact from the Ameers of Scinde penalties on account of the violation of their engagements—whether it were politic to demand the cession of territory in lieu of the tribute to which the Ameers were subject, are questions which, in my opinion, ought to be reserved altogether for separate consideration. I have now to call the attention of the House to the conduct and merits of gallant men performing the first duty of a soldier—namely, obedience to lawful authority, and by the mode in which they performed it, entitling themselves, in my opinion, to the public acknowledgment which I shall propose. Sir, others I consider to be responsible for the measures, the execution of which was committed to Sir Charles Napier. He was employed by the Governor-general. He received instructions from the Governor-general. He had authority, within certain limits, from the Governor-general; but for the employment, the instructions, the authority, the civil power in India, and not Sir Charles Napier, is, in my opinion, altogether responsible. I shall be prepared on the proper occasion, if need be, to vindicate the instructions and authority, but upon the present occasion, I shall altogether abstain from entering into any discussion on the policy of the measures themselves. Sir, the information which has recently been laid on the table of the House, and the degree of public attention which has been directed to the operations in Scinde, relieve me from the necessity of entering into any detail with regard to the measures which led to the employment of the British army on that occasion. I take it for granted, that every gentleman has read the papers laid on the table of the House, relating to the subject, and I shall not, therefore, enter into any unnecessary detail of the circumstances which led to the British army being placed under the command of Sir Charles Napier. The House would recollect, that about the month of September, 1842, Sir Charles Napier was directed to take command of the British army in Scinde and Beloochistan. The active operations in which he was engaged extended for a period which is included between January 1843, and the latter end of March, in the same year. That period of three months, included the advance upon Emaum Ghur, the battle of Meeanee, and the battle of Hyderabad. These two battles, the most prominent objects to any one contemplating the subject, were fought under very peculiar circumstances. According to the first report of Sir Charles Napier, the force opposed to him in the battle of Meeanee amounted to somewhere about 23,000 men, while his own force did not exceed 2,800. I have, however, reason to believe, that he overrated the amount of the force under his command, and underrated that of the force opposed to him. I believe it would be more consistent with the truth, were I to say, that the number of British troops under his command at the battle of Meeanee, did not exceed 2,000, and that the force opposed to him did not fall short of 25,000, the number originally given. Sir, the force of the Ameers consisted of men accustomed to war, of great natural courage, and of desperate resolution, to which full credit is given in the admirable despatch of Sir Charles Napier. That force, originally estimated at 25,000 men, occupied a very formidable position. They were posted in the dried bed of a water-course, which during the inundations of the Indus becomes filled. The enemy were flanked by a village, and by a wooded country, almost impervious to troops. Their position, I believe, was defended by fifteen pieces of artillery; and against this force of 25,000 men so posted, Sir Charles Napier and his army marched, for the purpose of defending their lives, and supporting the honour and credit of their country. At the battle of Hyderabad, the force of Sir Charles Napier had received the addition of two or three regiments; and the British force in that battle amounted to 5,000 men. The force opposed to him, consisted of about 20,000. Of the courage and resolution of the army of the Ameers no greater proof can be given than one adduced from the despatch of Sir Charles Napier,—“That on the approach of the British army the Beloochees did what, as an exhibition of courage, corresponds in European warfare with the actual conflict of the bayonet, the proof of European courage which is the most decisive, that after discharging their firelocks at the troops of Sir Charles Napier, they rushed from the water-course in which they had taken up their position and attacked the British soldiers with their shields and swords, which they took as substitutes for their firelocks.”

Nothing can be more decisive than the testimony of Sir C. Napier to the valour of those who were opposed to him; at the same time, any one who considers the circumstances of the action, the nature of the position, the valour of the enemy, and the disparity of the forces, will admit that the valour of the enemy was rendered vain by the eminent military skill on the part of Sir C. Napier. Sir, in those two battles also, although there was such an immense disparity of force, the valour of the British soldiers fully maintained the character of their country. In the first battle, where the disparity was the greatest, the British force consisted, I think, of only one regiment of Europeans, three regiments of Sepoys, if I remember rightly, the 25th, the 12th, and the 1st, and some native cavalry; and it is, I think, most gratifying to know that there was no distinction in the exhibition of valour, between the Sepoy and the European; animated by the example of their officers, both Sepoy and European were exposed to the common danger, and showed an equal degree of courage and resolution. Sir, to the officers and men employed on that occasion it would be impossible to attribute too high praise; but, at the same time, justice requires that we should not overlook the great cause of the victory. It is, in my opinion, mainly to be ascribed, both at Meeanee and Hyderabad, to the example set by the gallant officer, who was responsible for the British army on those occasions. It is most fortunate that at such a crisis, and under circumstances of such difficulty, the command of the British army was committed to a man, one of three brothers, who have engrafted on the stem of an ancient and honourable lineage that personal nobility which is derived from unblemished private character, from the highest sense of personal honour, and from repeated proofs of valour in the field, which have made their name conspicuous in the records of their country. Sir, each of these three brothers learnt the art of war under an illustrious commander during the whole of those memorable campaigns of which one of them has been the faithful, impartial and eloquent historian, and the exploits of those three brothers during the whole of those campaigns entitled them to the gratitude of their country. In almost every action of the Peninsular war they gave proofs of great military skill and personal valour. In the actions of Corunna, of Busaco, of Ciudad Rodrigo, and during the operations of the Pyrenees, they proved that there was no British officer more prodigal of his blood in the cause of his country than was each of those brothers. Sir, the officer who commanded in the actions to which this notice refers, bears a name than which there is none more conspicuous in the bright pages which contain the records, whether in the military or the naval annals of this country, for desperate and successful valour. For if we read the account of some naval action, in which, in the course of five minutes, with a force wholly unable, unless directed with the utmost skill and valour, to compete with the enemy—if in the course of five minutes we find a signal victory achieved, by which the glories of St. Vincent are revived—a victory by the moral effect of which a dynasty is changed,—if we read the records of such an action, we find the name of the commander there is Napier. Even in a more limited and circumscribed sphere of operation, when, in the course of last year, it became of the utmost importance to impress on a misguided multitude the inherent strength of the law and the civil power directed by a consciousness of right, and by consummate skill, the man who, accompanied by only six constables, attacked hundreds of people, and captured more of those opposed to him than the number of the men he commanded—I remark, with satisfaction, that the person who achieved that, comparatively speaking, humble and yet most useful exploit, also bore the name of Napier. I am justified then in saying, that in the records of gallant exploits, whether civil, military, or naval, there is not one name which stands out more conspicuously than the name borne by the gallant officer who commanded at Meeanee and Hyderabad. And, Sir, I believe that those who bear that name, stimulated by the examples of their predecessors, will continue to exhibit the same courage and resolution in great actions, and that the motto which they bear on their shields, “Ready, ay, ready,” will be as it is, their motto, so also the characteristic of their conduct. Let the House recollect that when Sir Charles Napier was called on to take the command of the forces in Scinde he had attained the age of sixty-two, and that his body had been shattered in the service of his country; and yet it is to his spirit—to the example which he set the troops—inspiring an unparalleled confidence in their commander, that we must mainly attribute the success of the actions of Meeanee and Hyderabad. The quality of actions, Sir, chiefly depends on the character of those who superintend them. The actions which have been performed by the members of the Napier family may appear foolhardy to the pusillanimous—they may appear the mere result of a lucky chance to the superficial; but however desperate they may appear when they are undertaken and superintended by ordinary minds, they are, nevertheless, reconcilable with the soberest calculations of prudence when directed by such men as Sir Charles Napier. Sir, there is one point I am desirous of adverting to, because I know if rashness could be imputed to Sir Charles Napier—if it could be imputed to him that he had needlessly led the British army into the conflict—no praise which we could bestow on his valour would compensate him for the painful reflections which such an imputation would give birth to in his mind. I think it is impossible for any one to peruse the papers relating to this question without coming to the conclusion that not only was that the wisest course which Sir Charles Napier could take—namely, that of at once encountering the enemy, but that if he had pursued any other course, the safety of the army would have been compromised. It is difficult to speculate as to what might have been the results if a different course had been taken; but if any man could entertain a doubt as to the policy of the course which Sir Charles Napier took in not suspending his march, in not permitting the Ameers to congregate, and in determining at once to bring his force of 2,500 men into conflict with a force of eight times the number, he would only ask such a man to read the account of what passed in the year 1839, at the time when Sir John Keane arrived from Bombay at the mouth of the Indus. Do not speculate on what the Ameers would have done in 1843, if Sir Charles Napier had delayed his march or withdrawn his troops, but read the testimonies of what their conduct was in 1839, and I think you will say that Sir Charles Napier had no alternative but at once to front the danger which menaced him. In 1839, Lord Auckland having determined on advancing into Afghanistan, he sent a force from Bombay, under the command of Sir John Keane, for the purpose of entering upon some negotiations with the Ameers, and of making Scinde the basis of his military operations. Lord Auckland, in describing the operations of Sir John Keane, gave this account of the conduct and attentions of the Ameers:—The Bombay division, under the command of Sir John Keane, landed at the Hujamsee mouth of the Indus in the early days of December, and Lord Auckland, writing in March, 1839, says:—“No resistance was offered to its disembarkations, but from the date of its arrival every artifice was resorted to, to thwart and impede its movements, notwithstanding the most fulsome professions of friendship and devotion.”

They (the Ameers), says Lord Auckland, professed the utmost devotion, yet he says that they were at the same moment “making every preparation for hostilities, and that they endeavoured to see what good they could derive from a system of feigned confidence and violent menace.” The Ameers then took with respect to Sir John Keane the same course which they afterwards took with respect to Sir Charles Napier:—“Communications,” Lord Auckland continued, “were cut off—letters seized—boatmen and other workpeople threatened—and every appearance of intended open hostility exhibited.”

On the 24th January, 1839, Sir John Keane writes—“I have in former communications stated to you that Scinde has all along been considered a light affair, as it might be called a secondary consideration; as relating to the campaign, so near as I can judge at this hour, it assumes a different aspect, and takes a first place in the operations of the army.”

Again, immediately after he writes:—“Things have come to a crisis in Lower Scinde; the gentlemen of the residency have been obliged to leave Hyderabad, and are now in my camp.”

I ask you also, continued the right hon. baronet, to read the account which Lieut. Eastwick gives of the menaces directed against him. There is no saying what the consequences might have been if he had remained at Hyderabad. He retired, and if he had not been prudent enough to retire, he would have been exposed to the same attacks as that gallant officer, Major Outram, was afterwards subjected to. Lieut. Eastwick in his account of the negotiations, states, that “On the 20th January, the treaty was given to the Ameers; on the 21st January, the Ameers desired the meeting should be postponed to the 22nd. On the 22nd the Ameers said they could not on that day give an explicit answer; they would not say whether they would accept the treaty or not. On the 23rd hordes of troops surrounded the city, and the reply of the Ameers was that the treaty should be sent back, for that they would not sign.”

The proceedings of the Ameers, in 1839, were exactly similar to those of 1843. They made fulsome professions of friendship and devotion—they asked you to postpone the negotiations from day to day—they pretended to wish for further time for consideration, but every hour they were collecting their forces. At their request four days were allowed to elapse. When their preparations were completed, what was their answer? “The treaty could not now be signed—the embassy might go or stay as they pleased, but they (the Ameers) could give them no pledge of safety, having no control over the Beloochees.”

So Sir John Keane says:—“The whole country in front and in rear of us is now aroused and under arms to exterminate us if they can. Troops are flocking in from all directions to the capital. Let a brigade of infantry, two regiments of cavalry, and a troop of horse artillery, be sent down as soon as possible.”

Why did not the Ameers attack the British army? “Because Sir Willoughby Cotton having received authentic intelligence of the immediate hazard of a rupture in Lower Scinde, marched two brigades of infantry, one brigade of cavalry, and a large force of artillery, down to the east bank of the Indus in the direction of Hyderabad. The troops of Shah Shoojah had been sent to occupy Sukanna, a town from which the Beloochee soldiery had been drafted to support the Ameers of Hyderabad."

Sir John Keane, who was on the opposite bank, wished to take that course which Sir Charles Napier afterwards took, of making an attack at once. On the 30th of January, Sir Henry Pottinger, finding himself supported by such a force, told the Ameers he could now make no abatement in the terms which had been proffered; but if they still refused, if a gun or a matchlock were fired, their whole country would be seized, and that they themselves would be dispossessed of power. When the Ameers found that four or five brigades of British troops were close upon them, they signified, on the 1st of February, their readiness to submit to terms. If, however, there had then been only a force of 2,000 or 2,500 men, depend upon it the Ameers, notwithstanding their professions of friendship, would have attacked our troops. Sir Charles Napier was not in the condition in which Sir John Keane and Sir Willoughby Cotton were. He had not 8,000 or 10,000 men under his command, but only a limited force of 2,500 men to oppose to the forces of the Ameers. My opinion is, that if he had delayed one day longer; if he had attempted to retreat; if he had not taken that course which his wisdom combined with his skill had dictated him to take, not one day would have passed without his army being attacked and cut off; and though the glory of the British arms would not have been tarnished by such a result, still following upon the disaster which occurred to us at Cabul, it would have produced the most serious consequences. In estimating the conduct of Sir Charles Napier, I do not think the chief praise is due to his military skill—I do not think it is due even to his personal valour; but I do think it is due to him for the course which he took and his opposition to those who advised a postponement of hostilities, in at once engaging the enemy. Having pondered on the consequences of retreat—knowing the shock which our Indian empire would sustain by a repetition of a disaster like that of Cabul—he, on his own responsibility, with less local knowledge than was possessed by many around him, had the moral courage to act in opposition to the advice he received, and committed that army and his own reputation to the fate of doubtful war. It is chiefly for that exhibition of moral courage that I think him entitled to the thanks of the House. In detailing the action of Meeanee, Sir Charles Napier writes as follows:—"At one time, my lord, the courage and numbers of the enemy against the 22nd, 25th, and 12th regiments bore heavily in that part of the battle. There was no time to be lost, and I sent orders to the cavalry to force the right of the enemy's line. This order was very gallantly executed by the 9th Bengal cavalry and Scinde horse; the details shall be afterwards stated, for the struggle on our right and centre was at that time so fierce that I could not go to the left."

That is the modest and becoming account of the reasons which prevented him from going to the left. He remained at the post of danger, feeling that the time was come when, whatever might be the consequences of his fall, the necessity for an example of personal devotion upon his part, by coming and sharing in the common danger, was so great that he could not retire from his position, and he was thus obliged to collect from others an account which he himself could not give. And there did that gallant man stand, I believe within ten or fifteen yards of the water-course where lay the whole force of the enemy, cheering on his troops by an example of personal valour, which made it impossible for any man in that army to resist its contagious influence, but compelled them all, like their gallant commander, to devote their lives to the service of their country. Sir, I think it is unnecessary for me to trouble the House with further details. I am asking them to place upon record their sense of the military services of the army in Scinde and of its commander. I call upon them for no expression of opinion upon any other point connected with the operations in that country. But looking to what was achieved by them, looking to what was done by every man in that army on those two days, I think the House will be disposed to come to a unanimous resolution that for such exploits the thanks of this House are justly due. With respect to some who were engaged in those battles, we must mingle with the expression of our gratitude to them an expression of deep sympathy with their relatives and friends. The dispatches of Sir Charles Napier wisely and justly ascribe to individuals who fell on those occasions much of the merit of the victories that have been gained. He has left, I believe, an imperishable record of the exploits which they performed. It is almost impossible to lament deaths so glorious as some which took place in the course of those engagements. He speaks of one gallant officer in a manner which must, I think, if any thing can, give consolation to his family and friends, and prove to them the highest consolation that could be offered to them under their affliction and distress. He says:—"I have deeply to regret the loss of the brave and excellent Captain Garrett, of the 9th light cavalry, who fell honourably in the battle, and also the fall of Lieutenant Smith of the Bombay Artillery; with unsurpassed and desperate valour he galloped in front of his battery, and rode up upon the top of the nullah (filled with enemies) to see where his guns could bear with the greatest effect. Here the hero fell."

Sir, there can be no nobler inscription upon the tomb of that gallant officer than the words in which his commander has thus commemorated his services. Sir, with regard to these gallant men, I trust we shall now proceed to bestow upon them that highest reward, which a grateful country can confer—that reward, of which it has with truth been said—

"The Senate's thanks, the Gazette's pompous tale
With force resistless o'er the brave prevail."

That we shall allow you, Sir, as the organ of the nation's voice, to express to Sir Charles Napier, and to the officers and the men who served under his command—to the European and to the Sepoy—to the man of the highest and of the lowest rank, and who shared in those days a common fate and are invested with a common glory—that to them all we shall convey through you, Sir, as our organ, the acknowledgment of the public gratitude. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving—"That the thanks of this House be given to Major-general Sir Charles Napier, Knight grand cross of the most honourable order of the Bath, for the eminent skill, energy, and gallantry displayed by him in the recent military operations in Scinde, particularly in the two decisive battles of Meeanee and Hyderabad."

Lord John Russell briefly seconded the motion, which was agreed to.

STATE OF IRELAND.

FEBRUARY 23, 1844.

On the ninth night's debate on Lord John Russell's motion, "That the House do resolve itself into a committee, to take into consideration the state of Ireland"—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—Sir, I should be appalled by the duty which I have to perform, if I had not great confidence in the justice, and still greater confidence in the indulgence of this House. The House, I am sure, will consider that on now rising, at the close of the ninth night's debate, to address them, I am not rising for the purpose of gratifying any personal wish of my own, or for any purpose of idle display; but I rise in the performance of my public duty towards the House and towards the government, which imposes on me, considering the situation in which I stand, the obligation of addressing the House. I know, Sir, that in a debate, conducted on both sides with extraordinary ability, and carried on through such a long period of time, every argument that could be brought to bear upon the question before us must be exhausted; and I know likewise that, under such circumstances, it is next to impossible to offer any novel observations to the House; but yet I have no other alternative than in the discharge of my duty, to present in a connected and intelligible form my opinions and views on the several matters which have been brought forward. I cannot do that effectually without travelling over a field which has already been exhausted. I must, therefore, appeal to the patience and indulgence of the House to bear with me while I perform that duty. I have another and a greater duty—I have to exercise that privilege which belongs to the accused. On the part of the government I stand here to make our defence. I am naturally influenced by the feeling of a consciousness of having been exposed to unjust and unmerited imputations. I must exercise that privilege of defence—the liberty of giving vent to that feeling; yet I will not permit that feeling to be mixed up with the consideration of important matters of policy affecting the interests of Ireland; and on all that part of the question which relates to public policy—the question of future legislation—I trust, I shall address myself to it with that care, moderation, and forbearance which becomes a subject of such immense magnitude. In replying to the many charges brought against me, I hope I shall not forget that reserve respecting all matters of a personal nature, affecting the position of those gentlemen who have been the subject of criminal proceedings, which should be maintained. If I transgress the rule which I lay down, it will be contrary to my intention, as I wish to conduct the defence of the government with a perfect recollection of the position of the hon. gentleman who spoke last. I wish the hon. gentleman, instead daily of agitating the passions of his countrymen on the subject of repeal, would give us here an opportunity of meeting him and replying to his arguments, and I should not doubt as to what would be the result. I beg you to bear in mind what were the arguments and statements on which the hon. gentleman has this night rested his appeal for the repeal of the union. What a perversion of history is necessary to vindicate his demands for what he calls justice to Ireland! The hon. and learned gentleman said, that for eighteen years anterior to the union, Ireland had the happiness of enjoying an independent parliament. An independent parliament! What! the parliament that sat from 1782 to 1800 an independent parliament, providing for the social happiness of those for whose interests they legislated! Why, I thought one of the gravest allegations of the hon. and learned gentleman was, that through the corruption of that parliament the union had been effected, and that the rights and liberties of the people of Ireland had been sacrificed through the corruption of that parliament. And was the condition of the people really happy under that parliament? What said Mr. Grattan? He asked after 1782—long after, if I recollect rightly—“What has the independent legislature effected for us?” He said, “We have got a police bill, we have a riot act, we have got pensions without end, we have a privileged traffic in the sale of peerages.” That was Mr. Grattan’s account of the virtue of that independent parliament. He said, in fact, that Ireland was reduced to the condition of a province; and is it true that the condition of the people of Ireland was happy? Look at the statements presented of the condition of the city of Dublin and other cities from 1795; and look at the accounts of the trade of Ireland; look at the diminution of trade and the shipping interests for the ten years preceding the union, and you will see whether the hon. and learned gentleman proved his statement that Ireland was in a state of advancing prosperity. Was the condition of the people happy—was their social state perfect—was Ireland governed without insurrectionary acts, or other acts against the liberty of the people? Talk of the state of Ireland between 1783 and 1800—why, the rebellion and all the terrible consequences of it occurred during that period. The rebellion broke out in 1798, and was but just suppressed at the time of the union. But if this Irish parliament did as greatly conduce to the happiness of Ireland, as the hon. and learned gentleman has stated, how, I ask, was it constituted? If the hon. and learned gentleman’s statement was true, how completely did it show that that happiness is entirely independent of, and unconnected with the social institutions of its government. For at any rate the hon. and learned gentleman cannot deny this, that that parliament which he now says promoted the happiness and prosperity of the people of Ireland, was a parliament returned by small boroughs; that that parliament was composed exclusively of Protestants; that during that whole period, at any rate, there was the Established Protestant Church. Yes, during that period, when the hon. and learned gentleman says the social state of Ireland was almost perfect, the Roman Catholics were subject to disabilities, the parliament was exclusively Protestant, and the Established Church was in its full efficiency. I leave therefore the hon. and learned member the choice either of admitting that it is consistent with the interests of Ireland that the Established Church should be preserved, and even that the civil disabilities of the Roman Catholics should have remained in force; or he must admit to me, which is the real fact, that you only carried on the government of Ireland with the parliament which existed from 1782 to 1800, through the instrumentality of corruption and venality. But history proves that the social condition of Ireland was not a happy one, and that that parliament did not promote, and was not calculated to promote, the peace and welfare of Ireland. The hon. and learned gentleman must also admit to me, if there be truth in history, that there never existed a legislature less entitled to the character of independence, in any sense of the term, than the parliament which he now says was the pride and boast of Ireland, and had contributed more to its happiness and prosperity than any other institution. I think the hon. and learned gentleman would better consult the interests of his country, and take a course more corresponding with his own permanent fame, if he would give us the opportunity here of examining his statements, and of encountering his arguments, instead of inflaming the passions of the ignorant by misstatements like these. We may judge what the nature of those misstatements of the hon. and learned gentleman must be on such an audience by those he has ventured to make in the face of a British parliament. Having reluctantly been diverted from the consideration of the motion of the noble lord by the new topics introduced by the hon. and learned gentleman, I now pass from them, and proceed to address myself to the merits of that motion. With respect to the motion itself, I think the noble lord will admit to me that it is a motion exclusively—I won't say exclusively—but one deserving strictly the name of party motion. It is a perfectly legitimate motion, and one in conformity with ancient precedent, and a perfectly constitutional mode of trying the confidence of the House in the government. That it is a party motion the noble lord, I think, will admit himself. It is not a motion for inquiry into the state of Ireland. The noble lord might have pursued this course. He might have said, "I won't mix up the considerations of party with the higher consideration of the government of Ireland. I will challenge your conduct. I will put you upon your defence; but I will support my charge against you, not from party considerations, but for the more important consideration of the social state of Ireland." But the noble lord has not taken that course. Has the noble lord moved for a committee on the whole state of Ireland? No such thing. But as if he were afraid of the possibility of success; as if he shrunk from the risk of being compelled in that committee to explain in details what were his own views with respect to the policy to be pursued in Ireland, at the moment he gives his notice he publicly declares—"I mean to move a resolution strongly condemnatory of the conduct of the government, and I will make it impossible for the government, consistently with their own honour and character, to acquiesce in my motion, and will force them into a declaration of policy that shall render it impossible for them to govern Ireland." Not so the noble member for Sunderland. His speech expressed strong opinions, from which, however I may differ, I will say I am sure are sincere. I never was more convinced in my life, from the tone and manner of the noble lord, that the opinions he submitted to the House, without any regard to the consequences, were his real opinions. But I think that the speech of the noble lord, the member for London, was quite of a different character. He was in a difficult position. He was solving a great question in political fluxions, and undoubtedly he did come to the solution of it like a great mathematician. He had to reconcile the maximum of crimination against the government with the minimum of inconvenience to his supporters. Quod erat demonstrandum. Now, the only thing I can extract from the noble lord's speech is this sentiment—"Remove the present government, and place me in office." He dealt plentifully in impeachments and accusations against us, but when he came to explain his own views with respect to Ireland, and the policy to be pursued in that country, he said nothing whatever which could compel him when in office to adopt any course different from that of the present government. Did the noble lord say, "If I could realize my own wishes I would divide the funds of the Church Establishment in Ireland, and give one portion to the Roman Catholics, another to the Presbyterians, and a third part to the Protestants?" Did he say, "These are great projects, but I fear that at present the prospect of consummating them is most remote? I see no chance of its arriving for a considerable period, but I will make some progress to meet it; and I think the first step towards it is doubling the grant to Maynooth?" Should the noble lord succeed through this motion, and be reinstated in power, his success will involve him in less of inconvenience and difficulty with regard to the Church question than any public man was ever in before. I rejoice at this—I rejoice that the noble lord has not committed himself on his return to power to any measure which may very materially endanger the support of the Established Church. With respect to the accusations of the noble lord against the government, allow me to say, that I think it would have been better for him to have abstained from attacking us in such an acrimonious way as he did. I think, considering the exposed position of the house in which the noble lord lives, and looking to the very brittle materials of which it is composed—with a Coercion act and an appropriation clause—I think, I say, that the noble lord might have been far less dangerously employed than in throwing stones at us. I do not mean, however, to follow that example, I will ward off the blows of the noble lord as I can; but I will not disturb the temper of calmness and moderation in which I wish to consider the affairs of Ireland by seeking any opportunity for recrimination. The first charge made against us is a very serious and a very unjust one, which I scarcely expected would have come from the noble lord. It was to the effect that the government, that is, I, who, as the head of it, am mainly responsible for its acts, had selected the present lord chancellor on account of his hostility to the Irish people. The noble lord denied his talents. [No, no.] The noble lord certainly denied that the lord chancellor efficiently discharged his duties. He asserted that the appointment should not have been made, and undertaking to answer not only for the conduct but the very motives of other men, had declared his opinion that I had selected Lord Lyndhurst for the chancellorship because of his enmity to Ireland—nay, worse still, on account of his offensive language to the people of that country. The noble lord absolutely asserted, that I had so far disgraced myself as to have selected for the highest office in the law courts of the empire a man whose qualifications for that situation consisted in enmity and the use of offensive language to the Irish people. I am sure that escaped the noble lord in the heat of debate, and I ask him in his cooler moments whether he does not think that this is an accusation which he had no right to prefer except upon some stronger evidence than mere suspicion? I have been in the administration of affairs twice before—now, three times, and in every instance have been connected with Lord Lyndhurst. In 1829 Lord Lyndhurst held the office of lord chancellor. In the short administration of 1835 he held the same important post. In 1841 I was called upon by her Majesty to form an administration: and the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) thinks that it would have been just that I should have said to Lord Lyndhurst, "True, I have twice been connected with you in office; true I was associated with you at that critical time when the Roman Catholic Disabilities were removed; true, I asked for your assistance and influence in mitigating the objections of the House of Lords, and I received your cordial support; but you have used some hasty expressions at which offence has been taken, and I must now exclude you from office, and make you the sacrifice in order that I may court popularity in Ireland." Lord Lyndhurst would have replied to me—"I deny the use of any such expressions. In the face of the House of Lords I have denied them. When I used them they were not challenged. A fortnight afterwards I was taunted with them by those who had heard them at the time, and this was my reply"—This was the language which Lord Lyndhurst used—"Now as to the charge itself, what is it? It is this—that I stated, as a reason for not granting municipal institutions to the Irish people, that they were aliens by descent—that they speak a different language, and that they have different habits from ours—that they considered us to be invaders of their soil, and that they were desirous of removing us from their country."

That was the charge. Lord Lyndhurst's answer—"I made no such statement, nor did I say any thing at all resembling it. No expression ever fell from me upon which any person not of weak intellect, or not disposed to misunderstand or misrepresent what I stated, could have put such a construction. The noble marquis (referring to the Marquis of Lansdowne) referred to these words, regretting that I had used them, and hoping that I should explain them. I replied that I had nothing to explain, and that I would satisfy your lordships that I had never made the statement."

That hasty expressions should have been thus construed, no one can regret more than myself, except Lord Lyndhurst; but would it have been fair when he had explained the offensive interpretation put upon them, if, six years after, I had said to my noble friend, "I cannot advise the Crown to appoint you, in consideration of some hasty expressions in debate made use of by you six years ago?" When I look at men like Lord Lyndhurst, who have raised themselves from the position in society in which they were born to the occupation of the highest office of the State—when I look to the manner in which the office of lord chancellor has been filled within the last eight or ten years—when I see that it has been occupied by such men as Lord Eldon, Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Plunket, and Sir Edward Sugden—when I recollect the origin of such men, and their elevation by the force of merit from comparative obscurity to the highest civil station next the Throne—this is, I conceive, the proudest homage to the democratic principle of the British constitution. It affords the strongest practical contradiction to the remark of the Roman satirist—

Res angusta domi.*”

In this country, the res angusta domi has been no impediment to the elevation of men of talent, who, by the force of their own energy and character, have raised themselves to the highest stations in the empire. I had difficulties to encounter, which I knew the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) had not to deal with, in overlooking the claims of candidates for the appointment of lord chancellor. The noble lord has exhibited examples of resolution and virtue in respect of that office of chancellor which, since the atrox animus Catonis, have hardly been equalled. It was, I know, in the noble lord, virtue, and no meaner motive. The noble lord had the good fortune to be connected with a man who had long been a faithful friend of the Whig party, the pride of the bar of Ireland, the ornament of the British Senate, the friend of Grattan. He had the happiness of being connected with Lord Plunket, whose name will go down to remote posterity, as one of the brightest stars that shine in the constellation of Irish eminence. Lord Plunket was the son of a Presbyterian minister: he raised himself in his own country to the rank of chancellor, and the Irish bar rejoiced in his elevation. The noble lord opposite thinks it necessary to consult the prejudices and feelings of the Irish people; he taunts us with overlooking Irish claims—with making English appointments. The noble lord had a chancellor, the most eminent man the bar of Ireland ever produced; and six weeks before the noble lord quitted office he, so sensitive to Irish feelings—he, so jealous of offence offered to Ireland—he, so jealous of the preference of Englishmen—he, having that man as chancellor, whose connection with his ministry was the pride and boast of the Whig party—he signified to that Irishman, to Lord Plunket, to that chancellor, that it was expedient for him to retire. And for what—so far at least as the public is apprised? In order that he might gratify the vanity of, certainly an eminent and distinguished lawyer, of whom I wish to speak with the respect that I feel for him—but, in order to gratify the vanity of a Scotchman. In order to gratify that noble and learned individual with a six weeks' tenure of office, the people of Ireland were subjected to an affront which, whatever the noble lord may think of my disposition towards that country, I declare, if I had offered them, I should have been unworthy to have retained office for a single hour. The noble lord quitted this question relating to Lord Lyndhurst, and what was the next topic to which the noble lord referred? The noble lord, the representative of a great party, when expatiating on the wrongs of Ireland, thought right to occupy his time in raking in the kennels for the refuse of election dinners; and the noble lord quoted a speech which was made at the Canterbury election, in order that he might charge me with participation and adoption of the sentiments there expressed. Why, this would be a hard rule for public men. It is hard to make me responsible for expressions either used by, or attributed to Mr. Bradshaw, the member for Canterbury. The noble lord is followed by a powerful party, confederated with him in promoting political objects, who will vote to-night, naturally and justifiably, with him for the purpose of removing us from office, and replacing us by the noble lord. But the noble lord would think it exceedingly unjust if I imputed to him any sentiment that may have been uttered by one of his supporters at a dinner or at a meeting. Whether the noble lord disavowed the sentiment or not, he would say,—“It is unjust of you to ransack the records of anti-Corn-law meetings, picking out some violent or offensive expressions, charging landlords with cold-blooded insensibility to the distresses of the country, and then saying, that because I vote on the same side with the persons who used them, and may be united with them in general political sentiments, you will therefore make me individually responsible for their language." But suppose I had always disclaimed the sentiments which the noble lord imputes to my hon. friend—suppose I had said, "I will not countenance these prejudices"—suppose I had declared, as well in opposition as in government, "I approve the appointment of Catholics to office; I think the right hon. gentleman (Mr. M. O'Ferrall), at one time the secretary to the admiralty, and afterwards secretary to the treasury, was entitled to the place he occupied; I make no objection to the appointment of Mr. Wyse; I think the Roman Catholic relief bill has removed their disabilities, and I conceive that the government was justified in their appointment;"—suppose I had said this, as I did say it, in public, would it not be unjust on the part of the noble lord to say to me—"I make you responsible for what passed at the dinner at Canterbury?" I do not carry the doctrine of conspiracy quite so far as the noble lord seems disposed to do. Here is the noble lord protesting against the injustice of making one man responsible for the acts of another, and yet he says—"It is convenient for party purposes that I should make you responsible for an election speech delivered at Canterbury." Sir, I consider this to be a most important matter, on account of the use the noble lord makes of it. Says the noble lord—"These are the men entertaining those feelings with respect to Roman Catholics. These are those men,"—speaking of the government—"offering to you, their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, those insults; speaking in that language of your ministers of religion." Then the noble lord says,—“Will any Roman Catholic of honour and spirit consent to receive favours from such a government?” Sir, what the noble lord wants to do is this; he wants to make it impossible for a Roman Catholic to accept favour from the present government and then to turn round upon the government and say, "Why, how unequally and unjustly you distribute your patronage: here are twenty Protestants and not one Roman Catholic." Is that just? First to create an impediment by raising unjust prejudices against us, founded upon unjust accusations, and then to make it a charge against us, when you have succeeded in deterring Roman Catholics from accepting favour, that we are guilty of having withheld favour from them. Sir, I have often said in this House publicly, what my opinions were on the subject of the position of Roman Catholics, and I am taunted, and it is said, "Yes, these are fine declarations you make in debate, but you don't practically adopt them." Allow me to say, and I say it with perfect frankness, that the subject is one of great difficulty. I recognize that where there are equal qualifications, there ought to be no practical disabilities. I say this with respect to every office. I care not what prejudice I may create against me: and I say now, in the possession of power, what I said when I was not in office, that with respect to the judicial office, with respect to the privy council, to every office there ought to be no impediment whatever to the appointment of a Roman Catholic, upon the ground of his religious opinions. Sir, since parliament last met, there has been one, and I think only one office of a judicial nature vacant in Ireland; it was an office in the ecclesiastical court; I apprehend no one will contend that any body but a member of the Church of England ought to have been appointed to that situation. The appointment was placed at my disposal by the lord primate. I determined to place in that situation the most eminent man at the bar of Ireland, with reference to professional attainments and nothing else; and I think it will be admitted that I did so, when I appointed Mr. Sergeant Keating to that situation. Mr. Sergeant Keating vacated the office of third Sergeant, which it was necessary to fill. A communication took place between the government of England and the government of Ireland upon the subject of that appointment. And now, as I want to destroy those prejudices which the noble lord is trying to create—to show to the Roman Catholics that I don't participate in the opinions delivered at election dinners—and to show them that I am not delivering these sentiments upon the impulse of the moment in debate, I shall take the liberty of reading to them, unjustly accused as I am, the letter which I addressed to the Lord-lieutenant, on the subject of that appointment, addressed be it observed, not now under the pressure of debate, but in the course of last year. It is dated August 22, 1843, and is as follows:—"I admit that political considerations would not justify a bad appointment of any kind, still less a bad judicial appointment; but I must, on the other hand, express my strong opinion that considerations of policy, and also of justice, demand a liberal and indulgent estimate of the claims to the favour of the Crown, of such Roman Catholics as abstain from political agitation, and take no part in politics offensive to the dispensers of that patronage. What is the advantage to Roman Catholics of having removed their legal disabilities, if, some how or other, they are constantly met by a preferable claim on the part of Protestants, and if they do not practically reap the advantage of their nominal equality as to civil rights?"

I can with truth say I wrote this letter with reference to the appointment then vacant, and without reference to this debate. The letter continues—"I can readily believe that for nearly every office that may become vacant for ten years to come, there may be found a Protestant candidate with at least equal claims in point of qualifications, and superior on account of professed attachment to the church. If that claim is always to be admitted, there is still a practical disqualification; and what motive can we hold out to Roman Catholics to abjure agitation and the notoriety and fame which are its reward, if honourable appointments, and legitimate distinctions, be in fact withheld from them? I fear they will not be satisfied with the answer, 'True it is we have made fifty appointments, but for every one a Protestant had a preferable claim.' Why have Protestants a preferable claim? Because they have had for a long series of years the advantage of a monopoly of privileges secured to them by law, and have been thrown in constant contact and intercourse with the government. The policy of the law has been changed, and surely we ought not to allow the effects of the preceding policy to remain in full force, and ought not to plead the inferiority of the Roman Catholic as a conclusive reason for preferring his more fortunate opponent."

I have read that letter as indicative of the spirit with which the government was anxious to treat Roman Catholics. The result was, that Mr. Sergeant Howley was appointed. I have not the slightest doubt, had there been a wish to exclude a Roman Catholic from the appointment, that it would have been easy to have found men of at least equal professional abilities in the four courts. But Mr. Sergeant Howley, a Roman Catholic, was appointed. Now, just to show the spirit that actuates that system of declining every appointment when we do make it—of trying to persuade Roman Catholics into a refusal, in order that you may found a claim for your own rise to political power—I will read what was the impression sought to be raised by your party organs. Hear what this paper, the organ of gentlemen opposite, hear what it says upon making the announcement of a Roman Catholic appointment by a conservative government. ["Name."] Oh, this is the Morning Chronicle. We are often made liable for indiscreet expressions in other papers over which we have no control, and I think it is quite fair that I should quote from this. Well, it says—"The present government have, during their career of office, made many bad and some absurd appointments; but we do not remember any one so curiously infelicitous as their last legal promotion in Ireland. The dignity of Sergeant-at-law is one of much more importance in Ireland than it is in this country. The Irish Sergeants, three in number, act from time to time as Judges of assize, and the coif is generally regarded as a preparation for the ermine."

It goes on—"How this extraordinary appointment came to be made is a question which has produced no little speculation. The explanation, however, does not seem very difficult; it is only necessary to suppose a little shallow cunning and a large share of blockheadism on the part of the government, and the whole matter will be accounted for."

That's the encouragement they give us. Then,—“Whatever motive may have dictated the selection of Mr. Howley, the result has been most damaging to the government. The exasperation of the Irish Tories was, of course, expected.”

Yes; but they give us no credit for that. “But it was not anticipated that the Liberal members of the bar would regard Mr. Howley's elevation as an insult, and take pains to disclaim him as a political friend. It is quite clear that Sir Robert Peel's government cannot govern Ireland.”

Now, what is the truth with respect to this Mr. Howley, totally unconnected with us in politics, whom we never saw, of whom we never heard, except from the respect attaching to his name, who had the manliness and courage, notwithstanding the denunciations of the noble lord and his party organs, to receive the proffered advancement from a conservative government? What took place on his appointment which was said to be an insult to the bar of Ireland? As soon as his appointment was known, from the county in which he had acted as a Judge most honourable testimonials to his conduct, ability, and integrity, were received, and more honourable testimonials were never received by any man. Here is an address to Mr. Sergeant Howley, the man whose appointment is an insult to the people of Ireland, and whose appointment proves that the present government is not fit to govern Ireland. To Mr. Sergeant Howley was presented this address from the magistrates of the county of Tipperary. They say:—"It is with heartfelt pleasure we take this opportunity of expressing the deep sense of the gratitude we feel to be justly due to you from all classes of the community in this county, for the admirable manner in which you have for so many years administered the duties of the arduous office of assistant barrister."

That address is signed by no less than 105 magistrates, all coming forward to bear testimony to the integrity and ability with which Mr. Howley had discharged his functions. There is also an address to him from the grand jury, and an address to him from every practising solicitor in the county of Tipperary. Is this then fair warfare to the government? It may be fair towards us, but is it fair to the individual? Is it fair to the character of an honourable man, so soon as we give him the proper reward of professional merit, to turn round upon him and injure his character, and depreciate his merit, in order that through him you may strike a blow at the conservative government? Sir, I think that is an answer to the attempt of the noble lord to involve me in the responsibility of expressions hostile to the Catholics, used by gentlemen with whom I may be joined in party politics. And now as to the disposition to encourage offensive or hostile expressions used to the Roman Catholic body. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Sheil) made an appeal to me last night on that subject. He referred to an address of a protestant operative association in Dublin presented to my noble friend the Lord-lieutenant, and asked me if I approved of the expressions and sentiments it contained, offensive to the Roman Catholics, and he read an answer of my noble friend to that address. He did not state that that answer referred merely to the approbation expressed in the address, of the conduct of my noble friend. [Mr. Sheil: I read it all.] Yes; but the right hon. gentleman dropped his voice after he had read the words "warm acknowledgments," which were followed by a loud cheer, that prevented the rest of the passage being heard. It very often happens, that when a public man receives in the press of business one of these very long controversial addresses, he does not read them all, and a common official answer is returned; and is an answer of that kind to be brought forward against him in the House of Commons as the written answer of a man who approves of expressions offensive to Roman Catholics. I am sure the House will allow me to do myself and the government justice on this part of the charge preferred against us. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Sheil) referred to me; and I have had memorials addressed to me, to the same effect, from Protestant operative associations. I had one before the agitation begun, addressed to me in the year 1842. It was from the Cork Protestant operative association. It began in this manner:—"We, the members of the Protestant operative association of the city of Cork, feel called on by a sense of duty to ourselves, to our country, and to our God, to address ourselves to you on a subject of the first importance, namely, national education."

It then went on—"If the homilies be true (and their authors sealed their truth with their blood, and raised a testimony against error which can never be overthrown), then are the priests of the Romish Church the priests of Anti-Christ—then are they the special instruments of the Devil."

I must state that the climax improves as it proceeds; but I think I have read enough to show what was the tenor of that address. Now, what was my answer? It was sent in December, 1842. This was the answer:—"Sir—I have received your letter accompanying an address to me from the members of the Protestant operative association of the city of Cork. I am sorry that they feel themselves called upon by their duty to their God to express uncharitable sentiments in offensive language."

Have I shown to the right hon. gentleman what was my feeling on this subject? [Mr. Sheil: I said I was sure this was not your feeling.] Yes; and I am trying to confirm your opinion. I thought I made them rather a sharp answer. I must in justice say of them they certainly received it in a very becoming manner. It is but justice to them that I should read the way in which they received my rebuke:—“ We feel great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter (really it is a most charitable and becoming answer) in reply to an address of the Cork Protestant operative association. We feel it necessary to make a few observations, which are called for by the manner in which you have expressed yourself towards us: We first offer our warmest thanks for the prompt and gentlemanly manner in which you answered our communication. It was what we expected, and what from your universally known courteous disposition and kind demeanour, even to the humblest individual, we might have anticipated; while the reply itself has not disappointed our expectations.”

Now, Sir, there was an address from the Dublin protestant operative association to her Majesty. [Mr. Sheil: Was that subsequent to your answer?] Yes. This was transmitted to my right hon. friend (Sir J. Graham), with a request that he would lay it before her Majesty. I hold in my hand the answer of my right hon. friend the secretary of state for the home department to that address. I really had better not read it. He says:—“ I will not comment on other passages in the address; but I find the expressions ‘ millions of factious Irishmen,’ and the general expressions of that address, if not intended to be insulting, are, at any rate, so open to misconstruction, that I cannot be a party to laying the address before her Majesty.”

Now observe, that was in the year 1842; and I do think that these things are indicative of the spirit in which we were desirous of administering the government of Ireland, and that we were content to relinquish support rather than to gain it by fomenting jealousies. Sir, I come now to the conduct of Her Majesty's government in respect to the recent trials. We took office in September, 1841, and up to March, 1843, there appeared certainly no great dissatisfaction with the manner in which the government was conducted. As I have shown you, we had been desirous of abating religious animosities; we had done what we could to rebuke attempts at offence or insult to the Roman Catholics. You charge us with a desire to govern Ireland by military force. You confound the necessity which has led us to increase the military force in Ireland with our own disposition and wishes. Yes, I want to know who is responsible for the military force in Ireland? I want to know to whom it is owing that our expectations and hopes of presenting reduced Estimates have been defeated? I want to put that fairly before the country—before the intelligent reasoning classes of the community—to make an appeal in this House to impartial men, whether opponents or not. We took office in September, 1841. In March, 1843, so far from having evinced any disposition to govern by military force, we then had a smaller number of regular forces employed in Ireland than there ever had been before, except on one or two occasions. The total number of forces in April, 1841, when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, was 14,000 men. On the day on which he took office, the last day of August, 1841, we found the force in Ireland to be 14,843 men. On the last of September, after we were in office, the force was 16,267 men, and in March, 1843, there were 13,900 men; the number in September, 1841, 16,267 men, having been reduced in March, 1843, at the commencement of these troubles, to 13,900. That shows no disposition on our part to govern Ireland by military force. In March, 1843, began this systematic agitation.

Was that in consequence of any act of the government? were we charged with any injustice—any undue partiality? No; but my belief is, that it did not suit the purposes of some that the government of Ireland should be successful. It was, therefore, determined to have recourse to agitation. There were also at the time other causes of excitement. The Poor-rate imposed by an act supported by and perfected by the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) began at that time to be levied, and through many parts of Ireland occasioned great dissatisfaction. That act was most unfortunate, for it subjected every occupier, whatever might be the value of his holding, almost without exception to the poor-law. There were thousands of instances in which people in the west of Ireland were called upon to pay a rate—some of three farthings, and some of more. This occasioned great dissatisfaction. It became our duty to remedy, I will not call it the negligence, but the unfortunate mistake made in drawing up that act. [Lord J. Russell: That mistake was adopted by the present government.] Yes; and the noble lord shall hear no more from me on that point.

I shall not endeavour to repay him in the coin he offered to me. Henceforth, there shall be no more recrimination. That act subjected the poorest occupiers to the payment of the rate. Concurrently with that act was a period of great agricultural depression, and there was no part of the United Kingdom where that depression was more severely felt than in Ireland. Concurrently with that depression was the alarm that the new tariff would cause a reduction in prices, and that alarm alienated the minds of many from the government. These things gave great facilities for agitation. The country then was in a peculiar state. There was great agitation and great excitement in the west of Ireland. Great congregations of men assembled in some parishes—not against the government, but against the ecclesiastical claims. In Sligo there were meetings of large bodies of men at the chapel door for the purpose of demanding a reduction of those claims. The people of those districts, and probably of other parts of Ireland, began to feel that the payments to their priest were exceedingly oppressive—at least so they were disposed to represent them—and they took such measures as might be expected from persons in such circumstances. There was, at this time, as I have already said, great distress, and the resistance to the demands of the Romish priesthood becoming formidable, the agitation for the repeal of the Union was set on foot. We deeply regretted that agitation; we did all in our power to discourage it; but when it arose, we lost no time in determining upon the mode of meeting it. There was nothing in the mode that we resolved to adopt which at all laid us open to the charge since brought against us of having encouraged those meetings, or at least of having avoided to discourage them with the view of entrapping eminent men into a violation of the law, and then turning on them, and subjecting them to its penalties. I declare here publicly that that charge is utterly destitute of any foundation. There was one thing on which we determined from the first, and that was not to apply to parliament for any new powers. I declare, after my long experience in public life, there is nothing I deprecate more than an application to parliament for extraordinary powers. I do not think there is any thing that has a greater tendency to impair the real efficacy of the ordinary law, than suddenly to take it into our heads that it will not be efficacious, and listening to some appeal, founded on local alarm, to procure some Bill destructive of the ordinary liberties of the subject, by surpassing the ordinary powers of the law. This I hold to be most injudicious; so far from adding to the authority of government, there is nothing more calculated to paralyze a government and weaken authority than a recourse to extraordinary powers. Let the ordinary law be relied upon; for if we get into a habit of listening to such applications, people by-and-by will not resort to the ordinary law at all to suppress what they think wrong, in the hope of driving the government to extraordinary measures. With such feelings as these, we made up our minds, whatever the risk, to take the chance, relying with confidence upon the inherent vigour of the ordinary law. It is not as a matter of reproach to them, but in justice to ourselves, that I remind the House that our predecessors in office did not pursue this course. There was the same agitation in 1833. The noble lord, in reviewing the conduct of public men, asked that we should begin the consideration of his own, at a very convenient date for himself, namely, in 1835, just at the very time when he formed that compact with Lichfield House. The noble lord says, "I claim the right to review your lives without any restriction;" and the noble lord goes back to the year 1829. The noble lord says, "Look at all your pledges from that time, it is impossible for you to do any thing for Ireland at variance with those pledges; but at the same time," says the noble lord, "let me be exempt from any reference to that part of my life, from the year 1831 to the year 1835. That part of my life," says the noble lord, "must be exempted from your notice." I shall, on my part, beg leave to trace back the noble lord's proceedings somewhat beyond the period he has himself selected as the limit of that zone of his political life to which he wishes to confine us, and refer to some matters occurring between 1831 and 1835. I have observed, that the late government did not feel that reliance upon the ordinary powers of the law upon which we have acted. The House cannot have forgotten that the noble lord was in office during that period, that Lord Althorp was the colleague of the noble lord opposite, and that then an Irish Coercion bill was introduced into this House. You, who tell us, who charge us with having acted with supineness at the beginning, and unnecessary vigour at the close—you were not content to take the course we have taken, or to rely on the force and operation of the ordinary laws; but you made your demand on parliament for additional powers, and I supported you in your demands, because you, the government, solemnly assured us that to comply with it, was essential to the well-being of the country. I did not try to aggravate your difficulties. I entered into no confederacy with those who were disturbing the peace; and you, the liberal statesmen—you, the devoted, special, exclusive supporters of the rights and happiness of Ireland—proceeded to pass for Ireland what may be safely described as rather a strong enactment. Really, the noble lord must think the House has forgotten all these matters, or he would have somewhat moderated the attacks he has been, right and left, making upon us. That act was an “act for the more effectual suppression of certain local dangerous disturbances in Ireland.” To suppress such disturbances, the noble lord—the friend of Ireland—thought it essential to have recourse to extraordinary powers. For my own part, I think the bolder course would have been for the noble lord to rely on the ordinary law. The act is, as will be seen, a very strict act of parliament. The Preamble runs thus:—“And whereas divers meetings and assemblies inconsistent with the public peace and safety, and with the exercise of regular government, have for some time past been held in Ireland; and whereas the laws now in force in that part of the United Kingdom have been found inadequate to the prompt and effectual suppression of the said mischiefs, and the interposition of parliament is necessary for the purpose of checking the further progress of the same.”

And then the act went on to subject all persons committing delinquencies under the act to be tried by a court-martial, consisting of not less than five officers. And as to signals, why, what said the act of the noble lord? It subjected to the operation of the act all persons guilty of making signals by “fire, bonfire, flash, blaze, smoke, or who were present at such signal-making by bonfire, flash, blaze, or smoke;” and it further enacted “that the onus of proving that such signal had not been made should lie on the person charged.” Such was the act of the noble lord—the act which he impressed upon the House as indispensable for the safety of the country. We asked for no such act: we all concurred in deeming it unnecessary to pass a Coercion act for Ireland, such as her peculiar friends required at our hands; we relied upon the ordinary law, and the support of that party, Protestant and Roman Catholic, which was averse from disturbance and agitation. We determined to accept no assistance, which I am bound to say was liberally offered, from any yeomanry corps in Ireland which might have the effect of arousing a spirit of religious animosity. We could not have embodied the yeomanry corps—we could not have called them to aid the government, without risking the engendering of animosities that it might require a great lapse of time to efface. We were determined, unless in case of the last necessity, to waive the assistance, though we thereby discouraged and dispirited many of those who were ready to support us. Our only reliance was on the ordinary powers of the law, energetically but prudently exercised. The charge that you make against us is, that we were supine and inactive, and that we first entrapped those men into the commission of crime. Now, to that charge I give a peremptory denial. But, it is said, we issued no proclamation in time. To this I answer, that we did give a public expression of our views as regarded this agitation for the repeal of the union. At the end of last session, her Majesty expressed her disapproval of that repeal agitation. You say we issued no proclamation on the subject, but I ask what proclamation could have been stronger than that declaration of her Majesty’s disapproval of the agitation which was then going on in Ireland? In what more emphatic terms could that disapproval of the agitation have been expressed than it was expressed at the prorogation of parliament? Her Majesty, in proroguing the parliament last session, said:—“I have observed with the deepest concern the persevering efforts which are made to stir up discontent and disaffection among my subjects in Ireland, and to excite them to demand a repeal of the legislative union.”

Her Majesty added:—“I have forbore from requiring any additional powers for the counteraction of designs hostile to the concord and welfare of my dominions, as well from my unwillingness to distrust the efficacy of the ordinary law, as from my reliance on the good sense and patriotism of my people, and on the solemn declarations of parliament in support of the legislative union. I feel assured that those of my faithful subjects who have influence and authority in Ireland will discourage to the utmost of their power a system of pernicious agitation, which disturbs the industry and retards the improvement of that country, and excites feelings of mutual distrust and animosity between different classes of my people."

That was the proclamation of the Crown with respect to the repeal agitation; and, as ministers of the Crown, we felt it to be our duty to dismiss those magistrates who took part in that agitation. Was not that a sufficient indication of our opinion? But we went further: we dismissed the magistrates who took part in the repeal agitation: and I ask was that no significant expression of our opinion on the subject? But we are blamed for having dismissed them without any previous proclamation on the subject of the meetings. I believe the noble lord opposite considered himself entitled to dismiss Frost, whom he had made a magistrate, because he was a member of the national convention, without having given any proclamation previous to his dismissal. The noble lord wrote to Frost to know if he were a member of the national convention whom he had appointed a magistrate. The noble lord at first thought the answer of Mr. Frost satisfactory. But Mr. Frost made a comment on the noble lord's letter, and Frost was dismissed for attending those meetings, at which violent and inflammatory language was used, although the noble lord did not prosecute those who attended them. We dismissed the magistrates who took part in an agitation which we believed was calculated to endanger the peace of the Empire and to sever the two countries, and we gave these instructions to the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland:—"The moment you are entitled by law to interfere with meetings that endanger the public peace, that moment we authorize and desire you to do so."

I state this to show that the charge against us, that we remained dormant, with folded arms watched the progress of these meetings, is utterly without foundation. Our intention was clearly expressed, that whenever the law enabled and required us to interfere, then we would do so. But at first these meetings were not considered illegal, though there were great doubts of their legality. Separately taken, they were not considered illegal. Suppose, then, we had issued a proclamation, while these doubts yet existed, to disperse these meetings by military force, and there should have been resistance and bloodshed, and homicide had ensued, in what a position should we have been? But there were occasions in the progress of these meetings when there did appear a possibility of interfering in conformity with the law. There was a great meeting at Cashel on the 23rd of May. We wrote to the lord-lieutenant that we had received alarming accounts as to that meeting, and we directed him to send down to the lieutenant of the county to confer with the magistrates, and if affidavits were made by respectable and trustworthy persons, that they apprehended danger to the public peace and safety, they were then to interfere. There was great doubt whether, without affidavits of that nature, there could be any reason for interference; and we said, let the affidavits be voluntary; do not hunt them out in order to warrant interference; but, if trustworthy men of firm minds come forward and testify their alarm at the numbers that are expected at the meeting, and the military organization of the people, in that case we advise you to interfere. My right hon. friend (Sir J. Graham) wrote and said:—"We held a cabinet to day, and the lord chancellor and the law officers were present. The statements of — and — in the absence of depositions and of official information, are too vague to form the groundwork of a safe decision, much less of a positive instruction. We think that you should direct the lieutenant of the county to repair to Tipperary without delay; to consult the magistracy and resident gentry; and to ascertain, as far as possible, the probable character and numbers of the intended meeting. If these inquiries should satisfy the lieutenant that the apprehensions are not exaggerated, and that processions of large multitudes from distant points, with bands and banners, may be expected to flock to the meeting, thereby creating reasonable alarm in the minds of firm and trustworthy men, these statements should be supported by affidavits to be transmitted to you without delay; and in concert with the lord chancellor and your law advisers, it will then be safely open to you to issue a proclamation warning the public of the apprehended danger, and calling on all loyal subjects to abstain from attendance, and from giving any countenance to such an assembly. On a careful consideration of the affidavits in the case supposed, you must determine whether it may not be prudent to prevent the assembly by occupying the ground, and even by dispersing it, if they persevere, after notice, in coming together. This last step should be avoided if possible, since it may lead to a serious collision and loss of life."

That was the course which we took with regard to a meeting at which it was supposed that interference might be called for. There was to have been another meeting, at which we had every reason to expect that, had it taken place, there would have been a collision between the people and the military, and these are the orders we gave that the meeting should be prevented: this is an extract from a letter dated the 18th of May:—"But the most important subject is the intended repeal meeting at Enniskillen, summoned by the Roman Catholic priest, to be held in the chapel yard. There can be no doubt whatever, that such a meeting in that place, in present circumstances, would lead to a most serious affray. It is the duty of the magistrates, if there be affidavits deposing to apprehension of danger, to transmit them to the castle; and to me it is clear that, if these affidavits set forth the just apprehensions of firm and reasonable men, the government is bound to interpose and prevent the assembly. Whatever the event may be, law is on the side of the authorities, which seek to preserve the public peace."

Why did we not interfere then with that meeting? Because, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances, those who intended to hold it decided on not meeting, and accordingly it did not take place. A meeting was held at Clones, in the county Monaghan, at which a life was lost, and a meeting was afterwards to be held at Dungannon, at which a collision was apprehended. Well, did we want to provoke a collision? Were we mad and wicked enough to wish to see bloodshed? Badly as you think of us, we wished to be forbearing; we wished to avoid a conflict; we wished to prevent a collision of physical force; we saw thousands and tens of thousands of men, organized and assembling together, obedient to the commands of the leaders, and acting in concert together. Still, while all was peaceable, while there was no apprehension of danger, we determined, if possible, not lightly to interfere—not to issue out a special proclamation—not to call for the interference of the military. But when actual danger was apprehended from the calling of various meetings, then we felt it our duty to interfere and to prevent such meetings as were pregnant with danger from being held. A meeting was to be held in the North of Ireland, at which it was anticipated there might be a just cause of alarm as to its effect on the public peace. That meeting was to be held at Dungannon, and we gave orders to have care taken to prevent any collision, but the meeting was not held, and any interference was therefore unnecessary. I stated that if affidavits were made as to the chance of collision or danger to the public peace, by persons capable of forming a correct opinion, then the authorities ought to interfere, but they ought not to interfere on vague intelligence. Why did they not interfere with respect to the meeting to be held at Dungannon? Because the Repealers did not hold their intended meeting at that town. We made no parade of the intention to interfere, in order to prevent a collision, and the good sense of the people prevented any riot or collision. Have I not now satisfied the House, that there was no covert design on the part of the government to entrap men into the commission of crime? We witnessed, it is true, the attempts made to keep up the agitation, but we had hopes that it would subside; but the Irish people, with all their good qualities, are a mercurial people, and liable to be excited by such appeals as were made to them, and we accordingly took those precautions which you now consider proofs of a design to govern Ireland by a military force; but we were most desirous to avoid any necessity for resorting to force to prevent any of those meetings. When those meetings assumed a dangerous character, it was necessary to interfere. I am trying to make no comments that are not absolutely necessary; but what friend of peace would advise a meeting in the county of Tipperary, and would choose as the day of meeting the anniversary of the Irish rebellion—a meeting to be called in a county in such a disturbed state, and in which soon afterwards was perpetrated the most horrid tragedy to be found in the records of crime—the murder of Mr. Waller—who, I say, would advise hundreds and thousands of people to be invited to hear inflammatory speeches, and that the day selected for such a purpose should be the anniversary of the Irish rebellion? And what were the scenes selected for these meetings? The Hill of Tara, the Rath of Mullaghmast, Clontarf—these were the spots that were selected; and every appeal was made by some to revive the bitter animosities of barbarous times, to throw back the tie of civilisation, and to evoke the bitter spirit of former times, which distinguished and exasperated the different races that prevailed in Ireland. Look at the days that were chosen for these objects. Look at the scenes which were selected for the meetings, and I ask you is there not evidence—as far as anniversaries of days and places can furnish evidence—of a conspiracy to effect a legal object by illegal means—not by the present use, but by the display of physical force? Well, but you say, “Why did you interfere at all at Clontarf?” Sir, those who act with forbearance are always liable to that taunt. You forbear from acting, and when the necessity for acting arises you certainly expose yourself to that imputation. Having forborne so long, why did you act then? We interfered at Clontarf on this account—Clontarf was the second meeting in the metropolis. There had been a previous meeting in Dublin. Clontarf followed on the meetings of Tara and Mullaghmast. Clontarf had this distinguishing character, that there was a military array. The Repeal cavalry was invited to be present. I apprehend that cavalry are hardly necessary for the purpose of petitioning. The cavalry were invited to attend under a proclamation which formed them as a military body. Military terms were made use of, and that proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange. [Mr. E. B. Roche.—Not from the Corn Exchange.] The first proclamation came from the Corn Exchange. [Mr. E. B. Roche.—The second did, not the first.] I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I am pretty well versed in these documents, and I think I am correct in stating that the first proclamation came from the Corn Exchange. The hon. gentleman says only the second proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange; but I have the most confident belief that the first proclamation issued from the Corn Exchange too. There is the same proof that the first issued from the Corn Exchange that we have as to the second—both are dated from the Corn Exchange. I think I am right in what I state. The proclamation says—“All mounted Repealers are to muster in the open ground, and to form into troops, each troop to consist of twenty-five horsemen, to be led by one officer in front, followed by six ranks, four abreast, half distance, each wearing wand and cockade, distinguishing the number of his respective troop. The committee will meet at the Corn Exchange, every day in the ensuing week, from four to five o'clock. (Dated, Corn Exchange, September 13, 1843.)”

But it is asked why we proceeded in this case when we had issued no proclamation to prevent the previous meetings? Because having consulted the Lord-chancellor of England, having consulted the Attorney-general, and the Solicitor-general, we put this question—“independent of affidavit, does this summoning of a meeting in military array, and with military organization, of itself constitute an illegal meeting, because if it does, we are then determined to interfere by proclamation?” The answer was, that that one particular individual meeting did differ in its character from the meetings of Cashel, of Mallow, and others; that that meeting, not on account of its numbers, but on account of its military character, was in itself illegal, and the government was warranted in issuing a proclamation. We then resolved on issuing a proclamation. The circumstances under which that proclamation was issued have already been fully explained to the House, and I shall not again travel over them. We lamented the shortness of the notice, but if we attempted to interfere with that meeting, the shortness of notice was inevitable. It is said we did not issue the notice till late in the day. It is said we did not issue it till five in the evening, when it was too dark to read the proclamation, I have here the counter-proclamation—and which is a matter of great importance, I refute that statement by a reference to this document. The counter-proclamation by Mr. O'Connell, is dated Saturday, October 7, three o'clock p.m., and this counter-proclamation begins by stating,—“Whereas there has appeared, under the signature of ‘E. B. Sugden,’ a paper being, or purporting to be a proclamation, &c.”

Now, observe, this counter-proclamation is printed and dated Saturday, three o'clock. There was, therefore, time to print this proclamation after they had seen the proclamation which was issued by the government. I lament the shortness of the notice, but don't, for the purpose of aggravating the charge against us, depart from the facts, and make the notice shorter than it really was. We determined therefore, to disperse the meeting at Clontarf, or rather to occupy the ground, and make such a demonstration as would prevent the meeting taking place, giving the earliest notice, and taking every possible precaution to prevent the possibility of collision. We determined also, after the notice given by the declaration of her Majesty at the close of last session, by this proclamation, and after the notice given by the dismissal of magistrates—we determined to prosecute the parties who had been instrumental in causing these meetings to be held, and adopting these acts—we determined to prosecute them for that conspiracy of which we conscientiously thought them guilty. The right hon. gentleman asks, why did we not prosecute the printers? My hon. friend has given the answer. We might incarcerate the printers; but even where the name of the author of the seditious paper was attached to it, there were no means of getting at the author. Printers had been prosecuted before, and government was covered with ridicule for not striking at the causes of the danger, but contenting themselves with the punishment of the mere instruments. Sir, I ask the House to put together these facts—the references to the United States—the publication of the speeches which the son of the President thought it decent to make—the declaration of the son of the chief executive officer of the United States, that “the libation to freedom must sometimes be quaffed in blood.” I ask you to bear in mind that these newspapers were not individual publications, and unconnected with the parties to this offence which we call conspiracy. The reason why we read the extracts from newspapers, and made the defendants responsible for those newspapers, was this—that they belonged to an association which undertook the circulation of them—that those newspapers contained appeals to the army—that they contained appeals to every prejudice which could be raised in the mind of the Celt against the Saxon. I ask you to bear in mind the scenes chosen for the meetings, for the express purpose of reminding the Irishmen attending them of events in past history which you cannot reflect on without the deepest lamentation—bear in mind that the 23rd of May was chosen as the anniversary of the Irish insurrection—remember the songs that were distributed and introduced by some, I know not by whom, into the barracks of the troops. Who was responsible for circulating such songs as this?—

“Who fears to speak of ‘Ninety-eight?
Who blushes at the name?
When cowards mock the patriot’s fate,
Who hangs his head for shame?”

“He’s all a knave, or half a slave,
Who alights his country thus?
But a true man, like you, man,
Will fill your glass with us.”

Can you mistake what the object was of the studious circulation among an inflammable people of songs like this? Who are the really responsible parties? The printer who printed them? Was it not he, whoever he may be, who belonged to an association which had officers, subordinate officers, whose duty it was to circulate the newspapers containing such songs and appeals, because of the subscriptions they received? Should we have been justified in the state in which the country was, in refusing to appeal to that which was our only instrument—the ordinary law of this country—for the repression of such proceedings? I will not enter into the subject of the trials themselves; the House must be completely exhausted on that topic. We determined to appeal to the law. We did appeal to it. I declare that it was far from our wish that the Jury should be constituted on any other principle than those which are consistent with public justice. Our advice was, “Don’t strike off a Roman Catholic in his capacity of Roman Catholic,” thus acknowledging the perfect equality between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant. We appealed to the law. We succeeded in proving that the offence charged was within the law. It is impossible, certainly, to satisfy those who object to our course. The right hon. gentleman opposite says, you have only convinced us that there should have been no prosecution. We had only one instrument; we had no Coercion Act. We determined not to avail ourselves of the protestant feeling existing in Ireland; but we had only the common law; and then, when we use that instrument, you turn round upon us, and you charge us, that upon us rests the responsibility of all these affairs, as promoting the discontent which we would suppress. But was, I ask you, the country in that state that you could forbear? You charge us with seeking to govern Ireland by military law. See, you say, how the Army has been increased by 7,000 men. Let me now put the House in possession of the state in which the country was placed by this continued agitation. In the South of Ireland, night after night, there appeared the most extraordinary display of signal fires on every eminence in the country. Here are some of the accounts we received. On the 20th of October, 1843, the account I am about to read is dated from the county of Tipperary:—"Last evening, about eight or nine o'clock, the hills in this part of the country, through nearly an entire district, were lighted simultaneously, and they continued so for nearly an hour. We have not ascertained the object of these fires, but they seem to be in connection with the repeal movement. Much excitement prevails, particularly amongst the Protestants, many of whom congregated at my quarters next the police-barracks in self-defence. However, the night passed quietly by."

Another letter from Tipperary describes a similar state of things, and adds,—“We could hear the shouts of the people. The Protestants of the town and neighbourhood are in great alarm, fearing that the town will be attacked. About ten young men armed themselves, and came to the police-barracks, in order to render assistance.”

From Galway there were the same accounts. One letter says,—“Last night there were more signal fires, and in the adjoining counties of Clare and Tipperary. We could hear the blowing of horns and the shouts of the people. Candles were lighted in all the houses in Woodford, except three, and the inhabitants thought an insurrectionary movement was about to take place.”

Sir, were these things for the purpose of petition? Were not these things the result of that fearful system of agitation which left us at last no alternative, if we wished to prevent collision and insurrectionary outbreak, but to appeal to the only instrument left to us, and to call on the chief movers of the agitation to answer to their country for their conduct? We preferred the charge—not lightly, as I have shown, having trapped the parties into the offence; we preferred the charge under the ordinary law—under the same law in which you prosecuted Vincent, under the same law to which you appealed when you read newspapers that had been published at a previous period, and made Vincent responsible for their publication. We charged those persons under the law of conspiracy, because we did not wish to proceed against subordinate agents; we proceeded against those who told us that our “do-nothing” policy would not do—who declared that the Queen had the power to repeal the Act of Union—who boasted that they would drive a coach and six through all our Acts of Parliament—that they would evade and defy the law. We stepped forward, not in consequence of these taunts, but because of the state of the country, brought on by this pernicious agitation; we went to the court and asked whether such proceedings were tolerable in a country where civil government prevails. The Bench were unanimous in their opinion as to the law, the Jury brought in a discriminating and considerate verdict, and the parties charged were convicted of the offence laid in the indictment. We have done this without coercion, without appealing to the excited and irritated feelings; and having done this, and having at least succeeded without the effusion of blood, without conflict, without collision, then comes a powerful party in this House to arraign us for the course we have pursued. The whole indignation of that party is directed against us—sometimes for our forbearance, sometimes for our vigour. Wise after the result, every step we have taken during this painful and anxious effort to maintain the law by the ordinary powers of the law—every step, I say, is now tracked with the sagacity of party, to fasten on some little error or mistake—to charge us with being reckless of life—to allege against us an indifference to liberty, and a desire to govern Ireland by the sword instead of by the law. If we had taken some other course—if we had been too precipitate in our interference—if we had dispersed a meeting when we were not legally empowered to do so—if we had charged illegality as against a single individual meeting, and had failed to prove it—had we selected some poor printer and shut him in gaol—had we done either or all of these things, I appeal to the House with what very different sounds, with what very different accusations, would these walls now have been ringing. You would have told us that we had interposed without a necessity—that we had evinced a desire to interfere with the right of petition—that we had not the courage to select the favourites of the people—that we had pursued the unmanly and paltry course of inflicting vengeance on a printer. But we had the courage to face the difficulties of the case, to apprehend and bring to trial the powerful among the leaders of the people. Sir, I must say, in the face of the country, that in repressing this agitation we have had no assistance whatever from the other side. At the same, I can say with perfect truth, that you (addressing the opposition) know what it is to be exposed to the same painful trials. You have had organized meetings against the public peace; it has been your fate—your painful fate—to have had to deal with the fires at Bristol, the attack on Newport, and the insurrection in Canada. If you had then found a powerful party ranged against you,—if we had taken up Mr. Papineau and espoused his cause—I beg pardon, you took him up,—if we had watched all your proceedings in Canada,—if we had brought forward a motion inculcating you, when the Grand Jury ignored the bills, and you sent ex officio informations against the disturbers of the public peace,—if we had tracked you at every step, expressing a faint disapprobation only of the “hardly justifiable conduct” of men engaged in the cause of liberty;—had we done these things, then, let me tell you, you would have found it a much more difficult task than you did to vindicate the law, and protect the authority of the government. Sir, this is the defence which I offer on the part of the government—for our forbearance at first—for our determination to make use of no other instrument than the law—and for our application of the law, when considerations of the public safety left us no alternative but to pursue a course of repression. Sir, I have still to make some observations on that which will be remembered, when these party conflicts shall have been forgotten. By far the most important part of this great question is the policy to be hereafter pursued towards Ireland. Sir, I do not hesitate to declare, upon this occasion, that I shall consider it my first duty to consider what, in the present state of Ireland, the public interests require. I shall not be driven by the fear of any taunts, or by any quotations from Hansard, from freely and fully expressing my opinions as to the course which should now be pursued. I should be utterly ashamed of myself if I was prevented by the fear of being charged with inconsistency, from advising and adopting any measure which I believed would be conducive to the restoration of peace, and the advancement of the general interests of the whole country. Sir, this is a comprehensive and difficult subject; it embraces the position of Ireland with respect to her physical and material interests; it concerns the civil and political rights of the people; it refers to matters connected with their religious sentiments and their religious instruction. Sir, the hon. member for Cork (Mr. O’Connell) attached great, but not undue, importance to the physical condition of Ireland. He stated, and with truth, that political grievances would be less felt if the material condition of the people were less miserable; but if his be a true representation, I wonder that when the hon. and learned gentleman demanded an identity in the franchise—when he claimed at least an equality of the franchise proportionate to the amount of property and population—I wonder it did not occur to him, that if wealth be taken into the calculation, supposing his statement, that 70 per cent. of the whole population are involved in pauperism, to be accurate, that a franchise in exact proportion to the population would be full of danger, and involve a hazard which it would be most unwise to encounter. Sir, whatever may be our differences in other respects, in one thing, at least, we all agree, in the endeavour to improve the social condition of Ireland apart from political considerations. Sir, her Majesty’s government gave to that subject, during the continuance of the late excitement, their fullest consideration. In the course of last session a bill was brought in by a benevolent member of this House—the hon. member for Rochdale (Mr. S. Crawford), to improve the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland. I promised, on the part of the government, that all due consideration should be given to that bill; that promise I fulfilled; but upon reflection, we felt that the subject was so vast, and the evils connected with it so various and complicated, that no legislation upon it could be beneficial except it were founded on the very fullest information as to the actual circumstances of the case. I therefore advised her Majesty to appoint a commission composed of landlords in Ireland, whom I took care should be men equally distinguished for their character and intelligence as for the extent of their property. In order to show that we wished no religious feeling or prejudice to creep into this inquiry, if our wishes had been fulfilled, the commission would have consisted of four gentlemen, besides the Earl of Devon, two of whom should have been Protestants, and two Roman Catholics. One of the gentlemen, however, to whom I applied, was prevented from agreeing to my request, not from any unwillingness to forward the inquiry, but from the circumstances that his health or the calls of other duties would prevent him; and I then proceeded to form the commission in such a way as I thought most likely to render it efficient for the object in view. I desired that the whole state of the relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland should be ascertained and made clear. It is, I am aware, a very difficult question. A very strong, and I do not hesitate to say, a very unfair and unjust prejudice exists against the whole class of landlords in Ireland, as though they were of a different class of men, and actuated by different motives and feelings to the landlords in England, no account being taken of the peculiar and unfavourable circumstances in which they were themselves placed with regard to their property. I thought it better, therefore, that we should institute an inquiry into the state of those connected with land in various parts of the country, rather than depend upon the information received casually from particular districts; as for instance, in some parts of the North, where the condition of the tenant is said to be an improved and improving one. Above all things, I thought that this inquiry would do good, by bringing to light the conduct of landlords, and so restraining them from the habit of perverting the law to do wrong. I thought it would be of use to bring to light and contrast the conduct of the good and judicious landlord with that of the harsh and overbearing landlord. In bringing all these facts to light, I thought we should be taking the best means to draw attention to the subject, and to lead to a practical amelioration of the tenantry of Ireland. The noble lord opposite has referred to a book entitled "A Cry from Ireland." I have read that book, and it is impossible for any man to read it without being shocked at the manner in which the legal powers of the landlords are too frequently used in Ireland. The noble lord suggests that a short act of parliament might at once be introduced to remedy this evil. Then why does not the noble lord bring it in himself? Will he allow me to ask him—I do not speak for the purpose of crimination—what he has been doing for the last ten years, if legislation on this subject is so easy? Is there not, indeed, a greater danger that when altering the legal exercise of rights as they at present exist, by the interposition of a new law, you may not be incurring new evils as great as those which you so attempt to remedy? Just see how conflicting are the opinions. The noble lord says that commissions are dangerous. I know they are. But I have heard a good deal more said about this commission than some others that I remember. I know the expectations which such commissions always excite. We could not inquire into the disturbances in South Wales by means of a commission without exciting the most ridiculous expectations. In short, it is impossible to detail the extraordinary delusive expectations which are derived from inquiries of this kind. But the noble lord says, "I wish for a small bill," not explaining what is to be the character of it. Now, this is exactly the course which has been adopted for the last ten years. Some member not connected with the government asks leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to landlord and tenant in Ireland. The chief secretary for Ireland gets up and says, "This is a subject full of difficulties, but I do not object to the hon. member bringing in his bill." The bill is brought in and read a first time. The second reading is moved; the chief secretary does not object to that, but reserves himself for the committee. The bill gets into committee, and on the first clause the hon. member is met by ten thousand valid objections; the bill consequently stands over, the session closes, and nothing is done. That has been the course for the last ten years. Sir, we have done precisely this:—We allowed the hon. member for Rochdale (Mr. S. Crawford) to introduce his bill; we allowed it to be read a second time, and then on some Wednesday, when the committee came on, it was inevitably postponed and laid over until the session closed. Could it be otherwise? Is not that the way we should have been obliged to redeem our pledge to the hon. member of giving the bill our consideration? Then says the right hon. gentleman opposite, "I will take the opinions of two Irishmen supposed to be particularly versed in the subject of the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland." Says one of them, the hon. and learned member for Cork,—“I anticipate the greatest objections to the landlord and tenant commission. There is one simple remedy for the evils of Ireland. Repeal all the laws that have been passed since the Union. That will restore Ireland to the happy state in which she was under that parliament which was so celebrated for its purity, and integrity—the last that sat in Dublin.”

This is the opinion of one of two authorities. What says the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Sheil? He was determined to give warning beforehand. "I understand," says he, "that you intend to interfere with the bill introduced by that consummate master of the law of landlord and tenant, Mr. Lynch, who is actually a master in Chancery. I warn you to take heed how you tamper with a law which is the Magna Charta of landlords and tenants in Ireland."

That, then, is the contradictory advice of two eminent Irish members. One says that we must not touch the last act which has been passed on the subject, for by so doing we shall compromise the rights of landlords and tenants, and he is followed by his hon. and learned friend, who says that the only thing is to abolish every law that has been passed since the union. Sir, I ask the House, is it not wiser to adopt that course which has met with the approbation of the very high authority of two Roman Catholic members who have spoken in the course of this debate, in a spirit which entitles them to the highest respect—I mean the members for Louth and Rosecommon? Those hon. members, in speeches in which was not infused one particle of party spirit, have declared their approbation of the landlord and tenant commission, stating that they thought the motives of her Majesty's government in appointing it were honest, and that the course pursued was, in all the difficulties, the wisest course. Sir, we have been influenced by no other motives in appointing that commission than because we believe it will form the foundation of permanent and useful legislation—protecting the rights of property, encouraging no vain expectations; but being fully convinced that we cannot probe the evil to its bottom, except through the instrumentality of extensive local information. So much for a measure upon which we depend, not so much for the purpose of immediate improvement, as because it will lay the foundation of future improvement in the moral and physical condition of the people, so far as that is mixed up with the relation of landlord and tenant. And now, Sir, as to the franchise. I have no hesitation on the part of the government in declaring their desire that every privilege given by the Catholic Relief-bill, and every vote given by the Reform-bill, should be fully and fairly exercised. I do not know what the noble lord's opinions may be on this point. I am certain, however, it would be unwise now to disturb the relative proportions of members fixed by the Reform Act for the two countries. But, as to the franchise on principle, I think it ought to be one of substantial equality between Ireland and Great Britain. I do not say identity—that would be impossible. I do not say nominal equality—that would be unattainable; but I cannot contend against this principle—I willingly indeed admit it—that there ought to be substantial equality of civil privileges for Protestant and Catholic, and that the franchise should be really equal in the two countries. That there ought not to be identity nor nominal equality many even on the opposite side will, I suppose, be foremost to contend; for on that side in the course of this debate there has been the most anxious endeavour to deprecate the extension to Ireland of the "Chandos clause," it having been said that the application of that clause to Ireland would encourage landlords to refuse to grant leases for years or lives, and to require tenancies at will. I give, Sir, no opinion on that subject. I refer only to arguments used in this debate, to show that gentlemen on the other side do not contend for identity or nominal equality of franchise. Nor, Sir, do I mean that in the case of any Irish franchise which may have been abolished on account of the manner in which it has been abused, that it should be restored merely because it exists in England. But I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I say—(it is sufficient for the purposes of this debate)—speaking of the franchise—I think the principle on which we ought to go—I will not recur to the past on this subject; I will not be deterred by fear of taunts about Registration-bills from freely avowing my opinion—the principle which we wish to apply is that of substantial equality between the two countries. It is enough for the purpose of this debate, to deal with principles, and I abstain from entering into details. And now, Sir, I approach by far the most important subject connected with Ireland, namely, the course we ought to take with respect to the Established Church in Ireland. On that I will without reserve, with the same explicitness as my noble and right hon. friends, declare my opinion; and if the House permit me, I will state the reasons for that opinion. I find in Ireland the Protestant reformed religion and the Episcopal Church established in that country. I find that they have been established for a period of above 250 years, and I find that establishment ratified and confirmed by acts of parliament, partaking of the nature of a solemn compact, so far as an act of parliament can. I believe that will hardly be denied by hon. members on the other side. It was the intension of parliament at the time of the Union, to give an assurance to the Protestants of Ireland, and to the Protestants of this country, that the passing of the Act of Union should not endanger the existence of the Established Church, and that its endowments should be secured to it. I am stating as far as possible what were the intentions of the legislature. At a subsequent period, in 1829, I am bound to say, the intentions of those who passed the measure of that year—of those who invited Protestants to waive their objections, and who used all their influence to combat those objections—their intension was to give assurance to the Protestants, and if they acquiesced in the removal of Catholic disabilities, there should be a guarantee to the Established Church. Now, I must say, that so far as compacts can have force, the Union and the Emancipation Act were such compacts. Precisely the same compact was established with Scotland at the time of the Union. At that time a guarantee was given that the Presbyterian Church should be the established religion—or rather at an earlier period that assurance was given; but it was confirmed by Queen Anne at the time of the Union. I was rather surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman, the member for Edinburgh (Mr. Macaulay), in the course of his eloquent and very able speech, advert to what took place on the abolition of the slave-trade, with the view of justifying our departing from the compact entered into at the period of the Union with Ireland. “Men have changed their opinions on many important points,” said the right hon. gentleman; and then he described the scene graphically, in which he said Mr. Wilberforce had “pulled down the present Duke of Northumberland when rising to propose the abolition of slavery.” Those who recollect the relative size of the two individuals must admit the picture of the right hon. gentleman to have been purely imaginative. And the right hon. gentleman drew not less upon his imagination for the debate than for the description. I have referred to it since, and this is really what took place:—So far from Mr. Wilberforce abjuring the notion of the abolition of slavery, he said he did not press it then, he expressly said—“I have never been of opinion that slavery should not ultimately be abolished. I wished to postpone the period of abolition until the time when the mind of the negro shall have been prepared by education for the blessings of freedom.”

And this the right hon. gentleman considers a parallel case to that of the guarantee given at the Union for the perpetuation of the Established Church! All I say is, that so far as national compacts can have force, that compact does exist for the maintenance of the Established Church in Ireland. But, again, so far as authority can go, I can refer to the highest in favour of its maintenance. I will not quote men prejudiced in favour of the Church. I will take those than whom I could not name men whose opinions you would sooner take on matters affecting the comprehensive interests of Ireland, and particularly with respect to the church and the Catholics—I will cite the opinions of Mr. Burke, Mr. Grattan, Lord Plunkett, and Sir J. Newport. Mr. Burke, the earliest and the ablest of the advocates of Catholic claims—entertaining the keenest sense of the wrongs inflicted by the penal code, and whose speeches showed that he then maintained principles subsequently carried out, but which at that time excited little attention—Mr. Burke did not conceal from himself any part of the truth as respects the church:—“You have in Ireland an establishment which, though the religion of the prince, and of most of the first classes of landed proprietors, is not the religion of the major part of the inhabitants, and which, consequently, does not answer to them any one purpose of a religious establishment.” “It is an establishment from which they did not partake the least, living or dying, either of instruction or of consolation.”

Therefore Mr. Burke did not conceal from himself any of the objections which are now urged against the Established Church; but at the same time he went on and said—“Not one of the zealots for a Protestant interest wishes more sincerely than I do, perhaps not half so sincerely, for the support of the Established Church in both these kingdoms. It is a great link towards holding fast the connection of religion with the state. I wish it well, as the religion of the greater number of the primary land proprietors of the kingdom, with whom all establishments of church-and state, for strong political reasons, ought, in my opinion, to be firmly connected. I wish it well, because it is more closely combined than any other of the church systems with the Crown, which is the stay of the mixed constitution. I have another and infinitely stronger reason for wishing it well. It is, that at the present time I will consider it as one of the main pillars of the Christian religion itself."

Now, these are the opinions of Mr. Burke—with all the objections to the establishment clearly before him, and placed on record by himself. With respect to Lord Plunkett, he said he would fling the Roman Catholic question to the winds if he thought the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities would compromise the existence of the Established Church. The dying bequest of Mr. Grattan to his country was an earnest wish that the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities might be combined with that which he thought essential, namely, the maintenance of the Protestant Church in Ireland. The opinion of Sir J. Newport was, that the Protestant Established Church, at the time he was speaking, required extensive reforms, and it was also the opinion of Sir J. Newport—a man inferior to the others in point of intellectual grasp, but not in devotion and tried fidelity to Ireland—that the Roman Catholic disabilities ought to be removed—that there ought to be perfect equality of privilege and franchise, but that the Established Church in Ireland ought to be maintained as the establishment of the country. I think, therefore, I am not going too far in saying, that as far as compact and authority are concerned, they have as great weight as they possibly can have in favour of the Established Church. But it may be asked, are compact and authority to be conclusive and decisive? If we are now ourselves convinced that the social welfare of Ireland requires an alteration of the law, and a departure from that compact, and a disregard of that authority, are our legislative functions to be so bound up, that they must maintain the compact in spite of our conviction? I for one am not prepared to contend for such a proposition. But at the same time this compact is a most material element for our consideration:—Nothing would have a greater tendency to lower the authority of parliament than not to keep the faith you have pledged; to make these compacts, and then, within ten years, to revoke them. While I do not think they impose on you a paramount obligation, to which you are bound at all hazards and at all risks to defer, yet I do think that nothing would be more unfortunate, and nothing more prejudicial to your authority—nothing so destructive of the prospect of future legislation, as a departure from such compacts. How can you hope to persuade parts of the population of this country, having strong feelings and opinions to relinquish them in consequence of your guarantee and assurances, unless you are prepared to maintain them, or prepared to show that there is a positive overwhelming necessity which obliges you to depart from them? I maintain the Church in Ireland not only on compact, not only on authority, but I maintain it on that higher ground, which is convincing to my own mind. After the most dispassionate consideration I bring reason and conviction in aid of both compact and authority. I therefore will not defend the church merely on the comparatively narrow ground of compact. I will not say, "I wish I could alter it, I think it is for the interest of Ireland to alter it, but I am bound by a compact." That is not my impediment. My impediment to the destruction or undermining of the Protestant Church is derived from the conviction of my own mind. I do not believe it to be for the interest of Ireland, or any portion of Ireland, that I should acquiesce in the destruction of the Protestant Church; and I will assign my reasons for this conviction. I am not now to determine what is the best condition in respect to a new state of society in which more than 7,000,000 profess a religion different from the Protestant Church, and not more than 2,000,000 profess the faith of the Protestant Church. I am not considering what is the best constitution for that society. I am to deal with a country in respect to which these compacts and guarantees exist, and with respect to which there is a prescription of 250 years—and with respect to which the landed proprietors, the great mass of them Protestants, are identified in feeling with the established Church. I am now to consider what, under all the circumstances of this case, is the best arrangement to make? First of all, I contend for the necessity of an establishment. I apprehend, that without infringing on the privileges or conscience of any man, I have a right to maintain this opinion. I think, with the example of establishments in England and Scotland, and with my conviction as to what is necessary for the purpose of.

religion, that in Ireland an establishment of some kind is necessary. [Hear.] Do not take advantage of an expression. I am now addressing myself to the first step in the argument—shall there be an establishment or not? You say I am wrong, for that an establishment is not necessary. You may cavil at my expression, but I am considering the great question, is it for the public interest to have an establishment? One of my reasons for maintaining an establishment in Ireland is, because I think it important for Ireland. I think, if you had no establishment in that country, you would have bitterer religious animosities. I look at the question, first, as it affects Ireland; and next, of this I am certain, that if you establish the precedent of having no establishment in Ireland, little time will elapse before the precedent will be referred to as a principle applicable to England. How long a period do you suppose would elapse? The other night an hon. friend of mine, the member for Pontefract, gave notice of his intention to move a resolution in favour of a provision for the secular Roman Catholic clergy; and immediately the hon. member for Sheffield gave notice of his intention to move, as an amendment upon that motion, "That no provision for the maintenance of the secular Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland can be just or expedient, or will tend to the re-establishment of tranquillity in that country, unless based upon such a revision of the whole ecclesiastical system as will place the clergy of all religious denominations upon a footing of perfect equality."

And the hon. member for Montrose was so impatient, that he would not wait for the introduction of the bill, or even for the discussion of the motion; but, on hearing the notices given, was good enough at once to signify his intention to apply the same principle to this country as his hon. friend intended to apply to the establishment of Ireland, and gave notice of a motion for an address to her Majesty—"That she will be pleased to institute an inquiry, whether the number of her Majesty's subjects dissenting from the doctrines and discipline of the Established churches of England, Ireland, and Scotland, are now more in number than those who belong to and attend the Established churches; and if so, whether the time is not arrived when all the public property granted by parliament for the support of those Established churches, should be withdrawn from them, respect being had to the existing interests of the clergy and other persons actually employed in the service of the Established churches; and whether it will not be more just and useful to the people of this kingdom to apply the revenue of the Church for the purpose of educating the people, or for such other national purposes as parliament may think fit."

If you apply this principle in Ireland it will be referred to as a rule for England; and, therefore, my opinion is decidedly in favour of an establishment, and it is decidedly in favour of continuing the Protestant Church as that establishment. I cannot conceive a more important question than that which will arise as to the nature of the relations between an Established church and the State. The Roman Catholics say they will submit to no regulations. In the case of the Protestant Church—when you made it a State establishment—when you gave it endowments—you subjected it to great restrictions. You controlled the meeting of its convocation; you expressed great anxiety regarding its authority; you displayed considerable jealousy of its acts; and you subjected it to the restraints of the law; at the same time that you also subjected it to the milder restraints of patronage, and gave to the Crown the right of preferment to its highest offices. It is difficult to estimate the influence of these circumstances over the church. It is difficult to decide how it may have effected its position. But what do the Roman Catholics say? They tell you—If we take our endowments, we will not submit to your power. We will not be subjected to your restraints; we will refuse to concede you any control; and the appointment to our highest offices shall be vested in a spiritual, and not a civil, functionary. Said the hon. member for Kildare the other night, speaking with great decision and much authority, if you try to interfere with our arrangements with the Pope, if you take the course that other countries take, I tell you that your authority will not prevail—that your regulations will not be observed—that the ecclesiastical authorities in Ireland will rebel. That is the opinion of the hon. member for Kildare. Will he tell me, then, what equality there can be in giving the endowments of the church, which is now under our control, to a form of religious faith which refuses to submit to our regulations? On the part of all churches there is a disposition to remonstrate against the exercise of the civil power—there is an impatience, a great impatience, of civil control. You have thought proper to control the church. You have ever been jealous of those who claimed more than ordinary exemption from secular authority. In Scotland within the last two years, you have found a party in the Established church claiming exemption from civil control, demanding to be subjected to spiritual authority only, and requiring that the boundaries between spiritual and civil control should be defined. You have not conceded these demands. What would you do with your own, the Protestant Episcopal Church, supposing she was to ask for the same immunities and exemptions now demanded on behalf of the Catholics of Ireland? Would you grant her supreme authority in spiritual matters? I am sure you would not; and I ask, therefore, what right has a church which refuses to submit to your control, to claim for itself the transfer of those privileges which now belong to a church which submits to control? The noble lord (Lord Howick) said, that it was an objection to establishments, that the selection of one form of worship was an insult to the professors of another faith.

Lord Howick.—No, no. The learned recorder said, that he defended the maintenance of the Established church because it rested on the eternal principle of religious truth. What I said was, that if you declared it to rest on the eternal principles of religious truth, you implied that others rested on principles of religious error.

Sir R. Peel.—I don't admit that as a consequence, and I tell the noble lord at once, that I do say, that in this country a preference is given by the legislature to the Protestant Church from a preference—a decided preference—to its doctrines. Yes, and I say more; I say that the preference to its doctrines implies no insult to those who dissent from those doctrines, and that it is extravagant to say that, because I prefer my own form of religious faith, I am involved in the necessity of insulting or persecuting those who differ from me. I say too, that, as far as this objection goes, the principle of an establishment does not depend on majorities or minorities. You may think it right to establish a form of religion on account of the majority adopting and professing that form; but the fact of your establishing that form gives you no right to insult the minority who dissent from it. Every one has a proposition on this subject, and the hon. member for Sheffield has his. I consider the proposition of the hon. member tantamount to a total suppression of all churches. He proposes to divide the revenue into three parts, according to certain proportions. He gives £70,000 to the Presbyterians, £70,000 to the Episcopal Church, and £430,000 to the Catholic Church. I say it evinces no equality to give £70,000 to a church which submits to your control, and £430,000 to a church which does not. To do that would be, I think, to reverse the principle of justice. If you follow out the principle of numbers, the mere analogy would lead you to establish the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Is the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) prepared for that? Are you prepared to admit those who owe their promotion to another power than the Crown, to sit on the bishops' bench in the House of Lords? If you are not prepared to do that, you must admit that your principle of equality requires modification. What is the proposition? "On account of those difficulties which you say exist, permit us to relieve you from them, and to destroy the Established Church." I must say, a more unreasonable and unjust proposition was never made. Here is a religion guaranteed by solemn acts of parliament, by long prescription, the Protestant religion, which is in alliance with the state, which has endowed it for 250 years. I am told I cannot maintain it, not because they want the Roman Catholic religion to be established, but because it is inconvenient that an establishment should contain what will promote religious peace in Ireland. Do you believe that it will promote mutual concord to say to the Protestants, "Civil disabilities have been removed, equality of franchise has been granted; we now tell you we cannot maintain the Established Church any longer, and you must relinquish it?" You don't know to what extent you would then go. Would you stop with the endowments? What will you do as to the places of worship? Do you mean that you would confer religious peace on the country by calling upon the Protestants to sacrifice their endowments, and to transfer their churches to the Roman Catholics? You must do that if you adopt the principle of analogy, on the principle of the hon. member for Sheffield. Very little, indeed, do you know the spirit you would provoke. I believe that a proposition more calculated to insure discord could not be imagined, and, therefore, I am prepared to offer just as decided an objection to the proposal of the hon. gentleman, as I am to transfer the revenues to the Roman Catholics. There is another course that may be pursued, not to stand upon compact, not to stand upon authority, not to venture at once to destroy the church, but to take some course for the purpose of undermining and impairing its foundations. I think that course is just as fatal as any other. I think that not to destroy life, but to infuse some slow poison into its veins, which shall ultimately lead to its destruction, is a course as little in unison with religious or social peace as any of the others. Therefore I come to the conclusion, founding myself upon compact, upon authority, and upon the conviction of my mind, that the best course—and the course which I, for one, as far as my humble powers can be exerted, will pursue—is to maintain in its integrity the Protestant Church. When I say in its integrity, I do not mean to exclude all such reforms as may increase the efficiency of its establishment for the purposes of the church; but I do mean that I will neither consent to the overthrow of the church, to the establishment of three forms of religions in Ireland, to the division of the revenues between Protestant, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic; nor can I consent to any of those similar devices which mean nothing, if they do not mean the ultimate destruction of the church. I have stated, therefore, the grounds on which I propose to act with respect to the religious establishment. Does that compel me to exclude altogether from consideration the position of the Roman Catholic Church? Am I to consider that church altogether as an outcast, and to refuse the consideration of any regulations which may improve its condition? Endowment from the state you absolutely reject. We have been assured that the voluntary endowment by individuals might be provided for without any violation of conscience, and would be considered as a great boon. The noble lord, the member for Tiverton, threw out that suggestion in the course of last session. The noble lord, if I mistake not, declared opinions as to a Protestant establishment little different from what I have stated; but at the same time he said he was prepared to treat the Roman Catholic religion with every consideration compatible with the maintenance of the establishment. He desired us in a friendly spirit to consider whether there could be any object to permit voluntary endowment by individuals, Protestant and Roman Catholic, for the purpose of making a provision for Roman Catholics. We professed our readiness to consider the subject, and the moment we profess our readiness to consider it, we are met as usual by the declaration, that it will not be of the slightest advantage, unless brought forward by the right hon. gentleman opposite! Certainly we undertook to consider it, and I believe there were many landed proprietors, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, who would have been disposed, for the sake of promoting peace, for the purpose of improving the condition of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, to make a voluntary provision for endowment. The absence of such endowment used to be dwelt on as a great grievance. In a work which must be familiar to the right hon. gentleman, "Scully on the Penal Laws," he describes the state of the law as to charitable endowments:—"It is, therefore, not too much to affirm," he says, "on a view of all the circumstances, that no person can safely give or grant any land, money, or other property, to or for the permanent support of any Catholic priest, house of worship, school, or charitable edifice, or foundation of any charitable description, subject, as such donation must be, to serious doubts and difficulties. That these donations would be diverted to Protestant institutions, directly contrary to the donor's interest, is a prospect sufficiently discouraging to deter every person from making them. This may be taken to amount to actual and positive prohibition."

The actual and positive prohibition we are willing to remove, accompanied with such securities as may prevent abuse; and certainly I am surprised that our proposition should in this debate have been met in the manner in which it has. We persevere, however, in our intentions, and are perfectly prepared to consider the means. There only remains the subject of education. I must refer to the course which we have taken on the subject of National Education, as sufficiently indicative of our determination to adopt those measures which we believe to be for the welfare of Ireland, even at the risk of offending many of our countrymen. We propose, in the present year, to make a considerable increase to the grant for National Education. I should be very sorry to refuse to consider the means of still further increasing the revenue. It has been suggested that instruction in the science of agriculture might be usefully given in Ireland, and grafted on the present system of National Education. I should be sorry to exclude the consideration of matters of that sort; I should be very sorry to exclude the consideration of the means of providing some system of academical education for higher classes than those educated in the National Schools; but for the present we intend to give an increased vote, to a considerable extent, for the purpose of National Education. I have now completed what I had to say, and I thank the House for the indulgence. I trust they believe I have only trespassed upon them at such length in the performance of a public duty. I have stated our general views of the policy and of the measures which we propose to adopt. In themselves they may not be immediate and effectual remedies for the evils under which Ireland labours; but I trust at least I have said enough to show the spirit in which the government is prepared to consider the question of Irish legislation. I was reminded by the hon. gentleman, the member for Shrewsbury, in the course of a very able speech which he made the other night, a speech not the less to be admired because it departed from the ordinary routine of parliamentary eloquence, and touched on more comprehensive and general views—I was reminded by him of a declaration which I made, that I thought Ireland was a subject of too much importance to be sacrificed to our party feelings. I say, and say with perfect truth, in a friendly and not in a hostile spirit, that if any gentleman, however attached to the party of the government, should consider that the state of Ireland requires more efficient remedies than we are prepared to adopt, should consider that we are not the instruments by which good can be effected in Ireland—I say, and say it with perfect truth and sincerity, that I think this is a subject of such paramount importance, that all ordinary party considerations should give way, and that any gentleman who thinks that, by a vote hostile to the government, he will be promoting the permanent welfare of Ireland, I give my opinion that in that vote he would be justified. I declare for myself, that upon that opinion I would act, that I would make no sacrifice of judgment, no sacrifice of conscientious feeling to party purposes or personal ambition, where the welfare of that part of the empire is concerned. I think I may say, I have some right to hold that language; I have made sacrifices before for the purpose of restoring peace to Ireland, the least of which was the loss of official power. I have encountered reproaches, the more bitter, because they came from friends and not opponents. I suffered the loss of private friendship and the alienation of private esteem. Why am I not at this moment the cherished representative instead of the rejected candidate of the University of Oxford? When we proposed in 1829 the removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities, the loss of office was a mere secondary consideration, and in the hope of securing peace in Ireland, I sacrificed that which was the greatest distinction I ever aspired to—the representation of that honoured institution, where I had slaked the thirst of early ambition. I am asked, whether I consider the present state of Ireland satisfactory. I confess that I consider it any thing but satisfactory? But I certainly hope that civil government, without resorting to the use of military force, may be maintained in that country. While we retain office, we will maintain the law. We will exert all the authority and power of the Crown—at least we will advise its exercise, and exert the authority of the law temperately, firmly, and moderately—for the purpose of resisting agitation. We hold ourselves not responsible for the increase of military force. We deprecate the necessity for it. We only applied it for the purpose of averting calamities of which we were not the authors. But, having done this, I am bound to admit that this is, I think, an unsatisfactory tenure of power. Our policy has been to maintain peace, to restore friendly relations with great powers, and to increase commerce. We have succeeded in improving the revenue, in restoring the balance between income and expenditure. We have witnessed with the highest satisfaction the gradual improvement of trade, and we trust the revival of prosperity in the commercial and manufacturing districts will be permanent. But at the same time, we cannot but confess, that with this intestinum et domesticum malum—this unfortunate condition of Ireland—we cannot look upon the picture with unmingled satisfaction. I trust, however, that that alternative which party suggests—that we are unable to govern Ireland except by force—I trust and believe there is no foundation for that assertion. If indeed party influence be exercised for the purpose of making Ireland ungovernable, it may possibly succeed ; but without the exertion of such party influence, I do not believe that it is impossible to govern Ireland by the ordinary rules by which a country should be governed—with a continuance of the principles which we have always professed. Sir, I see much cause for entertaining bright hopes for the future. By the wonderful applications of science, we are about, I trust, still further to shorten physical distance. I should not be surprised if, even during my own lifetime, we are able by its aid to bring Dublin nearer to London than many towns in England now are. I shall not be surprised, seeing the rapid improvement in science, and in the application of machinery—I shall not, I say, be surprised, if the interval between London and Dublin shall be shortened to twelve hours. You have prospectuses before you, some drawn up by eminent engineers, which contemplate the shortening of that interval to fourteen hours; and my own belief is, that with the progress of improvement the interval will be still further reduced. I cannot help thinking, too, that there is in the higher classes of society a growing disposition to obliterate old partisanship—to forget all animosities. I never hear a debate of the present day upon the state of Ireland, and compare its tone and spirit with those which animated the old debates upon the same subject, without marking the prevalence through the House of a strong disposition to forget differences of opinion, and to obliterate the recollections of the effect which these differences produced. From this side of the House feelings are frequently expressed favourable towards Ireland, and they are met on the other side by many Roman Catholic gentlemen in a spirit corresponding to the temper in which they are uttered. I do earnestly trust that the influence of public opinion, as well as that of the law, may control this agitation—may convince those who are concerned in it, that they are prejudicing the best interests of Ireland—impeding its improvement—preventing the application of capital—and hindering the redress of those grievances which can, I think, be better redressed by the application of individual enterprise, than by almost any legislative interference. Sir, I have the firmest conviction that, if there were calmness and tranquillity in Ireland, there is no part of the British dominions which would make such rapid progress as that country; for I know that there are facilities for improvement—opportunities for improvement, which would make that advance more rapid than that of any other part of our Empire. Sir, I do hope,—and I will conclude by expressing that earnest hope—that this agitation and all its evil consequences may be permitted to cease. I should rejoice—in whatever capacity I may fill, I should consider it the happiest day of my life—when I see the beloved Sovereign of these realms fulfilling the fondest wishes of her heart—of that heart so full of affection to all her people, but mingling that affection with peculiar sympathy and tenderness to Ireland—I should hail the dawning of that auspicious day, when she could alight like some benignant spirit on its shores, and there lay the foundations of a temple of peace; when she could, in accents which, proceeding from the heart, speak to the heart rather than to the ear; when she could call on her Irish subjects, of all classes and of all denominations, Protestant and Catholic, Saxon and Celt, to forget the differences of creed and of race, and to hallow that holy Temple of Peace, of which she laid the foundations—to hallow it with sacrifices, still holier than the sacrifices by which the temples of old were hallowed—to hallow it by the sacrifice of those evil passions which dishonour our common faith, and prevent the union of heart and hand in defence of our common country.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.

The House in committee on the Factories' Bill. On clause 2nd (the interpretation clause) being proposed, Lord Ashley proposed the amendment of which he had given notice: "That the word 'night' shall be taken to mean from six o'clock in the evening to six o'clock in the following morning; and that the word 'meal-time' shall be taken to mean an interval of cessation from work, for the purpose of rest and refreshment, at the rate of two hours a-day; with a view to effect a limitation of the hours of labour to ten in the day."

SIR R. PEEL: I think the committee will be disposed to give credit to her ma-

Majesty's government for the motives which have induced them to adhere to the proposition of my right hon. friend, and to offer their decided opposition to the proposition of my noble friend. Of any personal interest in so doing, I apprehend that we shall not be accused, and with respect to party interests, if we wished to consult those interests we should have taken a different course. It is impossible not to feel that we are on this question allied to those who have generally offered to us upon principle the most decided opposition, and that we are opposed, on the other hand, to those who have given the present government a general and almost unvarying support. But there are occasions when it is the duty of a government at all hazards, to oppose measures which it believes to be inconsistent with the permanent interests of the country. It is the first duty of a government to overcome the temptation of obtaining temporary party support, and of conciliating party favour, by acquiescing in a proposition which it conscientiously believes to be injurious to the permanent interests of the country. And influenced by that motive, and by that motive alone, we now discharge the duty of the executive government, and oppose ourselves to the wishes of men whom we highly respect; but whose wishes we believe would, if complied with, be highly injurious to those by whom this measure is urged, and for whose benefit it is intended. There are, or at least there were, until the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielden) spoke, only two propositions before the committee—namely, the proposition made by her Majesty's government, which imposes restrictions upon the labour of children, which gives new facilities for education to those who have not the power of protecting themselves, and which also arrests the evil where we find it, of the employment of female labour, prohibiting their employment in factories for more than twelve hours a-day, but which imposes no restrictions whatever upon that which is the practical rule as to the employment of adults—granting twelve hours a-day to be the rule as regards adults—that is in no respect interfered with by our proposition for preventing the extension of the evil, by preventing women from being employed more than twelve hours a day. The counter proposition is, that we shall impose restrictions, nominally and theoretically, upon the labour of females and children; but practically and universally, that we shall prevent the labour of male adults, even with their own consent, for a longer period than ten hours. ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. member who spoke last says, that proposition rests with no principle of humanity. I admit, in some respects, that the debate does not turn upon principle. We admit by our proposition, the policy of restricting female labour, and of giving facilities to the education of children. But we do not interfere with adult labour. My noble friend proposes to interfere with adult labour, but he by no means carries his interference so far as the hon. gentleman opposite. The hon. gentleman says there is no reason for ten hours; eight hours is a period which we ought to fix upon for the labour of adults and children, and therefore there would be nothing to prevent hon. gentlemen, if the ten hours' labour bill failed, from agitating for eight. The hon. gentleman is a great authority on the question—he is practically acquainted with labour, and he says the time ought to be eight hours instead of ten. The day, he says, is divided by philosophers into three periods—eight hours for labour, eight hours for recreation, and eight hours for sleep; and he would have us carry out by our laws that division of the day. If the hon. gentleman be right, he would leave ample time for the mother to attend to her domestic duties, and so far he has some argument in favour of his restriction, besides that natural one arising from the division of the day. The hon. gentleman thinks that no good will be effected for the labourer, in consequence of the rapid improvements in machinery, unless eight hours be the time adopted in this bill. But I do not think it necessary that I should now discuss the proposal of the hon. gentleman; and it will be my duty to argue between the proposal for ten hours, and the proposal for twelve hours. Let us first, then, consider to what extent the restriction of the noble lord is to apply. The proposal of the noble lord is, to apply to all labour in cotton, wool, in worsted, in flax, and in silk. Now, the fact is, that at present, and for the last forty years, whenever there has been a demand for those articles, the time of labour has been sixty-nine hours a week. That is now the number of working hours in almost all factories, with the exception of certain branches of the woollen manufacture. [Mr. Hindley: The time does not exceed sixty-nine hours.] That is what I have said.

The time is now sixty-nine hours by the law; and I believe that the universal practice is to work sixty-nine hours a week in the cotton manufactures, worsted manufactures, flax and silk manufactures. There are, however, I believe, some woollen manufactures in which the work is continued for a lesser number of hours; and I have reason to think that the same thing occasionally occurs in certain silk manufactures. But the general practice is to work sixty-nine hours a week; that is to say, twelve hours on the first five days, and nine hours only on Saturdays. My noble friend does not wish to alter the present arrangement with respect to Saturdays. But he proposes that there should be two hours less of labour on each of the other days, or ten hours less in the week; so that we should have fifty-nine hours instead of sixty-nine hours a week of labour in those two great branches of our manufactures, the cotton, the woollen, the linen, and the flax trades. I have seen the last returns of our foreign trade, which show the declared value of the principal articles of British produce and manufacture exported in the last year; and, if I recollect rightly, the value was about £44,000,000 for the principal articles. And what proportion do you suppose that the value of the articles you are now about to deal with bears to the whole amount of £44,000,000? The value of your cotton manufacture, including yarns, amounts to £23,500,000; the value of your linen manufactures amounts to £3,700,000; the value of your silk manufactures amounts to about £664,000; and the value of your woollen manufactures amounts to about £7,500,000; making a total of £35,000,000 out of the £44,000,000 of British manufactures exported, or five-sixths of the whole. So that, by the proposal of my noble friend, five-sixths of the exported manufactures of this country will be subjected to a new law, which is to provide that it shall not be legal to labour at them for more than fifty-nine hours, instead of sixty-nine hours a week. Now, to what extent would that proposal go? There are about 304 to 306 working days in the year, but I shall take the number at 300, in order to facilitate the calculation which I am about to make. The Saturday is to remain untouched, so that the proposal of my noble friend would extend to 250 days a year, which, at the rate of two hours a day, would make 500 hours a year, which my noble friend would take from the time now devoted to manufacturing labour. Those 500 hours would be equivalent to seven weeks; and the result of the proposal would therefore be, that in all cotton, linen, silk, and woollen factories, there would be seven weeks a year less labour than at present. In point of time that is the effect. Your manufacturers, in their several branches exporting £35,000,000 out of £44,000,000 a year, are to enter under your new law into a competition with foreign manufacturers, and you are to enforce upon them the necessity of working seven weeks less in the year than at present. And what says the hon. gentleman, the member for Oldham? He says, that by the Act which we passed last session for permitting the export of machinery, we gave additional advantages to our foreign rivals in competing with our manufacturers. The hon. gentleman has told us that our machinery is now exported, and that our mechanics and artisans are going abroad. Those are advantages which our foreign competitors possess. The hon. gentleman does not propose to repeal the Act which permitted the exportation of our machinery. [Mr. Hindley: I objected to that Act.] You objected to it, and you are a great authority, I dare say; but there is a majority of both Houses of Parliament in favour of the Act, and it will be no consolation to the manufacturers who suffer from this competition, to be told that the hon. gentleman is opposed to the exportation of machinery, unless he can prevail on parliament to alter the law. The hon. gentleman says that the wages of workmen would not be less, if the hours of labour were limited, because there would be a rise in the price of manufactured articles. Why, that certainly would be the natural consequence of restricting the hours of labour and reducing the quantity produced. The amount of manufactured produce would be diminished, prices would rise, and the manufacturers would, it is supposed, be able to give the same rate of wages. But how long would that be the case? By the system which it is proposed that we should pursue, we should give the foreign manufacturer an evident advantage. His material will not be increased in price, and he will come into competition with you, having all the advantages of your machinery when you have raised the price of your manufactures; he will take advantage of that, and you will suffer in the neutral markets, without the power of compensating yourselves for that increased cost. Suppose the cost of the articles is increased—suppose the establishments are extended—how long does the hon. gentleman think the master manufacturers—the owners of the existing establishments, will be enabled to give the same rate of wages to their workmen? The rise of price may induce new competition; but when that new competition has come into existence in one or two years, does the hon. member think the masters will continue to give increased wages? The hon. gentleman says the manufacturers will be inclined to take advantage of circumstances, and reduce wages to the lowest point. I am not of that opinion. But do you think that they will not try to maintain their profits at the expense of the workman? Is it possible that, under your new enactment for ten hours' labour, the same rate of wages should be given as with a twelve hours' bill? You do not give the same equivalent. Twelve hours' labour have a certain value, and you say the workman shall not have the option of giving more than ten hours. Would it not, then, be repugnant to common sense to suppose—speaking comprehensively—after the lapse of a few months, there being this competition, and the profits on account of foreign rivalry being extremely small, that the master manufacturer will not struggle for the maintenance of his profits, and try to obtain compensation for reduced time of labour, by falling on the workman? Depend upon it, it must be so. The sufferers in this case must be the workmen, who have to give a less amount of the commodity which is that in which they traffic—namely, their labour, than they gave before. If I could think that this would add to the comforts of the workmen, I should be disposed, I think, to relax the strict rules of political economy; but when I heard the other night, the account which the hon. member for Durham gave of the position of the workmen with whom he is connected—when he stated, and I presume he would not state facts which, if not perfectly true, would be so easily capable of contradiction—when I heard him giving instances of workmen earning £91 a year in the enjoyment of comforts, who, he said, he feared to ask whether they received parish relief, because it would have been an insult—when I hear that such is the position of the working masses in this country, I must pause before I give my consent to a measure which is to have the effect of mulcting them of a great part of the wages which they now receive. It is said that we are not to take foreign competition into account. I am told that this is not to be viewed as a commercial question. I am told that it is a question between mammon and mercy. I am to disregard the effect which legislation will have upon the commerce of this country. Why, Sir, if I could separate the two considerations—if the alternative were offered to me of pecuniary gain on the one hand, and the comfort and welfare of the labourer on the other, I should at once decide for the latter; but when we look to the commerce of this country, and the interests bound up with it, it is my duty as a legislator to take that commerce into consideration. Look at the amount of capital expended on the faith of existing laws in cotton manufactures alone—the thousands and tens of thousands congregated together and dependent on them for their support; and look at the consequences which must ensue to these people—not from severe labour, but from the depression of manufacturing prosperity, from the absence of demand for labour. I never shall forget as long I live the situation of Paisley in 1841 and 1842, with 15,000 or 16,000 men out of employ, offering their labour without the means of obtaining an equivalent for it, and depending on charity for support. Did I not see that with a depressed commerce there is an addition to the material sufferings of the people of this country, infinitely greater than could be produced by twelve, thirteen, or fourteen hours of the severest labour? I do not underrate the effects of exacting a great amount of labour, and if my wishes could prevail I would have women employed in labour only eight hours a day. The question, however, does not depend on our wishes and feelings of humanity. It is an entirely different question what I wish, and what it is desirable to attempt to effect by means of peremptory enactments. Therefore, when I say I must consider the commercial view of the subject, it is not by placing the commercial gain in contrast with the comforts of the people; but I say that hundreds and thousands are dependent for food upon the prosperity of our commerce, and if any particular measure tends to increase foreign competition, and to strike a blow at the permanent prosperity of these great branches of industry, I shall rue, when it is too late, the injury I shall have inflicted upon the working classes of this country by assenting to it. Therefore I repeat that it is utterly impossible I should disregard commerce, and consider humanity and morality alone. It is said, that those who advocate ten hours a day, ask only to establish in these great branches of manufacture an equilibrium of labour, similar to that in other branches of employment, where it is said, ten hours a day is the number. That is the truth with respect to some branches of agricultural labour. At some periods of the year, women certainly do not work in the field more than ten hours; but I think that depends rather on the circumstance that that particular kind of labour cannot be carried on at night, than on any forbearance on the part of employers; because, during the hay and corn harvest more than ten hours' labour are exacted. Should we be content with a law which prescribed ten hours as the period of agricultural labour at all times of the year, in spring and in harvest time? I apprehend such a law would be deemed a severe restriction on agricultural labour; see what would be the effect of such a restriction on cotton spinners. For four years there has been great depression in that trade; the millowner, however, partly from a sense of his own interest hereafter, and partly from humanity, has continued his mill at work, by which he has been losing money. It is necessary that he should do so, or his machinery would get out of repair. He submits to the loss partly in order to give employment to those in his immediate neighbourhood, and partly in the hope that better times will return. A demand for labour follows, with it an opportunity for the master and the man to make up their losses; but your law interposes. You say, "When there is a period of depression, I expect you to continue your machinery at work although it may be unproductive of profit—pay low wages, just sufficient to support life and keep the labourer from starvation; but when a demand for labour arrives, I will make it impossible either for master or man to make up for lost time, or go beyond a certain amount of profit which my law fixes." I doubt the justice of such an enactment; I doubt whether it is for the advantage of the manufacturer, and I am sure it is not for the advantage of the man and his family, who by this interposition finds 30 or 25 per cent. taken from the £91 a year, which but for that law he might have earned. What is this but levying a tax of 15 or 25 per cent. on capital and labour. I call upon the House to recollect what was thought of an imposition of 3 per cent., and to compare this with a permanent imposition of even 15 per cent. on the profit of capital and the wages of labour. I doubt whether the workmen do not cherish the hope that this restriction will not in its effects fall on them, but I believe the loss to the manufacturer will be much less than to the labourers; for the former will be able to obtain compensation by making reductions; but I doubt whether, by restricting the hours of labour, you will give the workmen an equivalent for the loss of 15 per cent. You are going to apply this restriction to certain branches of labour, which are at your mercy, because they are congregated in large factories, and brought under your eye. I am now speaking on the assumption, that this limitation is not necessary to be equally applied to other branches of industry; but never was assumption more erroneous. There are great branches of industry as to which greater necessity exists for interference than in the cotton manufacture. We should perhaps interfere there, but we cannot. "Why should we not," it is said, "notwithstanding, correct an evil which is tangible, and as to which we can apply a remedy because there is another which we cannot? Let us restrict labour where we can apply our laws; at any rate, we do no harm if we leave untouched other departments of industry, as to which we have no facilities for legislation." That is not a well-founded argument. After I have applied restrictions to one species of capital invested in a description of labour, I do not leave matters where I found them. I give a premium on that labour which I leave unrestricted; and I disturb the application of capital by subjecting capital applied to manufactures to peculiar and special restrictions, and by giving a premium on the application of capital to those employments which are not fettered by such legislation. What are those descriptions of employment I leave untouched by such legislation? Agriculture I put out of the question. It is said I cannot touch agricultural labour. I must say, however, that if I could carry my own wishes into effect, I would prohibit a great deal of agricultural work carried on by women through the middle of winter, without reference to the inclemency of the weather. That women should be working from eight to ten hours, with no opportunity to change their raiment upon occasions, is surely sufficient reason for me to desire to protect them, and, if I could, to leave them to domestic engagements; and certainly, if I could by a wish effect this without injuring other interests, I should be disposed to do so. But I speak of labour employed in agriculture. I am going to restrict one species and to leave untouched another. What is the other species? Is it some small and unimportant department of employment? No. It includes the metal manufacture, the ironmongery, the japan, the tin wire, the screw, the nail, the pin-manufacture, every thing passing under the name of Sheffield or Birmingham ware; earthenware, porcelain, glass, lace, hosiery, calico-printing, bleaching and dyeing, paper-manufacture, rope and twine-making, leather-glove making, steel-plating, and, above all, dress-making and needle-work. I am not going to touch these departments of industry. I am going to leave to the master in these manufactures the unfettered right to employ women and children at whatever period he pleases. Now, I wish you could read the report of the commissioners on the employment of children in several branches of trade and manufactures, which has been laid on the table within the last two years. By adopting this proposition, the House could only hold out a new inducement to give employment to women and children in other branches of trade and manufactures in contradistinction of the cotton manufacture. The commissioners in their report state:—"That in a very large proportion of these trades and manufactures, female children are employed equally with boys, and at the same tender ages; in some, indeed, the number of girls exceeds that of boys; and in a few cases the work, as far as it is performed by those under adult age, is carried on almost entirely by girls and young women."

Now I dare to say, that a great number of gentlemen who hear me, are not aware of the number of women and children engaged in some particular branches of manufacture, which it is generally supposed are chiefly carried on by men. This has struck me as being particularly the case in the manufactures of metal. One of the sub-commissioners said, "I saw in some manufactories women employed in most laborious work, such as stamping buttons and brass nails, and notching the heads of screws. These are certainly unfit operations for women. In screw manufactories the females constitute from 80 to 90 per cent. of the whole number employed. Thus:—Mr. James James, screw manufacturer states, that he employs about 60 men and 300 females. In the screw manufactory of Messrs. J. Hawkins and Co. there are 30 men and 102 women. Mr. S. Henn, foreman of Messrs. F. H. Hyland and Co., screw-manufacturers, states that he has been in the screw-manufactory all his life; that in screw-making few children are employed—not more than 5 in 100. That the great majority of the workpeople are females, as many as 90 per cent.; and that some girls came as young as thirteen or fourteen, but generally from sixteen to twenty-three or twenty-four."

Again, it appears that the number of females engaged in the manufacture of earthenware is very great. It is stated in the report, "From the returns received from Staffordshire it appears that, of the total number of workpeople employed in the principal establishments, the females above twenty-one years of age are considerably more than one-third; between twenty-one and thirteen, the number of the females nearly equals that of the males; and under thirteen the number of the girls is much more than one-half that of the boys; the exact proportions being, above twenty-one years of age, females 2,648, males 4,544; between twenty-one and thirteen, females 1,736, males 1,979; and under thirteen, females 522, males 978."

Why do I quote these things? Because I wish to show you that it is impossible to stop in your legislation; that there is at least the same necessity, that there is a much greater necessity for your interference in respect to other branches of manufactures, than in the case of cotton factories; that if you stop at factories, you are giving encouragement to other branches of manufactures, which are not to be so protected; and if you do not stop there, I advise you to contemplate the extent of your legislation, if we are to undertake the regulation of all labour in respect to which females are employed, and in which excessive tasks are required. Take a branch of manufactures closely allied with the cotton—that of calico-printing, or take the earthenware manufacture, as to both of which there is abundant information as to the employment of women and children in those departments of manufacture. With respect particularly to the manufacture of plates and saucers, in the report of the commissioners to which I have just referred, is this statement: "But the children most to be commiserated are those called 'jiggers and mould-runners,' who are employed by the dish, saucer, and plate makers. Each man employs two boys, one to turn the jigger or horizontal wheel, the other to carry the ware from the whirler to the hot-house on moulds. The children thus employed constantly work in a temperature ranging from 100 to 180 degrees. A man frequently makes eight score dozen saucers in a week, each dozen counting thirty-six pieces; each piece is carried twice to the hot-house, and weighs, mould and bat, 2lbs.; but as two pieces are carried at the same time, they count but as one; that is to say, 4lbs. each trip. A child carries in the week, reckoning his working hours at 7,223,040lbs., or 3,840 lbs. each day. In carrying this weight he journeys 45 miles 1,440 yards every week, or seven miles, 1,120 yards per day. Besides this, he has to mount one, two, or three steps to place the pieces on the shelves, to wedge the clay in the yard, while his master is taking his pipe or his pot; to collect the half-dried pieces from the shelves; to come half an hour or more before his master in the morning to get coals in and ashes out, and to sweep and make the room ready, and to do any thing else that may be wanted, having probably to walk a mile before and after his work."

Such is the nature of the employment in a particular branch of the earthenware manufacture, in which large numbers of females and children are engaged. Now, hon. gentlemen ask, what are the hours of work? The report states that the hours of work in the earthenware manufactories are seldom less than twelve, and that, at the end of the week, in plate-making, the work lasts from six in the morning until nine at night, which makes fifteen hours, and that it very often extends from seventeen to eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. I ask, then, whether the House will only interfere with the cotton manufacturer, and leave earthenware and calico-printing in the same state as at present. If I had not seen the statements in this report, resting on such high authority, I never could have believed it possible that in this country there were human beings who had to undergo such a continuance of human labour as is exacted from those who are engaged in calico-printing. In the report from which I have already quoted, it is stated in the evidence of Thomas Sidbread, block-printer, that after taking a child who had already been at work all day to assist him as a teerer through the night, says:—"We began to work between eight and nine o'clock on the Wednesday night; but the boy had been sweeping the shop from Wednesday morning. You will scarcely believe it, but it is true—I never left the shop till six o'clock on the Saturday morning, and I had never stopped working all that time, excepting for an hour or two, and that boy with me all the time. I was knocked up, and the boy was almost insensible; if I stopped a minute, he was fast asleep in a moment. On the Friday I was printing a piece, and the block did not exactly fit the pattern, so I sent the boy to fasten the piece to a post at the other end of the room, that I might stretch it; he was so sleepy that he took the piece across where the other men were working, which he would never have done if he had been properly awake. However, he fell asleep in the act of doing this, and let go his hold of the end of the piece when I was leaning my weight upon it, and I fell down an open staircase which was at my back, and hurt myself very much. I did not recover it for some time. This child's parents neglected to give him food, and the people I lodged with had not taken care to prepare me enough, so we were obliged to go without food from dinner-time one day until breakfast the next day, as I dared not send the boy for any food, as I was afraid he would give me the slip and run away, and I could not get another; so we both went without food all that time. They worked regularly very long hours; it was quite a regular thing with them. There were men there, and children too, who came on a Monday morning and stayed till Saturday night, slept and ate their food there."

Again, Henry Richardson, block-printer states:—"At four o'clock I began to work, and worked all that day, all the next night, and until ten o'clock the following day. I had only one teerer during that time, and I dare say he would be about twelve years old. I had to shout to him towards the second night, as he got sleepy. I had one of my own children, about ten years old, who was a teerer. He worked with me at Messrs. Wilson and Crichton's, at Blakeley. We began to work together about two or three in the morning, and left off at four or five in the afternoon. Once I remember going on a Friday morning at two o'clock, working all Friday and Friday night, and until twelve o'clock on Saturday. On Saturday night I sent the child to bed about seven o'clock; the next morning, when the other children got up, I told them to let him lie still a bit, as he had had so little rest during the week. We never disturbed him at breakfast-time, and when we returned from chapel at noon, he was still asleep, and slept during dinner-time. About five o'clock in the afternoon, when I came home from the school, I was alarmed at finding him still asleep, and wakened him; but I believe, if I had not done so, he would have slept until Monday morning. I have known children made ill by working too long hours. The boy that worked for me at the Adelphi, was sometimes unable to come to his work from being sick with overworking; and I have known him give another lad his supper, to take a night's turn for him; and he often had no appetite of his own."

Robert Kellatt, block-printer, said:—"I remember, either in August or September last, I started at six o'clock one morning, and it was one o'clock the following morning when I went out of the shop; as I was going out, the foreman called me back, and ordered me to return by six o'clock. I came again at six in the morning, after being away five hours, and worked until nine o'clock at night, when the foreman came again to me to see if I could make it convenient to be back again at twelve o'clock at night; but I did not go, as I considered it rather unfeeling in them to expect me to do so, for my own child had worked with me all those hours, and she was but eleven years old.—Did any of the men who were working with you return at twelve o'clock? Yes, there were three men; but they had not been employing their own children as teeters, and they came back at twelve, and worked till twelve the next day."

Let hon. members read these and other descriptions of the occupation of persons engaged in the metal trade, the earthenware manufacture, calico-printing, lace manufacture, and the hosiery trade, and above all, read in this report the account of the nature of the occupation of the dress-makers and milliners in this metropolis, and then ask themselves if these trades do not as much call for the intervention of parliament as the cotton manufacture? Is it right, then, to deal only with this one branch of industry, and leave others altogether untouched, in which it appears that female children work fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, or even as much as eighteen hours a day? If you are prepared to legislate for them [Hear].—you are then prepared to legislate for them; and we are about to subject, not factory labour merely, but all labour in this country that falls at all within the same principle, to similar restrictions. We are not merely to interdict the employment of women in mines and collieries, but we are about to provide regulations which shall apply to children, and which ought to apply to adults, in respect to all descriptions of labour, where we think it is more severe than the human frame ought to be subjected to. This principle I certainly understand. If this then, be only the commencement of the work, I cannot make any objection to it as being an unjust interference with particular classes of labour; but if, as it seems now the impression—and perhaps the just one—that the imposition of these restrictions upon adult labour, will engender the necessity of further restrictions applicable to all labour, and I see not why it should not be extended to agricultural labour—I say that, because you adopt the principle that necessarily leads to such extensive consequences, namely an invariable and almost universal interference with labour in this country, before I adopt that principle, although I admit the universality of its application, and that it is not inconsistent with justice as showing a preference to no one description of labour over another, yet foreseeing that I should be involved in a duty which I never shall be able satisfactorily to perform—seeing, although it is possible, perhaps, to deal with the factories, yet if I am to enter into private shops and houses, and impose obligations upon every individual as to the degree of labour he shall impose, not upon 300 or 400 children, but upon two or three members of his family whom he employs—if I am to be involved in such a difficult, and, as I think, such a perilous enterprise—if I am to undertake the duty of prescribing and legislating, not merely how long the steam-engine shall work (for that I can effect), but if I am to inculcate in every private establishment and every private family the duties of humanity, I am involved in a task above all human strength, and, as I believe, pregnant with great injustice to individuals. I know my wishes and feelings would be as much in accordance with effecting that object as lessening the labour in the case of factories. I should like to see the father more proud of the education, and instruction, and moral training of his children, than anxious to increase his earnings by their labour. Can I effect it by law? If I once undertake it, I must not be deterred by the difficulty of legislating for individual cases. The more I extend my legislation—if I go from factories to earthenware, from earthenware to hosiery, and from hosiery to lace, that which I leave unrestricted I am giving fresh encouragement to. It is not the magnitude of the establishment I shall have to contend with, because if I carry out the principle fully and fairly, I must descend into all the details of daily occupation. It is admitted, that the first principle of undue interference involves that extent of interference. What may be the effect, then, on the general employment of the country of such an attempt? I know it is pregnant with the most important consequences. After legislation shall have been effected, and these new restrictions imposed, depend upon it, that is not the close of your legislation. I see full well what other consequences must follow; and believing that upon the whole we have attempted as much of legislation on these great branches of manufacture as it is now wise and safe to attempt, for the commerce and manufactures of the country, and above all, for the interests and comforts of the working classes—dreading the consequences of imposing the proposed restrictions on adult labour—saying to the man, "Whatever be your inclinations, the amount of your work and your earnings shall be limited"—admitting that the debate does not turn on the principle, but believing that the interference we suggest, which has been sanctioned by the proposal of former legislators who had well considered the subject, is all that can safely be attempted in respect of this branch of manufacture—believing, above all, that the forcible restriction upon labour to the extent of preventing the adult, in the cotton factory, in the silk factory, in the lace and woollen trade, from labouring more than ten hours—whatever may be my sympathies and my feelings, regardless of being in a majority or in a minority, having no other motive in my conscience than that of promoting what, in my belief, is most consistent with the public interest, I cannot and will not acquiesce in the proposal of my noble friend, forcibly to limit labour in factories to ten hours in the day.

Lord Ashley's amendment was negatived by a majority of 9, and on the 29th of March the bill was withdrawn.

BANK CHARTER—THE CURRENCY.

MAY 6, 1844.

The House having resolved itself into a committee on the Bank of England Charter Act—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose, and addressing Mr. Greene, who was in the chair, said—Sir, there are occasional questions of such vast and manifest importance, and which prefer such a claim, I should rather say such a demand, on the attention of the House, that all rhetorical prefaces, dilating on their magnitude or enjoining the duty of patient consideration, are superfluous and impertinent. I shall, therefore, proceed at once to call the attention of this committee to a matter which enters into every transaction of which money forms a part. There is no contract, public or private,—no engagement, national or individual, which is unaffected by it. The enterprises of commerce, the profits of trade, the arrangements made in all the domestic relations of society, the wages of labour, pecuniary transactions of the highest amount and of the lowest, the payment of the national debt, the provision for the national expenditure, the command which the coin of the smallest denomination has over the necessities of life, are all affected by the decision to which we may come on that great question which I am about to submit to the consideration of the committee. The circumstances under which the duty imposed on me arises are shortly these:—In the year 1833, an act of parliament passed which continued to the Bank of England certain privileges until the year 1855, and after the year 1855 until parliament should determine to give one year's notice to the bank of its determination to revise the charter. Before, however, the expiration of the full period of twenty-one-years, before the arrival of that term of 1855, there was reserved to parliament the power, after the lapse of ten years, by notice to be given to the bank, of revising the charter and reconsidering this whole subject. That period will arrive in August next. After August next it will be competent to this House, by notice given through the speaker, to intimate to the bank that within six months next following this House will reconsider the charter of the Bank of England. If that opportunity be let pass, the charter of the bank and all the privileges it confers will endure until the year 1855. In the present state of this country—in the present state of the currency—after the inquiries which have been instituted, after the degree to which public attention has been called to this subject, her Majesty's government feel it to be their duty to avail themselves of the opportunity thus given to them by law, and to consider the revision of the charter of the bank. They are of opinion, that inquiry has been exhausted—that all the information which is essential to the formation of a satisfactory judgment has been collected, and that it is incumbent on the ministers of the Crown to submit to the decision of parliament the measures which in their opinion it may be fitting to adopt. Sir, I am perfectly satisfied that the members of this House, rising superior to all party considerations, and to all private interests, will consider it their duty to apply their deliberate and impartial consideration to this great subject. I have that confidence in the House of Commons, from past experience of their superiority to mere party views and personal interests where matters of such paramount importance come under review, that I feel assured such will be the course they will pursue on this occasion. I ask you to-night for no decision. I would even deprecate the expression of opinion. I ask you to listen to the proposals I shall make—to hear the evidence and arguments by which they shall be supported—to read and consider the resolutions which I shall move, pro forma; and, after having deliberated maturely on the subject, hereafter to pronounce a cool and impartial judgment upon it. Sir, I am not shaken in the confidence I repose in the House by publications I have seen, inviting the attendance of members on this occasion. I hold in my hand the resolutions adopted at a meeting of the general committee of private country bankers on the 17th of April last. They are to this effect: "That the refusal of government to give information on the subject of their measure concerning banks and issue, naturally leads to the conclusion, that it is their intention to propose some measure affecting country banks generally, and this meeting considers it most probable that it relates to the local circulation of the country." "That under these circumstances it is most desirable that the banks of issue, whether private or joint-stock banks, should unite to oppose any alteration in the local circulation of the country, or in the conditions on which it is now allowed by law; and that the several joint-stock banks and banks of issue throughout the United Kingdom be invited to co-operate with the private bankers in such opposition." The third resolution is, "That all bankers be requested, as far as possible, to bring the question fully under the consideration of all members of parliament with whom they may be acquainted or connected, and endeavour to induce them to oppose any such alterations in the local circulation of the country." Sir, I complain not of these resolutions. I complain not, at least, that the bankers have invited members of parliament to attend in their place and consider this subject; but I do hope that members of parliament will resist the subsequent appeal, and that they will not come here determined beforehand to oppose any alteration in the existing law which may be proposed for their consideration. Are you so satisfied with the existing state of things,—are you so convinced that it is utterly impossible in any particular to suggest alteration, that you will come prepared, before hearing the discussion on the subject, to offer, after previous concert and understanding, an insuperable obstacle to any amendment of the existing law? I know that to be impossible. I hold in my hand the proof of evils flowing from the present state of the law, which should make it impossible that any such previous compact and understanding, if entered into, could be fulfilled. My immediate proposition relates to banking concerns, and to the issue of promissory notes; but, considering that ten years have now elapsed since this subject was brought under consideration, I hope I shall be excused if I take a wider range than the immediate questions for decision might seem to justify, and if I advert at the outset to the great principles which govern, or ought to govern, the measure of value, and the medium of exchange. They lie, in truth, at the very foundation of our discussion. We cannot hope to agree on the measure to be adopted with regard to paper currency, unless we are agreed on the principles which determine the value of that of which paper is the representative, and on the nature of the obligation which is imposed upon the issuer of promissory notes. Now, I fear there is not a general agreement on those fundamental principles—that there is still a very material difference of opinion as to the real nature and character of the measure of value in this country. My first question therefore is, what constitutes this measure of value? What is the signification of that word “a pound,” with which we are all familiar? What is the engagement to pay a “pound?” Unless we are agreed on the answer to these questions, it is in vain we attempt to legislate on the subject. If a “pound” is a mere visionary abstraction, a something which does not exist either in law or in practice, in that case one class of measures relating to paper currency may be adopted; but if the word “pound” the common denomination of value, signifies something more than a mere fiction—if a “pound” means a quantity of the precious metals of certain weight and certain fineness—if that be the definition of a “pound,” in that case another class of measures relating to paper currency will be requisite. Now, the whole foundation of the proposal I am about to make rests upon the assumption that according to practice, according to law, according to the ancient monetary policy of this country, that which is implied by the word “pound” is a certain definite quantity of gold with a mark upon it to determine its weight and fineness, and that the engagement to pay a pound means nothing, and can mean nothing else, than the promise to pay to the holder, when he demands it, that definite quantity of gold. What is the meaning of the “pound” according to the ancient monetary policy of this country? The origin of the term was this:—In the reign of William the Conqueror a pound weight of silver was also the pound of account. The “pound” represented both the weight of metal and the denomination of money. By subsequent debasements of the currency a great alteration was made, not in the name, but in the intrinsic value of the pound sterling, and it was not until a late period of the reign of Queen Elizabeth that silver, being then the standard of value, received that determinate weight which it retained without variation, with constant refusals to debase the standard of silver, until the year 1816, when gold became the exclusive standard of value. The standard of silver was fixed about 1567; but in 1717, the value of the guinea was determined to be 21*s.*, and for a certain period, both gold and silver constituted the mixed standard of value. In the year 1774, it being then enacted that no legal contract should be discharged in silver for any sum of more than £25, gold became substantially the measure of value, and so it continued to be legally and practically until 1797, when that fatal measure for restricting cash payments by the bank was passed, and parties were enabled to issue at their discretion paper money not convertible into coin at the will of the bearer. From 1797 to 1810 public attention was not much directed to this important subject; but in 1810 men of sagacity observed that the exchanges had been for a considerable period unfavourable to this country—more unfavourable than could be accounted for by the balance of trade or the monetary transactions of the country. A committee was appointed to inquire into the subject, and opinions, not really novel, but at that time very startling, were enounced, to the effect that the “pound” meant, in fact, nothing else than a definite quantity of the precious metals, and that those who promised to pay a pound ought to pay that quantity. That theory was very much contested at the time. The House of Commons was not convinced by the arguments used in favour of it. The public mind, confused by the practice that had prevailed since the issue of inconvertible paper, would not admit the doctrine of a metallic standard. Those who contested it were, however, called upon to give their definition of the pound sterling, and it must be admitted that they responded to the call. They did not evade the question, as is now the practice, by writing long and unintelligible pamphlets, but, confident in their own theories, gave, in brief and compendious forms, their definitions of the standard of value. One writer said, “that a pound might be defined to be a sense of value in reference to currency as compared with commodities.” Another writer was dissatisfied with that definition, thinking the public had a right to something more definite and tangible, and that the meaning of “a reference to currency as compared with commodities,” was not very obvious to enlightened minds. This writer said, “There is a standard and there is an unit which is the measure of value, and that unit is the interest of £33:6:8 at 3 per cent, that being £1, and being paid in a Bank-note as money of account." The last definition of the standard of value which I shall quote is this:—"The standard is neither gold nor silver, but it is something set up in the imagination, to be regulated by public opinion." Such were the absurdities into which ingenious men were betrayed, in the attempt to set up some other standard of value, more consistent with inconvertible paper than a metallic standard. It was supposed at that time that the doctrines propounded by the bullion committee were the visionary speculations of theorists, and were unknown in the former monetary history of this country. But that is not the case. Refer to every writer of eminence—to Mr. Locke, to Sir W. Petty, to any one who wrote before 1797, and who had not been familiar with inconvertible paper currency, and you will find they arrive at precisely the same conclusions with the bullion committee. Take the opinion of Mr. Harris, an officer of the Mint, and an eminent writer on the subject a century before the Bank Restriction act:—

"In all countries (says Mr. Harris) there is established a certain standard both as to weight and fineness of the several species of those coins.

"In England, the silver monies are to contain 111 parts of fine silver, and 6 parts of alloy. That is, the pound troy with us contains 11 oz. 2 pennyweights of fine silver, and 18 pennyweights of alloy; and of a pound troy of this standard silver, our money pound contains $\frac{2}{2}$ parts, that is to say a pound of this silver is coined into 62s. This standard has continued invariable ever since the 43rd Elizabeth.

"By the standard of money is always meant the quantity of pure or fine metal contained in a given sum. In England accounts are kept by the pound sterling, which is a certain quantity of fine silver appointed by law for a standard." (He was writing at a time when silver was the standard in England.) "All payments abroad are regulated by the course of exchange, and that is founded upon the intrinsic value, and not on the mere names of coins.

"We may break the public faith here, and curtail the long-established measure of property; but foreigners will make ample allowance for what we may do, and however we may rob and cheat one another, will secure themselves, and make an advantage of our discredit, by bringing the exchange against us beyond the part."

These are the true doctrines as to the measure of value, doctrines delivered one hundred years before the Report of the bullion committee was made, but in precise conformity with that Report. The truth of them is not, I fear, even now admitted. Publications daily issue from the press contesting it. Here is a volume published at Birmingham since the commencement of the present year, not the production, I presume, of a single author, for it professes to be written by Gemini. I have no wish to withhold justice from writers who give that proof of their sincerity, which is implied by the publication of an octavo volume. And I admit at once, that I do not believe this work could have proceeded from any other town in the Queen's dominions than Birmingham, and that the efforts of no single writer are equal to the production of so much nonsense. This volume collects and repeats all the old exploded fallacies on the subject of the standard of value and the currency. Its authors bewail the darkness of the age which adheres to a standard which was adopted in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and which they consider wholly unsuitable as a measure of value now, considering the extent of our commerce, and the increase of all pecuniary transactions in number and amount. They might with equal justice complain, that since travelling has been increased by the completion of railways, the foot measure is still adhered to. There is no better reason for making the sovereign pass for twenty-five shillings instead of twenty, than for making the foot consist of sixteen inches instead of twelve. They consider it absurd, that with the progress we have made in wealth and knowledge, we should still coin the ounce of gold into a sum represented by £3, 17s. 10½d. "Coin the ounce of gold," say they, "into £5, and we shall then have relief from our burthens, and encouragement to industry and trade." Now, let us consider what is meant by affixing to the ounce of gold a value, represented in coin by the sum of £3:17:10½? According to the regulations of the Mint, before the alteration of the silver coin in 1816, a pound weight of standard gold was coined into 44½ guineas; a pound weight of standard silver was coined into 62s.; and a guinea was made current for 21s. We are thus enabled to calculate the relative value of gold and silver according to the Mint regulations. The sum of $44\frac{1}{2}$ guineas in gold, that is a pound of gold, was equivalent to 1,869 sixpences in silver, and the pound of silver being equal to 124 sixpences in coin, the value of gold was to that of silver as 1,839 to 124, or as $15\frac{3}{17}$ to 1. The ounce of gold in coin was equivalent to the corresponding amount in silver, namely, the twelfth part of 1,869 sixpences, that is to say, to 155 sixpences and $\frac{3}{4}$ of a shilling, or £3 : 17 : 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. There was, indeed, a small difference in the amount of alloy in a pound of coined gold and a pound of coined silver, for which it is necessary to make allowance, and that allowance being made, the relative value of pure gold to pure silver in the coins of the two metals was as $15\frac{225}{13480}$ to 1. Silver has ceased to be a standard of value, and the silver coin being now a mere token, the former relative value of gold coin to silver coin is not now preserved. The above calculations explain our meaning when we say that the ounce of gold is coined into the sum of £3 : 17 : 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. These terms express the relation of gold and silver coin, according to the Mint regulations at the time that silver coin was made of standard silver. You may now enact, no doubt, that the ounce of gold shall be coined into £5 in money of account, that is to say, you may debase the standard to that extent. And what will be the effect of this? All debtors will no doubt gain by it. In the case of all unfulfilled contracts, he who has to receive payment will receive much less in point of real value than he stipulated for. The creditor will be defrauded—the debtor will have a corresponding advantage. But this will be the whole effect. No new transaction will be affected by your choosing to call an ounce of gold £5. As Mr. Harris says, you may cheat each other at home, but foreign countries will adjust their dealings with you, not on account of the name to be given to your coin, but according to its real value. All new contracts at home will be regulated by the same principles. The real and not the nominal value of that which is made by law the medium of exchange, will regulate prices and all future contracts. Even the relative value of gold and silver will not be adjusted by your laws. You may insist on coining the ounce of gold into £5 instead of £3 : 17 : 10 $\frac{1}{2}$, that is to say, into 200 sixpences, instead of, as at present, into 155 sixpences and fourpence halfpenny, but silver will disobey your law, and will insist on finding its own value in the market on principles which you cannot control. The Mint regulations do not, it is true, correctly express the present relative value of gold and silver in the bullion market. Silver is not worth 5s. 2d. an ounce, not more, I believe, than 5s. an ounce, and there would be an apparent present advantage to the debtor in taking silver rather than gold as the standard, since the relative value of gold to silver when standard-silver is 5s. per ounce, is as 15.575 to 1, instead of $15\frac{225}{13480}$ to 1. But there is reason to doubt whether those who wish for a relaxation of the standard, and who, for the purpose of benefiting the debtor, recommend either a joint standard of silver and gold, or the substitution of silver for gold as the standard, would attain their object were either of those measures adopted. There is reason to believe, advertent particularly to the rapid increase of the annual supply of gold from mines within the dominions of the Emperor of Russia, that the value of gold in the general markets of the world is on the decrease, and that the interest of the debtor would not be permanently advanced by the abandonment of gold for silver as the standard of value in the country. But to revert to the errors of those who are the advocates of some measure of value other than the precious metals. They object to the selection of gold as the standard of value, because gold is an article of commerce,—because there is a demand for it as bullion, affecting, therefore, its value as coin, and disqualifying it to be the measure of value. Now, no one contends that there is or can be an absolutely fixed and invariable standard of value. No one denies that the value of gold, with reference to all commodities, excepting gold itself, may be subject to slight variations. But what other substance is not more subject to variations in value than the precious metals? What other substance possessing intrinsic value will not always be in demand as an article of commerce? It is because gold is an article of commerce, because there are no restrictions upon its export or its import, that you can at all times depend upon such a supply of gold for the purposes of coin as may be sufficient for the wants of this country. The precious metals are distributed among the various countries of the world in proportion to their respective necessities, by laws of certain though not very obvious operation, which, without our interference, will allot to our share all that we require. Some entertain the apprehension that we may be drained of all our gold in consequence of a demand for gold from foreign countries, either for the payment of their armies in time of war, or in consequence of sudden and unforeseen demand for foreign corn for our own internal consumption. It is supposed that gold, being an article in universal demand, and having at all times and in all places an ascertained value, is more subject to exportation than anything else. But the export of gold, whether coin or bullion, is governed by precisely the same laws by which the export of any other article is governed. Gold will not leave this country unless gold be dearer in some other country than it is in this. It will not leave this country, merely because it is gold, nor while there is any article of our produce or manufacture which can be exported in exchange for foreign produce with a more profitable return. If gold coin be in any country the common medium of exchange; or if the promissory notes, which perform in part the functions of gold coin, are at all times and under all circumstances of equal value with gold, and are instantly convertible into gold, there are causes in operation which, without any interference on our part, will confine within known and just limits the extent to which gold can be exported. There may no doubt be temporary pressure from the export of gold, even when it is confined within those limits; but none for which you may not provide, none to which you would not be subject, in a higher degree probably, were any other standard of value adopted in preference to gold. I have thus stated the grounds which justify the conclusion, that, according to the ancient monetary policy of the country, according to the law, according to the practice that prevailed at all times, excepting during the period of inconvertible paper currency, a certain quantity of the precious metals, definite in point of weight and fineness, has constituted, and ought to constitute, the measure of value. The minds of men, habituated during the bank restriction to a departure from that measure of value, were loth to admit those great elementary truths which are at the foundation of the whole system of currency, paper credit, and foreign exchange. Ingenious writers have from time to time laboured to prove the unsoundness of these doctrines, to show that a metallic standard was neither practically nor theoretically the measure of value in this country, and have cited various facts apparently irreconcilable with the theory. But when all the circumstances attending each fact have been fully stated, they have been sufficient to account for the seeming contradiction. When Sir Isaac Newton had established the planetary system on the principle of gravitation and attraction, there were phenomena apparently at variance with the theory. But succeeding philosophers, starting from the point which in the progress of science had been reached by Sir Isaac Newton, applying his principles with improved means of investigating truth, solved the doubts which he had not been able to solve, and showed that the apparent contradictions, when all the disturbing influences were taken into account, became in fact new demonstrations of the soundness of the original theory. And the same result has followed, and will follow, in the case of objections which have been, and will continue to be, urged against the principle of the metallic standard. It must at the same time be admitted that it would be quite consistent with that principle to adopt some other measure of value than that which we have adopted. It would be consistent with that principle to select silver instead of gold as the standard,—to have a mixed standard of gold and silver, the relative values of the two metals being determined,—to dispense with gold coin altogether, and regulate the amount and value of paper currency by making it convertible only, according to the proposal of Mr. Ricardo, into gold bullion of a given minimum amount. I trust, however, this House will adhere to the present standard,—will resolve on the maintenance of a single standard, and of gold as that standard. All the great writers on this subject, Sir William Petty, Mr. Locke, Mr. Harris, and Lord Liverpool, have been decidedly in favour of a single, in preference to a double standard. Mr. Locke, indeed, was of opinion that silver ought to be the standard; but there appears good ground to doubt the soundness of that opinion; and there are, at any rate, the most cogent reasons since gold has been for a long course of years the standard in this country, for the continued maintenance of it. They are well stated in the admirable treatise on coins, written by the first Lord Liverpool. In that treatise a system of coinage is recommended, which is in exact conformity, both in point of principle and detail, with the system which we have adopted. Lord Liverpool observes:—

“After full consideration of this extensive, abstruse, and intricate subject, I humbly offer to your majesty, as the result of my opinion,

“First, That the coins of this realm, which are to be the principal measure of property and instrument of commerce, should be made of one metal only.

“Secondly, That in this kingdom the gold coins only have been for many years past, and are now, in the practice and opinion of the people, the principal measure of property and instrument of commerce.

“It has been shown that, in a country like Great Britain, so distinguished for its affluence and for the extent of its commercial connections, the gold coins are best adapted to be the principal measure of property; in this kingdom, therefore, the gold coin is now the principal measure of property and standard coin, or, as it were, the sovereign archetype by which the weight and value of all other coins should be regulated.

“It is the measure of almost all contracts and bargains; and by it, as a measure, the price of all commodities bought and sold is adjusted and ascertained. For these reasons the gold coin should be made as perfect and kept as perfect as possible.

“Thirdly, It is evident, that where the function of the gold coins as a measure of property ceases, there that of the silver coins should begin; and that where the function of the silver coins, in this respect, ceases, there that of copper should begin: it is clear, therefore, that so far only these silver and copper coins should be made legal tender and no further, at least not in any great degree; and it follows that the coins, both of silver and copper, are subordinate, subservient, and merely representative coins; and must take their value with reference to the gold coins according to the rate which the sovereign sets upon each of them.”

These are, in fact, the principles which regulate our present coinage. We have a single standard, and that standard gold,—the metal which was practically the standard for many years previously to the suspension of cash payment. The silver coin is a mere token, auxiliary and subordinate to the gold coin; the ounce of silver being now coined into 66s. instead of 62s., and silver coin not being a legal tender for any greater sum than 40s. By the abolition, in this part of the United Kingdom, of the promissory notes below £5, you introduce the gold coin into general use for the purpose of effecting small payments; you enable the holder of the smallest note to demand payment in gold, and thus ensure the maintenance of a very considerable quantity of gold as a part of the circulating medium. There is, no doubt, some expense in the maintenance of a metallic circulation, but none, in my opinion, sufficient to countervail the advantage of having gold coin generally distributed throughout the country, accessible to all, and the foundation of paper credit and currency. It is contended by some, that if you were to dispense with coin altogether, to adopt the principle of Mr. Ricardo's plan, and make bank notes not convertible into gold at the will of the holder, excepting when presented to the amount of a very considerable sum (£300 or £400 for instance), and then convertible into bullion and not coin, you would provide a security against the effects of a panic connected with political causes, causing a sudden demand for gold. I very much doubt the policy of taking such precautions against such a contingency, and consider that the most effectual measure for promoting permanent confidence in the paper circulation of the country, is to require that the gold coin shall be in general use for small payments, and the promissory note shall be of equal value with the coin which it professes to represent. I shall here close my observations on the measure of value and the coinage, and proceed to the more immediate subject for consideration, namely, the state of the paper circulation of the country, and the principles which ought to regulate it. I must state, at the outset, that in using the word money, I mean to designate by that word the coin of the realm, and promissory notes payable to bearer on demand. In using the words paper currency, I mean only such promissory notes. I do not include in those terms bills of exchange, or drafts on bankers, or other forms of paper credit. I will not weary the House with a discussion as to the precise nature of deposits, and whether they constitute a part of the currency of the country. There is a material distinction, in my opinion, between the character of a promissory note payable to bearer on demand, and other forms of paper credit, and between the effects which they respectively produce upon the prices of commodities and upon the exchanges. The one answers all the purposes of money, passes from hand to hand without endorsement, without examination, if there be no suspicion of forgery: and it is in fact, what its designations imply it to be, currency or circulating medium. I do not deny that other forms of paper credit have some effects in common with Bank notes, that they all have a tendency to economise the use of metallic money, and have a common influence on the value of gold to the extent to which they dispense with the use of it, and thus leave a larger quantity available for the general purposes of the world than there would otherwise be. But I think experience shows that the paper currency, that is, the promissory notes payable to bearer on demand, stands in a certain relation to the gold coin and the foreign exchange in which other forms of paper credit do not stand. There are striking examples of this adduced in the report of the bullion committee of 1810, in the case both of the Bank of England, and of the Irish and Scotch Banks. In the case of the Bank of England, shortly after its establishment, there was a material depreciation of paper in consequence of its excessive issue. The notes of the Bank of England were at a discount of 17 per cent. There was no doubt as to the solvency of the Bank, for bank stock, on which 60 per cent. had been paid, was selling at 110 per cent. After trying various expedients, it was at length determined to reduce the amount of bank notes outstanding. The consequence was an immediate increase in the value of those which remained in circulation, the restoration of them to par, and a corresponding improvement in the foreign exchanges. In the case of Ireland, in the year 1804, the exchange with England was very unfavourable. A committee was appointed to consider the causes. It was denied by most of the witnesses from Ireland that they were at all connected with excessive issues of Irish notes. It was then stoutly maintained—and it was afterwards in 1810—that “notes issued only in proportion to the demand in exchange for good and convertible securities, payable at specific periods, could not tend to any excess in circulation, or to any depreciation.” In the spring of 1804, the exchange of Ireland with England was so unfavourable that it required £118 10s. of the notes of the Bank of Ireland to purchase £100 of the notes of the Bank of England. Between the year 1804 and the year 1806 the notes of the Bank of Ireland were reduced from £3,000,000 to £2,410,000, and the effect of this, taken in conjunction with an increase of the English circulation, was to restore the relative value of Irish paper and the exchange with England to par. In the same manner, an unfavourable state of the exchange between Scotland and England has been more than once corrected by a contraction of the paper circulation of Scotland. In all these cases the action has been upon that part of the paper credit of the country which has consisted of promissory notes payable to the bearer on demand. There has been no interference with other forms of paper credit, nor was it contended then, as it is now contended by some, that promissory notes are identical in their nature with bills of exchange, and with checks on bankers, and with deposits, and that they cannot be dealt with on any separate principle. There is a passage in the work to which I have before referred, the treatise of Lord Liverpool, which draws the just distinction between paper credit and paper currency, and exposes the fallacy of those who deprecate any attempt to regulate by law the paper currency, on the ground that it is not distinguishable in its nature from paper credit. Lord Liverpool observes—“It has been a common artifice, practised by those who have written on paper currency, to confound paper credit with paper currency; and even the higher sorts of paper currency with the inferior sorts, such as immediately interfere with the use of the coins of the realm. Paper credit is not only highly convenient and beneficial, but is even absolutely necessary in carrying on the trade of a great commercial kingdom. Paper currency is a very undefined term, as used by speculative writers. To find arguments in its support, at least to the extent to which it is at present carried, they have been obliged to connect it with paper credit; so that the principles on which the use of paper credit is truly founded, may be brought in support of a great emission of paper currency. Paper currency, strictly speaking, consists only of bills or notes payable or convertible into cash on demand by the person who issued the same at the will of the holder."

That appears to me to be the true definition of paper currency, as distinguished from paper credit. It is the substitute for, and the immediate representative of coin, and with coin it constitutes "money." And if you will adhere to the standard of value, and will adopt such measures as shall ensure the uniform equivalency of bank notes to coin, you may safely, in my opinion, leave untouched other forms of paper credit, and entrust the regulation and control of them to individual caution and discretion. There are some, however, who admit the validity of this distinction, and yet contend that no new legislative interference is required in the case of promissory notes. In their opinion the true principles which should govern the issue of such notes are, freedom of competition, and immediate convertibility into coin at the will of the holder. The combination of these principles will, in their opinion, afford to the public a complete security against abuse of the privilege of issue. In support of that opinion they have, undoubtedly, the high authority of Adam Smith and of Ricardo. Both these eminent writers assume that immediate convertibility into coin is all that is requisite to prevent the excessive issue of paper. It is no impeachment of their sagacity, if, in the progress which this science, like all other sciences, is making, there be reason to doubt the soundness of any particular opinion which they may have delivered. And it is our duty to disregard their authority, and to act on the conclusions of our own judgment, if either reason or experience convinces us that they are safer guides. It appears to me that we have, from reasoning, from experience, from the admissions made by the issuers of paper money, abundant ground for the conclusion, that, under a system of unlimited competition, although it be controlled by convertibility into coin, there is not an adequate security against the excessive issue of promissory notes. We should infer, certainly, from reasoning, that free competition in the supply of any given article will probably ensure us the most abundant supply of that article at the cheapest rate. But we do not want an abundant supply of cheap promissory paper. We want only a certain quantity of paper, not, indeed, fixed and definite in nominal amount, but just such a quantity of paper, and that only, as shall be equivalent in point of value to the coin which it represents. If the paper be cheaper than the coin, it is an evil and not an advantage. That system, therefore, which provides a constant supply of paper equal in value to coin, and so varying in amount as to ensure at all times immediate convertibility into coin, together with perfect confidence in the solvency of the issuers of paper, is the system which ought to be preferred. Now, unless the issuers of paper conform to certain principles, unless they vigilantly observe the causes which influence the influx or efflux of coin, and regulate their issues of paper accordingly, there is danger that the value of the paper will not correspond with the value of coin. The difference may not be immediately perceived,—nay, the first effect of undue issue, by increasing prices, may be to encourage further issues; and as each issuer, where there is unlimited competition, feels the inutility of individual efforts of contraction, the evil proceeds, until the disparity between gold and paper becomes manifest, confidence in the paper is shaken, and it becomes necessary to restore its value by sudden and violent reductions in its amount, spreading ruin among the issuers of paper, and deranging the whole monetary transactions of the country. If we admit the principle of a metallic standard, and admit that the paper currency ought to be regulated by immediate reference to the foreign exchanges,—that there ought to be early contractions of paper on the efflux of gold,—we might, I think, infer from reasoning, without the aid of experience, that an unlimited competition in respect to issue will not afford a security for the proper regulation of the paper currency. Let us now refer to the admissions made by those who are the advocates for unlimited competition. Several country bankers were examined by the select committee, and their evidence is important: it demonstrates the absence of that controlling check upon issue which ought to be applied, if the principles for which I contend are just. Mr. Hobhouse, a banker, in the south-west of England, (a brother of the right hon. baronet the member for Nottingham,) who spoke with some authority from his having been chairman of the committee of private bankers, and their selected organ, was examined before the committee. What account did he give of the issue of private bankers? He was asked—"With a rise of prices, would there be an increased paper issue by country bankers?" He answered,—“Yes, there will be an increase in the local circulation when prices rise. Gold is a commodity, of which there may be a glut as well as a scarcity; and I could never see any reason to be frightened at an export or drain of gold.”

He was then asked,—“Ought not there to be a contraction of the circulation under such circumstances?” He answers,—“Whether there ought or ought not, I cannot tell; but I am sure, that, in fact, there could not be. I am perfectly satisfied that it is quite impossible for these local currencies to be influenced by the price of gold or the foreign exchanges.”

He is then asked,—“Does it not often happen that your circulation is increased in the beginning of a drain of gold?” He answers,—“Yes; we do not pretend that our circulation is at all governed by it. It is governed by what I have stated already.”

Another witness examined was Mr. Stuckey. He was asked this question,—“Supposing it should be ultimately thought that it is desirable that the country circulation should have a general conformity to the state of the foreign exchanges; do you conceive that this could, in any way, be effected by the country bankers?” He answers,—“I do not at present see how it could be accomplished; and I may take the liberty of going further in answer to that question, and saying that it appears to me that the country issues, as conducted in the West of England, have very little or nothing to do with foreign exchanges.”

Now, the effect of this evidence is, to prove that country banks do not and cannot control their issues according to the state of the foreign exchanges. The amount of their issues is governed by prices, rather than by a reference to the exchange. When speculation is active, and prices rise, that is to say, at the very time at which a check may most probably be required on the increased issues of the country banks, their activity is stimulated. Just at the period when that warning is given, so far from the warning being attended to, there is increased action in the opposite direction. Prices are rising. The country bankers have no control over their currency. The increase of price compels increase of issue, and thus there is going on at the same time the reciprocal action of increased speculation, and an additional stimulus given to that speculation by increased issues. The first witness from whose evidence I quoted, when asked whether the circulation of country banks was governed, as that of the Bank of England was, by the state of the exchanges, fairly admitted that it was not. He was asked,—“Do you mean that when a drain of gold was beginning, that was the time when frequently the circulation of the country banks was increased?” The answer of Mr. Hobhouse, is,—“Yes; there is an increase at the beginning of a drain of gold, and the circulation is not governed by it.”

The fact is, there is no sense of individual responsibility; each issuer says, and says naturally enough, “It is in vain for me, individually, to contract my issues, when others will not do the same. I shall suffer by doing so. My efforts will produce no effect on the aggregate, while some competitor will take that share of the circulation which I may withdraw.” And thus, each refusing to make the individual sacrifice, (which, indeed, is useless where only made individually,) the crisis comes,—there is a demand for gold which cannot be satisfied, and the end of all is, much individual suffering and many fortunes ruined, from the necessity of a sudden and violent effort to establish, by the contraction of issue, an equilibrium between gold and paper. Thus it appears to me that the conclusions of reason against unlimited competition of issue, are amply confirmed by the admission of the advocates for it. Are the lessons of experience at variance with the conclusions we are entitled to draw from reason and from evidence? What has been the result of unlimited competition in the United States? In the United States the paper circulation was supplied, not by private bankers, but by joint-stock banks established on principles apparently the most satisfactory. There was every precaution taken against insolvency; unlimited responsibility of partners—excellent regulations for the publication and audit of accounts—immediate convertibility of paper into gold. If the principle of unlimited competition, controlled by such checks, be safe, why has it utterly failed in the United States? How can it be shown that the experiment was not fairly made in that country? Observe this fact. While there existed a central bank (the United States' Bank), standing in some such relation to the other banks of the United States as the Bank of England stands to the banks of the country, there was some degree (imperfect it is true) of control over the general issues of paper. But when the privileges of the central bank ceased, when the principle of free competition was left unchecked, then came, notwithstanding professed convertibility, immoderate issues of paper, extravagant speculation, and the natural consequences, suspension of cash payments and complete insolvency. Hence I conclude that reason, evidence, and experience combine to demonstrate the impolicy and danger of unlimited competition in the issue of paper. I have now stated—with respect to the measure of value, with respect to the coinage and currency—and with respect to promissory notes payable on demand—the broad and general principles which I think ought to regulate these three great elements of our monetary system. I have done on this occasion what I have done on others. I have stated, without the slightest compromise or concealment, the leading principles to which, in my opinion, our legislation in those matters ought to conform. I have now to state the extent to which I propose to carry out those principles. If I do not carry them out immediately to their full and entire extent, I may be told, as I have been told before, that very good principles have been laid down in the abstract, but that practically I shrink from their application. Nevertheless, the opinion which I have formerly expressed I still entertain—that it is of great importance that public men should acknowledge the great principles by which important measures should be regulated: and, in discussing a question of such magnitude as the present, I had rather it were said, "You fall short in the application of sound and admitted principles," than that "You have concealed or perverted those principles for the purpose of justifying your limited application of them." In addressing the House on this important subject, I have, in the first instance, stated principles which I deem to be correct, and which ought to be the rule and guide of our future legislation. I have now to consider, with the same unreservedness, how far the consideration due to special circumstances, to existing interests, to the usages and habits of the community, demands caution and limitation in the immediate application of those principles. All I can promise is, that I will propose no practical measure which is inconsistent with the principles which I have laid down, and which does not tend to their ultimate establishment. It is, however, most important that those who are responsible for the management of the affairs of a great country like this—seeing how easy it is, by unwise legislation, to create panic or introduce confusion into the monetary transactions of the country—it is most important that they should deal considerably with private interests: first, because justice requires it; and, secondly, because there is danger that the cause of progressive amendment and reform will be injured, if you cannot reconcile reform with a due regard to the welfare and happiness of individuals. In what mode then, admitting the principles I have announced to be correct, in what mode shall we best provide for the present application and ultimate establishment of them, with the least disturbance of existing interest? Some have contended, and I am not prepared to deny the position, that if we had a new state of society to deal with, the wisest plan would be, to claim for the state the exclusive privilege of the issue of promissory notes, as we have claimed for it the exclusive privilege of coinage. They consider that the state is entitled to the whole profits to be derived from that which is the representative of coin, and that if the state had the exclusive power of issuing paper, there would be established a controlling power which would ensure, as far as possible, an equilibrium in the currency. At the same time there have been men, whose judgment is also entitled to weight, who have expressed a different opinion on this subject. This question was under the consideration of the House when Lord Althorp brought forward the Bank Charter Bill, in 1833. It had also been the subject of consideration in the select committee of 1832; and Lord Althorp, in moving the extension of the Bank Charter, discussed the policy of a single bank of issue to be constituted by, and responsible to the government. Having mentioned the name of Lord Althorp, I must, though I differ from that noble lord in respect to politics, bear testimony to his integrity, and to the soundness of his judgment in all financial matters. No man who ever filled the office which the noble lord then held is entitled to stand higher in public estimation as respects those qualifications for a public trust. On the occasion to which I have just referred, Lord Althorp said :—" Another point for consideration is, whether the profits, which must necessarily be derived from the circulating medium of the country, should be possessed by government, or should be allowed to remain in private hands? Now, Sir, the advantages, the only advantages, which I have been enabled to discover in a government bank, as compared with a private company, are those which result from having responsible persons to manage the concern, the public deriving the benefit of it; but then, on the other hand, I think these advantages are much more counterbalanced by the political evils which would inevitably result from placing this bank under the control of the government. I think that the effect of the State having the complete control of the circulating medium in its own hands would be most mischievous. Under these circumstances, Sir, I certainly am prepared to propose the continuation of a single bank of issue in the metropolis, subject to the control of the publicity of their accounts. If we were now, for the first time, establishing a system of banking on which the country should proceed, I think this would be the most advisable mode of establishing a bank in the metropolis. But, Sir, this proposition has the additional advantage—and it is no mean one—that it will occasion the least change; because I certainly am of opinion that, unless some great advantages could be derived from a change in the monetary system of this country, nothing could be more ill-advised—nothing could be more useless, than to depart from it."

In the latter part of Lord Althorp's observations I entirely agree. The true policy in this country is to work, so far as it be possible, with the instruments you have ready for your hand—to avail yourselves of that advantage which they possess from having been in use, from being familiar from constituting a part of the habits and usages of society. They will probably work more smoothly than perfectly novel instruments of greater theoretical perfection. If we disturb that which is established, let us have some good practical reason for the change. It is now incumbent on me to detail and explain the practical measures which I propose for the regulation of the currency. I will state them consecutively, and without intermediate comment, in order that the House may be in full possession of the plan recommended by the government. We think it of great importance to increase the controlling power of a single Bank of Issue. We think it the wisest course to select the Bank of England as that controlling and central body, rather than to appoint commissioners acting under the authority of parliament for the purpose of the issue of a paper currency. I therefore propose, with respect to the Bank of England, that it should continue in possession of its present privileges of issue, but that there should be a complete separation of the business of banking from that of issue; that there should be a department of issue separate from the department of banking, with separate officers and separate accounts. I propose that to the issue department should be transferred the whole amount of bullion now in the possession of the bank, and that the issue of bank-notes should hereafter take place on two foundations, and two foundations only:—first, on a definite amount of public securities; secondly, exclusively upon bullion. The action of the public will regulate the amount of that portion of the note circulation which is issued upon bullion. With respect to the banking business of the bank, I propose that it should be governed on precisely the same principles as would regulate any other body dealing with Bank of England notes. The fixed amount of securities on which I propose that the Bank of England should issue notes, is £14,000,000, the whole of the remainder of the circulation to be issued exclusively on the foundation of bullion. I propose that there should be a complete periodical publication of the accounts of the Bank of England, both of the banking and issue department. Objections were urged in 1833, to frequent publications of these accounts; but, in my opinion, those objections are without foundation. I have the strongest impression that nothing will more conduce to the credit of the bank itself, and to the prevention of needless alarm, than the complete and immediate disclosure of its transactions. I would, therefore, propose to enact by law that there should be returned to the government a weekly account of the issue of notes by the Bank of England, of the amount of bullion, of the amount of deposits, of securities, in short, a general summary of every transaction both in the issue department and the banking department of the Bank of England; and that the government should forthwith publish unreservedly, and weekly, the account which they receive from the bank. It is desirable, in order to make the whole plan more clearly understood, that I should now state the regulations we propose to establish with respect to other banking establishments, and afterwards, that I should revert to the subject of the Bank of England, and state the terms which we have made with the bank, subject to the ratification of parliament. Our general rule is, to draw a distinction between the privilege of issue and the conduct of the ordinary banking business. We think they stand on an entirely different footing. We think that the privilege of issue is one which may be fairly and justly controlled by the State, and that the banking business, as distinguished from issue, is a matter in respect to which there cannot be too unlimited and unrestricted a competition. The principle of competition, though unsafe in our opinion when applied to issue, ought we think, to govern the business of banking. After the issue of paper currency has once taken place, it is then important that the public should be enabled to obtain the use of that issue on as favourable terms as possible. With regard to banks in England and Wales, other than the Bank of England, we propose, that from this time, no new bank of issue should be constituted. I have stated that our object is to effect the change we contemplate, with as little detriment as possible to individual interests. We, therefore, do not propose to deprive existing banking establishments, which are now actually banks of issue, of the privilege they possess. We do not wish to raise that alarm which we fear would be excited if there should be any sudden extinction of the power of issue now possessed by these banking establishments. Leaving, therefore, to the existing banks, which are actually banks of issue, their privilege of issue, we subject them to the condition that they shall not exceed the existing amount of their issue; this amount to be determined by the average issue of each bank for a definite preceding period, of two or three years, for instance. The Bank of England will thus be acquainted with the extent of the issue from all other establishments. I know I am liable to be told that the issues of these banks may be much larger under particular circumstances and at particular periods, than at others; but I have obtained returns, of a confidential nature, from ten of the best-conducted banks in the country, six of them being in agricultural, and four in manufacturing districts; and the amount of their variation of issue is much less than might be imagined. If, however, there should at any time be a demand for an increased issue, there would always be ready means of supplying it; as the banks may, by investing a portion of their capital in public securities, command a given amount of Bank of England notes by the sale of such securities, and, with those notes, may supply any occasional demand for increased local issues. While we thus restrain the issue of promissory notes, we intend to facilitate the banking business. Many of the joint-stock banking companies have not at present the privilege of suing and being sued. There are two descriptions of joint-stock banks; those constituted under the Act of 1826, and those established under the Act of 1833. The time has come when you must determine whether you will permit and encourage the system of joint-stock banks, or extinguish it. If you determine to retain the system, then you ought to give the banks every facility for the transaction of their business. The joint-stock banks ask for the privilege of suing and being sued; but this privilege, if granted, is a privilege not only to them, but to the public, who will have readier means of procuring redress in case of wrong. Proceeding on the principles of facilitating banking operations, we propose to amend the existing law in other particulars. The place whence legal notice may be issued by joint-stock banks, or where it may be served, is at present imperfectly defined. Again, the joint-stock banks are bound by the acts of an unauthorized partner, it being the principle of partnerships that the acts of one bind the rest of the partners. But in the case of joint-stock banks with a very large proprietary, there are no means of controlling the admission of individual partners. The purchase of shares constitutes a partner. We propose, therefore, to exempt the company from liability on account of the unauthorized acts of a simple partner; still making the company responsible for the unauthorized acts of a director of the bank. The appointment to be a director implies choice, and the confidence of the elective body; and this distinction between liabilities for the acts of a director, and that for a simple partner is therefore a just one. The chief complaint of the joint-stock banks in London is, that they cannot accept bills for a less date than six months. Other private banking establishments in London have an unlimited power of acceptance, but joint-stock banks labour under the prohibition I have mentioned. This was insisted on by the Bank of England, when the last charter was discussed, in order that the joint-stock banks should not come into competition with that establishment and the London private banks, by being allowed the power of acceptance for a less date than six months. We propose to place the joint-stock banks in London on a perfect equality in this respect, and to give them the power of accepting bills of any amount and for any period. It is thought by some that this privilege might be so perverted as to give rise to a paper currency differing in form, but not in principle, from promissory notes. The power has been held by private banks from time immemorial, and it has not hitherto been accompanied by any abuse; and why should it be anticipated that joint-stock banks would abuse a similar power, contrary to the intentions of the legislature? But I give public notice, that, if the power should be abused,—if it should be attempted to circulate small bills so accepted, within the limits reserved to the bank,—I shall not hesitate to appeal to parliament on the instant, for the purpose of correcting that evil. These, then, are the facilities we propose to extend to the joint-stock banks. I will now mention the conditions or restrictions we propose to apply to all existing banks. In the first place, we require of all such banks, that there be a full and complete periodical publication of the names of all partners and directors. This is what the London and Westminster voluntarily publishes. It is said, that the public have a great security against loss, in the fact, that each partner is liable to the extent of his whole fortune for the debts of the bank to which he belongs. Very well. Let the public then know who the partners are. Let us know the transfers of shares that take place; let us determine how long the responsibility for the possession of shares will attach to a party; as we have the comfort of unlimited responsibility, give us the names of those who are our guaranties. There is another condition we have a right to insist upon. We are to continue to existing banks the privilege of issue. Let us know the amount of the issues. We are going to demand from the Bank of England a weekly account of issues, and any bank exercising the privilege of issue ought to make a similar publication. If a bank objects to the condition of publication, it can absolve itself from it by issuing only Bank of England paper. It is said, that the weekly publication of issues will disclose secrets of which a rival may take advantage; that it will show "the weak point." Now I wish "the weak point" (if there be one) to be shown, and that the public may have the advantage of knowing it. It is said, erroneous inferences will be drawn from weekly publication; that the issues at one time will appear large, and at another comparatively small. But the frequency of publication will enlighten the public mind on these points, and will dispel the erroneous impressions to which ignorance or the attempt at concealment gives rise. Having required the publication of their issues from all banks to which the privilege of issue is continued, I do not propose to carry further the demand for publicity. I do not wish to pry into the affairs of each bank, and above all, I deprecate the taking of delusive securities against mismanagement and abuse. The public will hereafter know the names of the persons by whom banking business is to be conducted, and the public must rely on their own caution and discretion as a security against being injured or defrauded. It has been frequently proposed to require from each bank a periodical publication of its liabilities, its assets, and the state of its transactions generally. But I have seen no form of account which would be at all satisfactory—no form of account which might not be rendered by a bank on the very verge of insolvency, if there were the intention to conceal a desperate state of affairs. The return for instance of "overdrawn accounts" might lead to very erroneous inferences as to the condition of a bank making such a return. A large amount of overdrawn accounts might in one case be indicative of gross mismanagement. It might in another case be perfectly compatible with the security of a bank, acting on the Scotch principle, and making advances at interest to customers in whom the bank had entire confidence. It has been proposed by some that the shares of joint-stock banks should be prohibited below a certain minimum; that there should be no shares of amounts less than £100 or £50, or some fixed amount. But as, under the encouragement of the legislature, banks have been established with £20 and £10 shares, and now exist, and, I believe, in many cases, have conducted their business satisfactorily, it would be harsh to insist on a sudden alteration in the amount of shares in the case of existing banks. Then, again, as to calling on all existing banks to invest a portion of their capital in government securities, I have considered this maturely; but I see great difficulty in the way of forcing upon existing banks any compulsory arrangement of this nature, little prospect of any additional security from loss. As to future companies we have a right to make what regulations we please, and to adopt as to them what we may deem a better principle for their establishment. We propose, then, that no new joint-stock bank of deposit (of course it cannot be one of issue) shall be constituted except upon application to a department of the government for this purpose; that there shall be a registration of the prospectus, a certain amount of paid-up capital, and a limitation as to the nominal amount of each share. We propose also to require that the deed of settlement should be drawn up according to a prescribed form. The deeds at present are drawn up according to no fixed form, and there is great difficulty in ascertaining, by a reference to the deeds of settlement, from their complexity and want of uniformity, what are the powers and liabilities of banks, and what are the regulations under which they act. We expect that new banks will be constituted, conforming to the principles we thus establish; issuing, if they are banks of issue, the paper of the Bank of England, and by their conformity to those principles, establishing claims upon the public confidence. They may, no doubt, interfere with the business and profits of existing banks; but we exclude no existing bank from the power of adapting the new regulations to its own concerns, and we consider that species of interference which arises, not from vexatious intermeddling with the affairs of an existing bank, but from a purification and improvement of the system of banking, to be perfectly legitimate. Having thus stated the proposed regulations as to the other banks, I now revert to the position of the Bank of England, and the relation in which it is to stand to the government. I interrupted my statement as to the bank, because I can make our proposed relations to the bank more intelligible by having first described the regulations applicable to other banking establishments. I have stated that the issue of the banks are to be upon bullion and upon a fixed amount of securities. We propose that £14,000,000 should be that amount of securities. Seeing no advantage in a change, we propose to continue upon the present terms the existing loan of £11,000,000, made by the bank to the government, at 3 per cent. This debt of the government to the bank is to be assigned as part of the security on which the issues of the bank are to take place. There will then remain £3,000,000 of additional securities, Exchequer Bills or other securities, over which the bank are to have entire control. We propose that the Bank should have a right, in case of necessity, to limit its issues upon that portion of the securities, viz. £3,000,000. Circumstances might possibly arise in which the bank might find it necessary to restrict its issues within the amount of £14,000,000. In that case the bank will have full power to diminish the £3,000,000 of securities which are to be deposited in addition to the £11,000,000 of debt assigned. I can hardly conceive a case in which it would be advisable to limit the issues to less than £11,000,000. I have said that the bank shall be restricted from issuing notes upon securities to any greater extent than £14,000,000. This restriction applies, however, to ordinary circumstances, and the present state of the affairs of the bank. The case may occur in which it would be reasonable, and indeed might be necessary, that there should be an increase of the issues of the bank upon securities. Suppose the country circulation to amount to £8,000,000, and of this amount £2,000,000 to be withdrawn, either in consequence of the failure of the banks, or in consequence of agreements with the Bank of England to issue Bank of England paper—in that case, in order to supply the void, it may be necessary that the bank should make an increased issue. A part of this issue may fairly be made upon securities. Our proposal is, that the profit to be derived from such an issue shall be placed to the account of the government; and that no increased issue upon securities shall take place without a communication from the bank to the government, and without the express sanction of three members of the government: the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the President of the Board of Trade. We do not contemplate, and do not intend to provide for, an increased issue upon securities in any other case than that to which I have referred, namely, the supply of a void caused by the withdrawal of some considerable portion of the existing country circulation. Let me here advert to an enactment which passed when the Bank Charter was last continued, which passes by the name of the Legal Tender Clause. It enabled other banks than the Bank of England to pay their notes in notes of the Bank of England, and thus relieved them from the obligation of paying in coin. I opposed this clause at the time, considering it to be at variance with the principle of immediate convertibility. I do not now propose to repeal it, seeing that it has been in operation for several years, and that it may facilitate the substitution of Bank of England notes for the notes of other banks. It may serve to increase the controlling influence of the bank, and to habituate the public to the use of its notes. The consequences either of the continuance or of the repeal of the clause are probably less than is generally supposed. I will now detail the pecuniary engagements made with the bank upon the part of government. The bank is to retain the privilege of issuing notes on securities to the amount of £14,000,000. On an interest of three per cent., the gross gains of the bank upon this total of issue would be £420,000. In estimating the net profits, we must consider the deductions to be made. First, what is the cost of the issue? The bank, for the sake of the public, conducts its issue on a liberal principle. It does not reissue notes; it provides the means of keeping every note issued within ten years; it gives therefore great facilities to the public in the detection of fraud, or the tracing of transactions within that period. The total cost to the bank, on an issue of £20,000,000, has been estimated (by the committee of 1833) at £117,000, but I am inclined to estimate it at about £113,000, which taken from £420,000, leaves £307,000. There is then to be deducted about £60,000 composition with the Stamp Office, for the privilege of issuing notes. There is also about £24,000 paid by the bank to those bankers who undertake to issue Bank of England notes, receiving a commission of one per cent. The result is, after subtracting these items, that there would be a net profit of £220,000 derived from the issuing of notes. What is the sum we are to claim from the bank for continued privileges? The bank think we ought to make a material deduction from the sum fixed when the charter was last renewed, and paid at present, namely, £120,000. But though in some respects we affect the peculiar privileges of the bank, we give to the bank increased control over the paper currency, and increased stability to their banking business. We have, therefore, insisted on an equal payment in future. We have, of course, had negotiations on the subject; and I must, in justice to the gentlemen who have conducted it on the part of the bank (the Governor and deputy Governor,) declare that I never saw men influenced by more disinterested or more public-spirited motives than they have evinced throughout our communications with them. They have reconciled their duties as managers of a great institution, bound to consult the interests of the proprietors, with enlightened and comprehensive views of the public interests. I hope the House will feel that, in the resolutions which I intend to propose, there is nothing to which the bank and the country ought not to accede with readiness. Hitherto the Bank of England has been accustomed to pay to the government a sum of £120,000. I now propose that the bank should, in addition to that sum, pay once for all £60,000, being the amount of fixed annual composition for the issue of its notes, which will bring the entire amount to a sum of £180,000, to be paid annually by the bank. The net profit of the bank, to be derived from the issue of notes, will probably not exceed the sum of £100,000. The House will no doubt bear in mind, that the public pay to the bank an annual sum of £248,000 under the provisions of certain Acts of Parliament, on account of the management, by the bank, of the public debt. From this payment of £248,000 will hereafter be deducted £180,000, leaving the total payment of the public to the bank, on the balance of the two accounts, a sum of £68,000. As to the duration of the Charter, we propose that it should be renewed for a period of twenty-one years, with a power of revision by parliament at the expiration of ten years. We propose, however, a departure from the arrangement made when the Charter was last renewed, in the following respects. Under the existing Charter, the power to revise accrues at the expiration of ten years; but, if the opportunity be not then taken advantage of, the Charter will endure without alteration for a further period of eleven years. We propose that at any time, after the lapse of ten years, there shall be the power of revision; that parliament, for instance, may permit twelve or fifteen years to pass, and may then, should they think fit, revise the Charter of the bank, and its relation to the government. Of Ireland and Scotland I have hitherto made no mention; I propose to reserve for separate legislation the state of the currency of each of those parts of the United Kingdom. The prohibition against the establishment of new banks of issue will extend to them. They, also, will be included in those enactments which will require the performance for the future, of certain conditions preliminary to the formation of new Joint-stock Banks. But I have thought it more prudent to deal, in the first instance, with the issue of promissory notes in England and Wales; to establish certain principles for the regulation of that portion of the circulation; and to leave Ireland and Scotland for future legislation, in respect to their paper currency. That currency stands on a different footing in each country, from that in which it stands in this part of the United Kingdom; and the single measure I have to propose is so extensive, and affects such numerous and powerful interests, that I have been unwilling to encumber it with enactments requiring separate consideration, or to cloud the prospects of success, by having to encounter too powerful a combination of opponents. It will be remembered that to banks in Ireland and Scotland, the law permits the issue of notes of a less value than five pounds, and that in Scotland there is no single bank partaking of the character of the Bank of England. In Ireland there is the Bank of Ireland, with privileges somewhat similar to the Bank of England; but, on the whole, the circumstances of the two countries are so far different, that I should be unwilling to propose any measure affecting the circulation either of Scotland or Ireland, without the opportunity of much more mature consideration than it has been in the power of the government to give to this branch of the subject. Permit me, before I conclude, briefly to recapitulate the outlines of the plan recommended by her Majesty's servants. It is proposed that the Bank of England shall continue in possession of its present privileges—that it shall retain the exclusive right of issue, within a district of which sixty-five miles from London as a centre is the radius. The private banks within that district, which now actually issue notes, will, of course, be permitted to continue their issues to the amount of the average of the last two years. Two departments of the bank will be constituted: one for the issue of notes, the other for the transaction of the ordinary business of banking. The bullion now in the possession of the bank will be transferred to the Issue Department. The issue of notes will be restricted to an issue of £14,000,000 upon securities—the remainder being issued upon bullion—and governed in amount by the fluctuations in the stock of bullion. If there be, under certain defined circumstances, an increase of the issues of securities, it can only take place with the knowledge and consent of the government; and the profit derivable from such issue will belong to the public. Bankers now actually enjoying the privilege of issue, will be allowed to continue their issues, provided the maximum in the case of each bank does not exceed the average of a certain prescribed period. A weekly publication of issues will be required from every bank of issue. The names of shareholders and partners in all banks will be registered and published. No new bank of issue can be hereafter formed, and no Joint-stock company for banking purposes can be established, except after application to the government, and compliance with various regulations which will be hereafter submitted to the consideration of parliament. I have now concluded the duty which I have to perform, and trust I have clearly explained to the House the principles and details of the plan which the government proposes for the future regulation of the currency, and the grounds upon which it is founded. I ask for no vote to-night on the resolutions which I shall propose pro formâ, and, if I might give advice on such a subject, would recommend the postponement of discussion to a future day. To-morrow the correspondence which has taken place with the bank, explaining more in detail our communications with the bank, and the nature of the pecuniary arrangements between the bank and the government, will be laid upon the table. The knowledge of that correspondence is important as a preliminary to full and satisfactory discussion on the merits of our proposal. Considering the part which I took in the year 1819 in terminating the system of inconvertible paper currency, and in re-establishing the ancient standard of value, it will no doubt be a source of great personal satisfaction to me, if I shall now succeed, after the lapse of a quarter of a century since those measures were adopted, in obtaining the assent of the House to proposals which are, in fact, the complement of them, and which are calculated to guarantee their permanence, and to facilitate their practical operation. But my gratification will be of a higher and purer nature than any connected with the satisfaction of personal feelings, if I may look forward to the mitigation or termination of evils, such as those which have at various times afflicted the country in consequence of rapid fluctuation in the amount and value of the medium of exchange. When I call to mind the danger to which the Bank of England has been exposed, the various effects of a sudden change from an overabundant to a contracted circulation, the reckless speculation of some of the Joint-stock Banks, the losses entailed on their shareholders, the insolvency of so many private banks, the miserable amount of the dividends which have in many cases been paid, the ruin inflicted on innocent creditors, the shock to public and private credit, then indeed I rejoice, on public grounds, in the hope, that the wisdom of parliament will at length devise measures which shall inspire just confidence in the medium of exchange, shall put a check on improvident speculations, and shall ensure, so far as legislation can ensure, the just reward of industry, and the legitimate profit of commercial enterprise conducted with integrity, and controlled by provident calculation. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving—"That it is expedient to continue to the Bank of England, for a time to be limited, certain of the privileges now by law vested in that corporation, subject to such conditions as may be provided by any Act to be passed for that purpose."

Resolution agreed to pro formâ, and the House resumed. Committee to sit again.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN FACTORIES.

MAY 13, 1844.

This bill having been read a third time, Lord Ashley rose, and moved the addition of the clause of which he had given notice, limiting the hours of labour of young persons in factories to eleven hours per day, up to October 1847, and to ten hours per day after that period.

The clause was brought up and read the first time. On the question, "That the said clause be read a second time," a very long discussion ensued, towards the close of which—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said—I am certainly very sorry to trouble the House at this hour of the morning; but I do think it is of great importance that we should come to some decision on the subject without much further protraction of the discussion; and I think, at the same time, that I should abandon the duty which I have to perform in this House, if I did not state, without reserve and without hesitation, the strong opinions which I entertain upon the bill now under consideration. The question for the House to decide is, shall we at this early period curtail factory labour to the extent of two hours a day?—that is the question. Of what avail is it to taunt us with a violation of principle? If necessary, the House may reject our proposition, but what vindication is it of you that you alter our alleged violation of principle from twelve hours to ten? You say that her Majesty's government have committed an error in proposing a twelve hours' clause, and you say that that error shall justify you in interfering with adult labour. Now, for the present I will put the question of principle altogether aside, and I will discuss the matter with you as a question of degree; but I tell you first that we, the government, have arrived at the utmost limit to which we can go in a case of this kind—we have reached the utmost extent to which we can agree to limit the labour of adults. At the same time, remember that our error, if we have committed one, will be no vindication of you for adopting an impolitic measure. Prove me wrong if you can, but do not taunt me with doing that which you have done yourselves; for you have violated principle just as much as we have. Again, I recur to the question which the House has to decide—is it politic, or is it not, to limit the hours of labour in factories to ten? As I before said, I will discuss this with you as a question of degree; and, in such a discussion, I should be glad to learn what is the advantage of referring to the Corn-laws? If you ask me what I think of the Corn-laws, I am prepared to state my opinions; but why in the present discussion tell us that we are inconsistent because we maintain the Corn-laws? Granted that we maintain a restriction upon corn, how can that justify you for imposing other restrictions upon the manufactures of the country? Take either branch of the dilemma, and you must find yourselves equally embarrassed. Agree with us that the Corn-laws happen to be justified by the peculiar circumstances of the country, and then you cannot with any consistency be favourable to the imposition of any such restriction as this ten hours' clause. Say, on the other hand, that the Corn-laws ought to be removed, and how can you consistently set them free and impose restrictions upon any other branch of trade? How can you restrict labour if you set free commerce? How do you reconcile the one or the other with justice? You tell us that the extent of your interference is very trifling, that it only goes the length of two hours in the work of the day; but have you forgotten that in all these cases there is a vast machine at work; that in fixing the employment of adult males you limit the labour of the machine? The factories at present employ the power of about 100,000 horses. The quantity of goods exported amounts to £51,000,000. Now, in the present bill, it is proposed to deal with £35,000,000 of exports. We have a steam-engine power equal to 100,000 horses. This power gives employment to 450,000 persons, and I will state the grounds of this calculation. In the year 1839, the horse-power employed in machinery was estimated upon good authority at rather below 97,000, and the persons employed in connection with that machinery at 430,000, being four and a half persons for each horse-power. Since that time there has been a considerable increase in the amount of machinery employed, which probably would justify us in fixing the present amount at 100,000 horse-power, and this would give a proportionate increase in the number of persons employed, which fixes them at about 450,000. Of these persons the average weekly wages is 10s. Taking the children and men one with another, the average weekly wages cannot be less than 10s., which gives a gross weekly payment of £225,000 for factory labour, paid to 450,000 persons. But what says the hon. member for Lambeth upon this point? He said that we could not get at the number; and that even if we did it would hardly prove considerable, compared with the whole population. [Mr. Hawes: What I stated was simply in answer to the statements of the right hon. baronet, the Home Secretary, that the account must be considered in reference to the whole population.] But what I say is, that this limitation of the hours of labour in factories to ten, is no test of the degree in which the measure will interfere with the manufacturers and with the labourers generally of the country. In our factories an immense amount of power in machinery is employed, which must be governed and controlled by a directing mind, and therefore, by your interference, you do not merely contract the manual labour of a few men, you limit the operations of mind, and of that wonderful machinery which assists in the production of articles intended both for the home and foreign market. But even the number of persons employed in immediate connection with the machine that you throw out of labour is not the whole consideration. When you throw a certain number of factory labourers out of occupation, you take away employment from a much greater number than if you legislated to the same extent upon an equal number of persons engaged in spade husbandry. Prohibit the use of one spade, and only one individual loses his work, but how many are thrown into idleness by the stoppage of a single steam engine—a power 1,000 times as great as that of a single spade, or any other simple instrument? In looking at a question of this kind, we must look at all the incidents of the case; we must remember that in changing the hours of labour from twelve to ten, we are dealing with an amount of weekly wages of not less than £225,000, and the effect of this is to lay a tax upon labour of not less than 16½ per cent. It is an income-tax upon the poor man of 16½ per cent., when you deny him a command over his own labour, and say he shall work only ten hours, instead of twelve. That 16½ per cent. amounts to £36,000 of weekly wages to be deducted from the gross sum of £225,000. That, however, is not the whole amount of the loss, for 16½ per cent. does not cover the whole sum; fixed capital will suffer by your proposed change in a corresponding degree, and the manufacturer to compensate himself will still further reduce wages, and, looking at the amount thus deducted from the retail trade, I beg the House to contemplate for a moment the effect of such a measure as this upon a single mill in Manchester. The case of this mill is a fair test of what may be the probable effect of this measure upon other establishments. The owners of this mill hold their water-power upon lease. They never contemplated such an interference as the present, they have no clause in their lease to protect them from the interference of parliament, and what are they now to do with all their arrangements and liabilities founded upon the basis of the existing law? In that mill they at present work twelve hours a-day. There are 475 persons employed in it, of whom 119 are adult males; the remaining number, 356, would have their hours of labour also curtailed; and why should all this take place?—for the purpose of improving the social condition of the people employed in that mill. Let the House only look at the state of health of the persons employed in that mill. Out of 475, only seven are absent on account of illness. That is to say, that only one in 68 is incapacitated on account of illness, being $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the 475. Of the whole thus employed, 259 reside in Manchester, and 216 of the number have been attracted to that establishment: they have been allured to it by a high rate of wages, and they have been toiling during a period of prosperity in trade, to make a provision which shall guard them against the evils of poverty in old age. You tell these poor people that they are not to make the most of their labour while they can, and then you tell me that the prohibition is for their physical comfort, their moral improvement, and their social happiness. I admit freely, that our first consideration ought to be the moral habits of our people. But let us now observe the effect of the restrictions of factory labour upon other descriptions of labour not immediately connected with factory labour. I was told the other night that I ought not to refer to the trades connected with the working of metals—that I have no right to say that the labour there is more oppressive, and the labourers more entitled to interference and protection, because it is said that with those trades parliament would interfere if it could; but let us observe the effect upon other branches of industry, indirectly connected with factory labour. I am now discussing the question upon the moral and social view—keeping the commercial view of the subject entirely apart, and out of consideration for the present. Now, what effect will a tax upon machinery to the amount of 16 per cent.—that very tax for which all along the hand-loom weavers have been contending—what effect will it have upon hand-labour? The hand-loom weavers have always been saying, “See how we are affected by machinery—it destroys our trade—it ruins ourselves and families—impose a tax upon it, that we may have a chance of a fair competition.” Now, that is the very thing that you are going to do. You are about to give a stimulus to the hand-loom weavers—but their condition has occupied your attention, you have appointed committees of the House to consider that condition, you have established commissions, and you have sent down sub-commissioners, to examine evidence upon the spot. The effect of your measure will no doubt be, to give to that trade a short-lived prosperity; but, by affording this premium, are you advancing the morality, or the social comforts, of the labouring people of the country? You have evidence upon the point. The hand-loom weavers exist, in different parts, in great numbers. They have been languishing hitherto, and nothing but a tax upon machinery could give them even a short-lived chance of success. Here is the report of the commissioners. Now, first, as to the number of hours. You complain of twelve hours’ labour in factories. What is the number you find stated here, as the common hours of the hand-loom weavers, which, mark, you cannot control, unless you admit the right of interference in every individual house, and upon every individual loom? With reference to this class of operatives, Mr. Muggerridge reports:—“I am of opinion that the ordinary hours of labour of the weaver, when work is attainable, may be estimated, on the average, at fourteen daily. I think the weavers wait for, or are out of work, about one-fourth of their time, on an average of years. In the township of Briercliffe with Entwistle, in this neighbourhood, Mr. James Smith of Haggate, stated—‘Our tenants are nearly all weavers. There has been no payment of rents for the last two half-yearly rent days, in our township, and a third is fast approaching.’ In a survey of this township, I found 171 families of weavers, numbering 968 persons, and possessing 606 looms, all then employed. Their gross earnings for the week were £85 : 16 : 6, or 10s. $0\frac{1}{2}$ d. per family, from which, it was alleged, £30 : 4 : 10 must be deducted for expenses, giving net 6s. 6d. per family, on an average of $3\frac{1}{2}$ looms to each family.”

You don't attempt to interfere with this description of labour, because you feel it would be impossible, unless you establish a system of domestic inquisition throughout every house wherein the business is carried on. True it is, they are without work three or four months in the year. Mr. Hickson, a competent authority on this subject, states, that—"Weaving, as a domestic occupation, among the hand-loom cotton-weavers, is carried on in circumstances more prejudicial to health, and at a greater sacrifice of personal comfort, than weaving in any other branch. The great majority of hand-loom cotton-weavers work in cellars, sufficiently light to enable them to throw the shuttle, but cheerless, because seldom visited by the sun. The reason that cellars are chosen, is because cotton requires to be woven damp. The air, therefore, must be cool and moist, instead of warm and dry. Unhappily, the medium which might be preserved, without injury to the constitution, and which is preserved in the best power-loom factories, the impoverished hand-loom cotton-weavers are obliged often to disregard. I have seen them working in cellars dug out of an undrained swamp; the streets formed by their houses, without sewers, and flooded with rain; the water, therefore, running down the bare walls of the cellars, and rendering them unfit for the abode of dogs or rats. It is difficult to imagine a darker picture; and it may surprise the denouncers of our factory system, to find all the vices and miseries which they attribute to it flourishing so rankly, in the midst of a population, not only beyond the walls of a factory, but also beyond the contamination of a large town. Still more, that these vices and miseries decline, as the population emerges from the condition, which might have been fondly anticipated to be one of rural innocence and happiness, to be a town, and factory population. For the single-hand trade of the country, not only exhibits the greatest demoralisation at home, but helps to fill the criminal calendars of neighbouring counties."

So I say, that I doubt the policy of discouraging the factories, if the consequence be to give a premium to a trade more immoral, more oppressive, and less productive. Now, allow me shortly to refer to the arguments by which this measure is attempted to be sustained. I will simply state them, and will not introduce one superfluous word, in giving what I consider to be a sufficient answer to each. First, then, it is stated, that by limiting the number of hours to ten, as much work will be done as with twelve hours' labour—that there will be such an exercise of animal spirit and strength, on the part of the labourer, as more than to compensate for the difference in time. That is the statement, and I believe it to be an assumption entirely without foundation. As the hon. gentleman says, it might be true of manual labour, but, with regard to the work done by machinery, I cannot help thinking that it is quite impossible. I have had an opportunity of knowing the actual amount of work performed in a factory, in which the mill happened, for a time, to be in operation for only ten hours. The account was kept without any reference to the present question, and I think it affords a good indication of the general results of ten hours' labour. From March to July, 1842, a period of fifteen weeks, the mill was worked for twelve hours, for five days, and the usual time upon the Saturday. After that time, it was compelled to work five-sixths of the time—ten hours, instead of twelve, during five days. Now, the average weekly produce, when the time of working was twelve hours a day, was 119,000 hanks of cotton. According to the difference in the time of labour, the proportionate amount produced under the ten to that produced under the twelve hours would be 99,574 hanks. You argue, however, that a greater quantity will actually be produced, in consequence of the increased strength and spirits of the men; but, in this case, the fact was, that less was produced; that the actual amount produced, was only 99,172 hanks, being an amount, nearly corresponding to the proportion with time, but rather under than over the proportion. I have the greatest confidence in that statement, and to me it seems a convincing proof that your assumption of the produce of ten hours labour, being nearly equal to the produce of twelve hours' labour, is entirely without foundation. Another argument very much relied upon, put forward in a manner which shows that it is considered quite conclusive on the subject, is shortly this—it has been repeated in every night's debate, and seems very popular—it is said, that "which is morally wrong, cannot be politically right." This is a sort of saying, which is very much admired in certain quarters. [Lord Ashley: Hear.] But, all the arguments in the House ought to be submitted to the test of reason, and my noble friend must not be offended, if

I claim the privilege of submitting his argument to the same test. "That which is morally wrong, is not politically right." That is the principle, but what is the meaning of it? What is the meaning of that argument? I can understand it in reference to some enormous act of injustice or of aggression, as in the case of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, or the partition of Poland; but I wish to know, does it mean that I am bound to interfere by law with that which I feel to be morally wrong? If so, I distinctly say that such is not the true principle of legislation. I may be, as perhaps I shall be, denounced for holding this doctrine; but I shall be utterly regardless of such denouncement, and shall proceed fearless to examine the principle. I will show you there are many things which I know to be morally wrong, with which neither I nor you can interfere in the way of legislation; for instance, intemperance—envy, are great moral offences. Both, though convinced that they are wrong, I tolerate them, because I am also convinced they are not within the sphere of legislation. However grave the offence against morality, the Legislature attempts to strike a balance, and see whether the attempt to interfere would not be more prejudicial than connivance. But who is to decide the question of an act being immoral? or how am I to apply the rule of interference? In a despotic country the adoption of such a principle might lead to justify any atrocity. The inquisition itself could be defended upon this principle, for it only attempted to put down what it deemed morally wrong by the exercise of power. But in this case, where I admit that we ought to consult that which is for the lasting benefit of the people—for the advancement of morality and not for the increase of wealth—are we not left free to determine whether the means you propose will produce that end—whether those means are or are not morally right? In that sense I deny, Sir, that we are perpetrating a wrong in legislating for twelve hours' labour a day. Some go, however, further, and how am I to deal with these who advocate eight hours a day? The hon. member for Oldham (Mr. Fielden) says, "Restrict labour in factories to eight hours, there is no use in carrying it to ten; ten hours' labour of a female, perhaps pregnant, perhaps having a large family, will leave no sufficient time for the performance of domestic duties—your measure is incomplete, extend it to eight hours." Will those who contend for this simple rule, that what is morally wrong can't be politically right, vote for a motion of the hon. gentleman for restricting the period of female labour to eight hours a-day? He says that for them to work more is morally wrong; and if hon. gentlemen don't vote for it, are not they precisely in the same difficulty that I am, who object to the limitation of twelve hours? Certainly it would be much more agreeable to me to see women working ten hours than twelve; but balancing the evils of the interference with the good, seeing on the one hand a diminution of wages, on the other a risk of the loss of commerce, I fear that in a short time there would not be occupation for the productive industry of the country. I prefer twelve hours to ten upon that ground—not abstractedly, but upon a large and comprehensive view of the subject. Why, if you apply the same argument in opposition to the bill of him who asks you to limit the hours of labour to eight instead of ten, you admit that that great rule of legislation, that "that which is morally wrong cannot be politically right," constitutes no rule to act on; and that is the only way to test the proposal of my noble friend. I say that affords no safe rule for legislation. We meet you at once on the abstract question. Not that we like to see women labouring twelve hours, but because we doubt whether we should not be doing more that is morally wrong, by curtailing the labour and diminishing the wages and the comforts of the labourers, than by positively permitting them to work the twelve hours, which they may do now. The noble lord opposite (Lord Howick) vindicated his vote on commercial views, and I was rather surprised at the views which he took of the moral and social bearings of the question. I thought he would have said, that he was for the principle of non-interference, but that this was an exception to his principles of political economy; and I was surprised to hear him attempt to vindicate his vote by those novel views of political economy and foreign trade with which he favoured the House. If I understood the noble lord rightly, he is of opinion that it was a matter of no great importance whether or not we are able to undersell the Americans in the Chinese market. I always thought that the more cheaply you could produce an article of manufacture as compared with another competing power, the more it was for your advantage, and that if you could command a greater quantity of the produce of another country—be it tea, cotton, or sugar—at a less sacrifice than they could be purchased by a third power, it would be a great advantage to you. But the noble lord has a doctrine that, because America wants tea, and levies no duty on it, it is therefore of no consequence on what terms we meet the Americans in the Chinese market. I do not understand the noble lord. I know that this is a great crisis in the commerce of that country. I know that America has been sending goods in large quantities to China, and that the Chinese have preference for English goods, and that a great rivalry and contest for supremacy exist, and I should, therefore, have thought that if, under such circumstances, England could have undersold America, it would, according to the doctrines of common sense and the received opinions of writers on political economy, have been a great advantage to us. The noble lord's views of foreign trade were rather peculiar. According to him, the extent of the foreign trade depends on the amount of the articles of importation for which you have a demand in your own country. But on what does this demand in your own country depend? Does it not depend on the profits of trade, on the accumulation of capital, and on the savings of industry? If I can save more money and make more profit by working for twelve hours instead of ten, shall I not be able to command a greater quantity of the commodities of other countries? If I produce an article more cheaply, accumulate more capital, and make more profit, is it not clear that I shall have a greater command of foreign articles? And therefore it is, that I cannot reconcile the doctrines of the noble lord as to foreign trade, with what appears to be the doctrines which have prevailed on foreign trade from the days of Adam Smith to the present moment. The noble lord says, "import as much as you can." I say, export as much as you can. The noble lord thinks that profits depend entirely on imports, and that imports ensure exports. But I say the profits depend on exports; that exports ensure imports, for you cannot export without importing something equivalent; therefore, I say that the novel doctrine of the noble lord has no foundation whatever; that foreign trade is a matter of barter, and that the policy of import and export stands on precisely the same foundation. I am, therefore, not at all disposed to agree to a ten hours' bill, by the novel theories which the noble lord advanced the other night, and which were so very peculiar and not well understood. I admit that I am afraid of foreign competition, and that the danger will be increased by the restriction on the hours of labour which you now propose. We have had a long peace—industry has been unfettered, and a disposition has been felt in all countries to seek for employment in manufacturing industry. There is a prospect of a continuance of that peace. There is a tendency to equalise the profits on all trades in this country. There is a similar tendency throughout the world. You thought it advisable to forego the advantage which your skill in machinery gave you exclusively. You had the command of iron and coal, and you did not abandon your advantage through generosity of feelings of disinterestedness, but because you could retain your exclusive possession of machinery no longer. You might keep the machines, perhaps, but you could not keep the men who made them. You had found that though you could prevent the export of whole machines, yet you could not prevent the exportation of the models, or of the machinery in parts. There was an attempt at the Custom House to prevent the export of the machinery, but all was in vain—machinery went out. That deprived you of the nominal advantage which you possessed as to machinery, and made you liable to be undersold by the rest of the world. There is a work written by a Belgian gentleman, Monsieur Ducpetiaux, a member of a commission charged to propose a projet de loi to regulate the labour of young persons. I cannot, of course, be certain of the accuracy of all his details, but this is his account of the hours of labour in different countries. He professes to take them from a French work, published in 1837. Different regulations may have been published since, but the work states the number of hours of labour per week to be, in the United States 78; France 72 to 84; Prussia 72 to 90; Switzerland 78 to 84; Austria 72 to 80; Tyrol 78 to 80; Saxony 72; Baden 84; Bonn 94; and in England 69, being less in England than in any other competing country in Europe. We have permitted the exportation of machines—we have already less of weekly labour than any other country, and yet now it is proposed that those 69 hours should be reduced to 58. I do think that is a most serious matter, and it requires statements of facts of a most unquestionable character, and arguments of the most cogent description to justify such an experiment. As it has been very truly said, we are now recovering from the depression of four disastrous years; during which we have had an opportunity of watching the effect of a forced limitation of the hours of labour. We have seen what it was to leave persons in the possession of time for which they had not a demand—we have seen the moral and social evils it produced; there is now a revival in trade; but with that revival in trade, you seek to dispirit competition by a legislative restriction of the hours of labour. New markets are opened, but in those new markets we meet competing rivals. We have to labour for several hours less in the week than any other country; and not satisfied with that, and as if we were not satisfied with the experience of the last four years, when manufacturing prosperity is returning, we don't permit six months to elapse before we try to reduce our amount of labour from sixty-nine hours per week to fifty-eight. I do earnestly and sincerely deprecate such interference. Are the facts which have been stated to be relied on? They made a great impression when stated; and when it was said that young females were compelled to walk (in addition to mental toil) from twenty to twenty-seven or twenty-eight miles a-day, it had great influence on the House and on the public; but if it be not so, don't let the original impression remain, and induce you to make this perilous experiment. Thirty-seven miles. Sir, I have from certain circumstances of my life some knowledge of factories, and I declare it as my conviction that such a distance, even as an extreme case, must be utterly impossible. Nay, taking it at twenty, I believe such never was the distance. I have the strongest impression upon my mind that no person ever walked that distance in a factory in one day. I have seen calculations made, in which I have much greater confidence than in others, and my firm impression is, that the maximum of possible distance is twelve miles in the course of the twelve hours—(I was surprised to see it stated even so high)—and I believe the average to be from eight to nine miles; but I am convinced it is capable of demonstration, that, taking all ordinary data, it is impossible that the distance should exceed a mile per hour. Whether or not a certain degree of walking may or may not be beneficial to the artisan is matter for inquiry. A moderate degree of labour I should think accompanying factory labour renders it more healthy, certainly, than that of the hand-loom weaver. Of course it must be limited; but, at all events, restricted to eight miles in the course of the day, I do not consider it can be prejudicial to health. But as to those impressions which have been founded on the statement made, that the number of miles trodden by the factory children per day is eighteen or twenty, I think it clear that those impressions are erroneous, and that those impressions which may have guided some gentlemen on former occasions ought not to influence them in giving their vote this night. To show the straits to which some men are driven in vindication of their votes, I need only refer to the statement made by an hon. member last night, that gentleman being a member (of all places in the world) for Birmingham, whose prosperity depends upon the demand in the foreign markets for its production; and that hon. gentleman, feeling it difficult to deny that the consequence of this interference must be to raise the price of the manufactured article, to diminish the demand, and curtail our export trade, he, with a practical knowledge of business, not content with the facts which were stated, got up and told us in his vindication, and said, "Very true it may be that it will injure our foreign trade, and that is now hardly worth having;—what would the country suffer if we lost it?" When we have a statement of that kind from an hon. gentleman who represents a great commercial and manufacturing town like Birmingham—is not the statement of the hon. member that if our foreign trade were ruined the country would not suffer—is not that statement enough and sufficient to awaken our minds to the unsoundness of his argument? Some hon. gentlemen, I think the hon. member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), and the hon. member for Weymouth (Mr. R. Bernal), complained of her Majesty's government for offering an opposition to the motion of my noble friend. The hon. member for Weymouth said we could not deal with men as we could with chessmen, that we would not apply that principle to the laws of political economy. The hon. member for Finsbury tells us to give way in time; that these men who are employed are determined to resist the proposition for twelve hours' labour, and that the sooner we capitulate the better; that their wish is to have ten hours' labour per day, and that a Ten Hours' Bill they will have. Sir, I deeply regret to hear an argument of this kind raised by a gentleman of the experience and authority of the hon. member for Weymouth, denying as he does the great principles of all our legislation in respect to the employment of capital, and which ought to be the sound principles of political economy; that is to say, the principles of wisdom matured by experience. I say, I deeply regret to hear hon. gentlemen abjure those as the leading principles; for, depend upon it, that will be a bad system if they take popular feeling and the popular will as the guides to legislation. If we are to concede now to those demands upon the ground that it is the promulgated wish and feeling of the people, and that they are the best judges of their own case, and of what constitutes their interests, will hon. gentlemen tell me how long it will be before similar appeals will be made, and when, proceeding on the same principle, much larger concessions will be demanded? I fear the interval will be short; indeed, the ground has already been laid for fresh demands. Here is an address of a body of men—I allude to "the miners' association of Great Britain and Ireland"—and they briefly state the nature of their demands; and, surely, acting on the principle which has been laid down, we ought to accede to these demands, because these people wish us to do so. And if the presumption be correct that these people are best acquainted with their own interests, clearly after they shall have established this precedent for concession, we shall have no alternative but to make further concessions. This is "the address of the turned-out miners of Claycross to a sympathising public." They state their grievances, and then set forth the remedy which they propose in these terms:—

"Having thus stated a few of our grievances, we now lay before you those boons we ask, yea, we would say demand, as a redress of those grievances. First, we wish to work eight hours per day, and no more. Secondly, we wish to receive 4s. per day. Thirdly, we wish to receive our wages weekly. Fourthly, we wish to be united for our protection.

"Friends and fellow-countrymen, we now appeal to your sympathies, and ask you in the name of justice, whether, to be buried in caverns of the earth, inhaling the most obnoxious air for eight hours a day, be not long enough?"

Whatever is morally wrong cannot be politically right. The united colliers however proceed—

"We ask you whether we are exorbitant in our demands, when we ask 4s. for eight hours' toil, hewing from the bowels of the earth so useful a commodity as coals, our lives always being in the most imminent danger, every moment threatening us with the most horrible death, and no provision whatever being made for our wives and children except the cold bastille.

"Fellow-countrymen, we feel confident that when you have read this (which is but a shadow of our grievances), you will be ready to render us that support which the urgency of our case demands at your hands, and that you will likewise be ready to acknowledge that we are no way exorbitant in our demands.

"THE TURNED-OUT COLLIERIES."

This is the address to a sympathising public; and upon the same principle on which we are now asked to legislate, I contend it ought to be presumed these persons are the best judges of their own interest; so, on the same principle, you ought to concede the point, that men ought not to be confined at work in the bowels of the earth—that they should not labour more than eight hours a-day, and that four shillings a-day ought to be their reward. But I believe that nothing could be more injurious to the best interests of these people than an acquiescence in their demands. I will not act upon the presumption that they are better judges of their interests than the legislature; and I will not abandon them because they demand these things. It would be no vindication to us to say, that we acted in communion with the feelings of those who raised these demands. No, Sir,

"Everture domos totas optantibus ipsa Di facies."

Or, as it has been happily paraphrased—

When vengeance listens to the rash request.”

But vengeance will not arise. Our duty is to take a comprehensive view of all the great interests, commercial, political, social, and moral, of all classes of this great empire. It is a maxim of distributive justice, a maxim of law, a technical rule, in the administration of justice—“volenti non fit injuria”—that injury cannot be done to him who consents to it; but you, devoted to perform the duties of watching the welfare of a great country, you cannot act upon that principle. And it cannot be a greater proof of your possessing attributes appropriate to the duties of legislation, that you reverse the maxim “volenti non fit injuria,” and you tell the people, “We will resist your wishes in order to promote your welfare.” “We will discharge the duty assigned to us, on account of our being able to take a more comprehensive and more beneficent view than you are.” I protest, then, against the doctrine, that we are to concede because it is the popular will. If we are satisfied that it is not for the popular interests, then it is our painful but necessary duty to resist. If this House be of a different opinion—if you are satisfied that you must make this great experiment on labour—or if you think concession is inevitable, and that you must give way to the wishes and feelings of the people—be it so! But if you take that course, and if you resolve (as you cannot but do in consistency) to pursue it, you must—I say it with all respect—you must do so under other auspices, and under guides who can trace a clearer and a better way than can the present administration. The noble lord says that we ought not to attach so much importance to this question, that it is a question not of principle but of degree; that the majority will be composed of conflicting elements, and that we ought not, therefore, to insist upon acting on our own opinions. I say, that attaching the importance we do to this question, and foreseeing its results, it is our duty in this case to act upon, and to enforce our opinions. There is no other way in which we can avert that which we believe to be a serious evil. It may be that, by the combination to which the noble lord refers, you may succeed; but there are occasions when it is the duty of a government to refuse to be the instruments of carrying into effect the decisions of such combinations. I believe this to be one of those cases. I know not what the result may be this night; but this I know, that I shall, with a perfectly safe conscience, if the result be unfavourable to my views, retire with perfect satisfaction into a private station, wishing well to the result of your legislation, but for myself prepared to pursue that more rugged but not inglorious path of duty—prepared to resist concessions which, though popular, I believe to be injurious, and to consult the public interest at the expense of popular favour.

The House divided on the question, that the clause be read a second time:—Ayes, 159; Noes, 297; majority, 138. Bill passed.

BANK CHARTER—THE CURRENCY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in moving the Order of the Day for the House going into Committee on the Bank of England Charter Acts, said: Sir, I should feel very unwilling to interpose any observations of mine, before the commencement of the discussion on the resolutions which I am about to move, and would content myself with moving at present, that the House do agree to those resolutions, if I did not think it would be for the convenience of many members who are likely to take a part in the discussion, and for the benefit of the discussion itself, that I should make some explanations on particular points, with respect to which, I think it probable that questions will be asked. I, therefore, think it better to anticipate many of those questions and give to them in a connected form the answers which I must give separately, if they are separately put. It was necessary, as the House will bear in mind, for her majesty's government to frame their measure, and for me, as the organ of that government, to make the statement which I submitted on the 6th of May, without the advantage of communicating with parties whose opinions on such a measure as that which we proposed were justly entitled to great weight. Entire secrecy, however, in all matters calculated to affect the currency, was absolutely necessary; and, however much we might feel disposed to confide in the honour and integrity of many individuals, yet, we thought it advisable to forego the advantage of private communications; and, having formed our opinion on the evidence taken by committees and public documents within our control, to submit our views to parliament. If, after the public explanation of these views, and after the opportunity afforded to us of hearing the opinions of others, we had seen reason to modify our own, we should have no hesitation in doing so. But nothing has occurred during the interval which has elapsed which induces her majesty's government to vary, in its leading principles, the plan announced by me on the 6th of May. There are, however, points of detail, in respect to which I have explanations to give and modifications to propose. I will first refer to that part of the plan which concerns the Bank of England and its connection with the government. The House will no doubt recollect, that when I proposed the plan on the 6th of May, I suggested to the House, that it might be desirable that the Bank of England should make its issues upon securities and upon bullion,—partly on the one and partly on the other; that the amount of securities on which issues should be made should be limited to £14,000,000, and that the remainder of the issues of the bank should take place on bullion alone, the amount of that additional circulation being subject to the influence of the exchanges. At the same time, I foresaw a case in which it might be consistent with the principle of the proposed measure, and in which it should be perfectly legitimate, that the Bank of England should add to its issue upon securities. Assuming the circulation of the joint-stock banks and of the country banks to be about £8,000,000 at the present time, it is possible, either through the occasional failure of some of these establishments, or from the voluntary liquidation of their accounts, or in consequence of an agreement with the Bank of England, that some portion of their existing circulation may be discontinued. Suppose the country circulation to be £8,000,000, and that in consequence of voluntary agreements or other causes it should be diminished by one-half, to £4,000,000; in that case, it might be perfectly fit that the Bank of England, in order to supply the void thus created, should issue Bank of England notes, and that that issue should in part take place upon securities. I proposed originally, that the Bank of England should not be permitted to increase its issues upon securities except after communication made to the government, and with the consent of three members of the government—the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the President of the Board of Trade. I did not reserve that power of increasing the issues upon securities, from any distrust of the great principles which I laid down; I did not propose that power of interference on the part of the government in order to meet any possible, but unforeseen contingencies; but in order to meet bona fide, a particular case; namely, the cessation by issue by banks other than the Bank of England. On consideration of that part of the plan, I think it would be advisable, if possible, to prevent all direct interference in this matter on the part of the executive government. At the same time, I do not think it would be advisable to give to the bank an absolute power by law to increase its circulation upon securities, in every case of the withdrawal of country notes without exception. I can foresee cases wherein a void may be created in the country circulation, without a corresponding necessity for an increased issue upon securities. Take the case at present: the bank is possessed of a great amount of bullion, not less than £16,000,000. The banking department of the Bank of England will be possessed of not less than £30,000,000 of bank-notes, £14,000,000 issued on securities, and £16,000,000 on bullion; a great proportion of these bank-notes will necessarily lie dormant in the coffers of the banking department, because it is not probable that more than £22,000,000 can be made available for the supply of the legitimate demands of commerce. Supposing then a void to be created (in the county of Cornwall for instance), a void of, say £200,000, by the withdrawal of country notes from circulation, I am not at all prepared to say that the Bank of England ought at once to increase its issue of notes upon securities. Why should not the country banks apply for some portion of the dormant notes in the Bank of England to supply this void, receiving from the bank a per centage on the issue of Bank of England notes? If it should be desirable to issue fresh notes on securities, then the bank should have the means of issuing them; but I do not think it advisable that, under all circumstances, the supply of the void should be provided for by the increase of issue on securities. I propose to reconcile these two objects in a manner which appears to me unexceptionable, avoiding any direct interference on the part of the executive. I propose, in the preamble of the clause, to recite distinctly what are the grounds which, in the opinion of parliament, will justify an increased issue by the bank on securities; these are, the failure of a country bank, the voluntary withdrawal by a country bank of its issues, or an undertaking by a country bank to abolish its own circulation upon the condition of being supplied with Bank of England notes. The recital of this in the preamble will manifest the intentions of parliament. I propose, then, that the bank, if it should desire to make an increased issue of notes upon securities, should not be allowed to do so except upon permission given by her Majesty in council, such permission to be published immediately afterwards in the London Gazette. I prefer this course to giving the bank an absolute power, at its own unfettered discretion, to increase its issue of notes upon securities. I am certain that, while the present management of the bank continues, that power would not be unduly taken advantage of; but still it is advisable to guard against the possibility of abuse. I propose, therefore, not to permit the increase of securities except with the sanction of the privy council, and except, also, on the express condition that the amount of additional securities shall not exceed two-thirds of the amount of issue, the remainder of the issue taking place upon bullion. There is another point of great importance connected with the issues of the Bank of England, to which I did not direct the attention of the House on the last occasion. The question is, what shall be the definition of "bullion," as the foundation of issue? Shall the bank be required to issue notes upon gold coin or gold bullion alone? or shall the bank be permitted to issue notes in exchange for silver as well as gold? Hitherto, silver has always been included in the return of bullion made by the bank. "Bullion" includes not merely gold coin of our mint, but gold in bars, foreign gold coin, and also silver. Shall we restrict the issues that are to take place upon bullion exclusively to gold, or shall issues be permitted upon silver; and if permitted, to what extent? A rigid adherence to principle would seem to require that gold alone should be the foundation of issue; that the amount of notes should fluctuate with the influx and reflux of gold. But I doubt whether we may not permit at least a partial issue of notes upon silver, without any departure from principle, and with great convenience to commerce. I propose, of course, to require that the obligation to pay notes in gold, and to issue notes in exchange for gold, shall remain in full force. The bank must pay its notes in gold at the rate of £3 : 17 : 10½, and must issue notes in exchange for gold, receiving the gold, if it be bullion, at a certain estimated rate, so much less than £3 : 17 : 10½, as shall be sufficient to cover the expense of coinage; the rate will probably be £3 : 17 : 9 per ounce. If an issue on silver be permitted, that issue must be with the voluntary consent of the party offering silver or receiving silver in exchange for notes. The reasons in favour of permitting the issue on silver with such consent are these:—The facility of exporting silver in preference to gold, when such export is expedient, is the true remedy against the inconvenience of our standard differing from that of other countries; and unless the circulation department is allowed to issue against silver, that inconvenience might occasionally be severely felt. So long as a silver standard is not recognised, and silver coin is used only as tokens under 40s., no quantity of silver likely to be in the bank can effect the standard value of the gold sovereign; but the sale of that silver may save useless coining of sovereigns, and answer the same purpose. Silver generally arrives from America, and latterly from China, in large amounts, and at pretty regular periods. If the bank is restricted from purchasing that silver, it will always be bought by merchants, who will export it immediately, the principal demand being for the continent. No capitalist will find it to his advantage to hold it, the variations in price seldom, if ever, compensating him for the loss of interest. When the exchange is low, and the price of silver high, this export acts advantageously in liquidation of payments due to foreign countries; but when the exchange is high and silver low, the silver will sell at a lower price than if the bank were allowed to buy it, and it will be exported solely for the purpose of bringing back gold, the expense of the export of the silver, and the import of the gold, being an actual loss on the transaction. The practice of the bank has been to buy bar silver at 4s. 11½d., and dollars at 4s. 9½d., which, at the French mint prices, is equal to buying gold at 77s. 9d. When the exchanges have fallen, and there has been a demand for remittances to the continent, the bank has sold the silver, and such sale has answered all the purposes of gold, has left a small profit to the bank, and saved the expense of exchanging silver for gold. An unnecessary export of silver, that is, an export when it is not required to rectify the exchanges, causes a momentary rise in the exchange, which again falls back to its original rate so soon as the operation is ended. This momentary rise in the exchange, so long as it lasts, is prejudicial to all parties who may have to draw bills upon the continent in payment for goods and other exports. A stock of silver in the bank is convenient to our trade, particularly with India and China. Merchants often require that metal as a remittance, and would have to send to the continent for it at a greater expense, if they did not find a supply at the bank. But if the bank is absolutely restricted from the issue of notes upon silver, the stock of silver retained by the bank will be a very limited one, as it will not answer the purpose of the bank to purchase silver and hold it as a part of its assets in the banking department. For these reasons I am inclined to propose that the bank shall have the power of issuing notes on the deposits of silver. There should, I think, be a limit to the extent to which this issue shall be allowed. If we provide that the amount of silver on which issues may take place shall not exceed one-fourth of the amount of gold—(for instance, if there be four millions issued upon gold, permitting an issue upon silver to the extent of one million)—we shall probably ensure the maintenance of such a stock of silver as may give facilities for rectifying the exchanges and supplying the demands of commerce, and incur no risk of infringing upon that principle which will impose a positive obligation upon the bank to receive gold in exchange for notes, and to pay notes in gold coin on demand. These are the only points on which I have any explanation to offer so far as the Bank of England is concerned. I proceed to points connected with the affairs of joint-stock banks and private banks. It is proposed that every bank now exercising, bonâ fide, the privilege of issue, or rather, I should say, which did exercise it on the 6th of May last, should be permitted to enjoy that privilege within certain limits; that in the case of each bank, the bank-officer should make up an account of the amount of issues for two years preceding the 6th of May, 1844, and that in each case the average amount of such issue should be the maximum of future issue. It is proposed that each bank shall make a return to the stamp office of its daily issues; that this return shall be made on some day in the week following, to be named by the stamp office, and that the average amount of issues during the preceding week shall not exceed the maximum which the bank is allowed to issue. Originally it was proposed that the issue of no single day should exceed the maximum; but in order to prevent the attachment of penalties to an inadvertent excess of issue on some one particular day, it will be more convenient to take the average of the weekly issue, and to require that that average shall not exceed the maximum. There are some cases in which, within the period of two years, there has been a union of banks, in which one bank has purchased the business of another bank—the goodwill of the concern; and in such a case, if we take the average amount of the issues of the surviving bank for two years, that might not be perfectly fair, because the present amount of united issue might greatly exceed the amount which would appear upon the average of the single bank for the period of two years. In the bill, therefore, I shall provide for cases where there has been a union under contract and written agreement, upon that contract and written agreement being furnished to the stamp office. Our wish is, to reconcile the establishment of a great principle to existing interests, with as little danger and inconvenience as possible. I have been asked what I propose with respect to branch banks—“May joint-stock banks now in existence add to the number of their branches?” My answer is, They may; but they must not upon that account increase the maximum of their circulation. They may transfer business from an existing branch to another branch hereafter to be constituted, but in no case must the transfer lead to an increase of the maximum of permitted circulation. We know the total maximum at present to be about £8,000,000.

That is about the amount of issue in England and Wales, calculated upon the average of the last two years; and we intend, as far as we can, to give to the Bank of England, which is to have controlling power over issues, the assurance that in no case can that aggregate amount be exceeded. I have been asked this question—"Supposing there should be now two private banks with three partners each—will you object to the consolidation of those private banks, and the carrying on of the joint concern as one private bank with six partners? and what would be the amount of issue in that case to which the united bank would be entitled?" I do not propose to prevent such a consolidation; and I consider that the united bank should have the power of issuing an amount of notes equal to the aggregate amount of the two banks when separate. In respect of branches, the law requires amendment. I doubt the policy which some banks have pursued of establishing very numerous branches. I doubt whether banks having fifty or sixty branches—some in very small towns, renting expensive houses, and appointing agents with considerable salaries—can derive profit from such a course. It is the great competition which exists, and the desire to monopolise the circulation, which has probably led to it. The law, however, offers no impediment: it rather encourages the extension of branches, because the law requires the payment of duty for four branches, and no more; that is to say, a joint-stock bank taking out a licence for four branches has the power to establish an unlimited number without any further payment. Now, we will not object to the establishment of new branches, but we propose to require payment for the licence for each new branch that may be established. I propose, therefore, if any bank establishes a new branch, that it shall be required to take out a fresh separate licence, the cost of which amounts to about £30. I have also been asked, "Do we propose that joint-stock banks shall have the liberty to purchase up the right of the circulation of private banks?" We are willing, so long as the character of the institution is not changed, to admit the consolidation; but we do not propose to permit a joint-stock bank to increase its circulation by purchasing the right of issue of a private bank. I have been asked, again, "Will you permit the substitution of partners? Will you allow the son to be placed in the position of his father?" I say, certainly. We can give no guarantee as to the continuance of this privilege of issue. We think parliament has a perfect right at any time, if the privilege be abused, to apply an immediate remedy. So long, however, as the present system exists, we advise the House not to attempt a vexatious and unnecessary interference with these concerns. We should therefore permit the substitution of the son for the father as a partner. We are of opinion also, that to permit the entrance of a new partner into a private bank may be advantageous to the public as well as to the bank itself. A wealthy man may be desirous to add his capital and his responsibility to the bank; and to such a course we oppose no objection. It is said, "Suppose the admission of new partners be carried to such an extent that the character of the partnership should be totally changed; suppose there be six new partners instead of the six old ones; will you permit this wholesale substitution?" We recommend that we should not make the attempt to prohibit it by law. Such a substitution may seem an abuse of the conceded privilege of issue; but we deprecate any thing like unnecessary and vexatious intermeddling. It would be easy to evade any enactment intended to prevent extensive substitution of partners. There is an important stipulation which we propose to make with the Bank of England, and which we think to be just to other banks. Some of those banks have inquired whether we would permit the discontinuance of the arrangements made by them with the Bank of England for the issue of notes of the Bank of England, and the substitution of a corresponding amount of their own notes, thus increasing the issue of their own notes beyond the average of the two years? We do not propose to permit that exchange of notes. We do not propose that any bank, having entered into an arrangement with the Bank of England, shall be allowed to discontinue the Bank of England notes, and to resume their own notes; but, if we refuse that to the private bank, we should give that private bank a guarantee that the Bank of England will grant the accommodation of Bank of England notes upon as favourable terms as it was before held. We propose, with the full consent of the Bank of England, that any bank wishing to relinquish its connection with the Bank of England may have the power of doing so; but it shall not, in that case, be allowed to resume its own issues. If, on the other hand, it wishes to continue its connection, the Bank of England shall be compelled to continue the supply of Bank of England notes upon terms not less disadvantageous than the present. I must here advert to a change which the bank is about to make in its arrangements in respect to the issue of Bank of England notes by other banks. These arrangements are at present of a twofold nature. Some banks are allowed by the Bank of England a commission of 1 per cent. on the amount of notes actually in circulation; others are permitted as an equivalent for a 1 per cent. commission, to open a discount account with the bank, and to have bills discounted at 3 per cent. for an amount varying between certain prescribed limits. The bank proposes to discontinue the discount account, and to act with respect to all banks on one uniform rule, making an allowance to each of 1 per cent. on the amount of Bank of England notes actually issued. I do not think there is any other point of importance with respect to which I have explanation to offer; and here, perhaps, I ought to close, and permit the House to proceed to discussion upon the resolutions. But I am told that my chain of argument the other night was incomplete; that there was no necessary connection between my premises and my conclusions; that I did not show the necessity of interfering with the circulation of joint-stock banks or country banks; that I did not establish the policy of giving an increased control to the Bank of England over other banks. Now, I am not conscious that any link in the chain of argument was wanting. I attempted to show that competition amongst the issuers of notes was a bad principle—that the same arguments which support competition in the supply of other articles, did not apply to the supply of paper currency. I attempted to show that where there is an unlimited number of issues, there is no feeling of individual responsibility; and that no man, whatever his desire might be, would sacrifice his interests for the public good, when he knew that his neighbours would not follow his example. I also attempted to show from the admission of the representatives of issuing banks, that their practice was at variance with the principle which ought to regulate a paper currency; that there was no reference to the exchanges; that, as it was once said by a private banker, “there is no more regard to the exchanges than to the snow upon the mountains.” I attempted to show, from the same admissions, that increased prices led to increased issues; and that there might, therefore, be a stimulus to speculation at the very time when there ought to be discouragement. I cited the example of the United States, for the purpose of proving that competition in issue, though controlled by unlimited responsibility of partners, and by the promised convertibility of paper into coin, was no security against insolvency of banks and general derangement of all monetary transactions. If, however, there be any who consider the proof defective, who think sufficient ground has not been shown for checking the privilege of issue, and increasing the control of one central authority over the paper currency, I shall be glad to fortify my position by additional arguments. If the example of the United States be not admitted as a rule for us, I am quite content to look at home, and to examine the results of our own system on our own interests. I will endeavour to prove to your conviction, from the domestic experience of twenty years, that now is the time when, if you are wise, you will take security against the unlimited competition in issues, will increase the control of one superintending bank, and will prevent alternations and vicissitudes in that medium of exchange which is to regulate the value of every article in this country. Let us review the several periods occurring within the last twenty years, when there has been a derangement in the monetary affairs of the country, and when, in order to maintain the convertibility of paper into gold, there has been the necessity for sudden contraction of issues. There have been, I think, four such periods—in 1825, in 1832, in 1835-36, and in 1838-39. Let us see in three of these periods what has been the action of the country banks. In November, 1823, the bullion in the possession of the bank was £13,760,000; in November, 1825, it was reduced to £3,012,000. If the principle of a metallic standard and the doctrine as to the variation of paper with the state of the exchanges be admitted, there ought to have been a considerable decrease in the amount of paper. But it is estimated that between November, 1823, and November, 1825, there was an increase in the amount of country bank paper of from £4,000,000 to £8,000,000. Again, on the 1st of January, 1834, the bullion in the Bank of England amounted to £9,948,000; in 1837 it had suffered a diminution of about

£6,000,000, being reduced to £4,071,000, while the country bank circulation had increased from £10,142,000 in 1834, to £11,031,000 in 1837, and in the middle of August, 1836, when you were at the very verge of the crisis, the country bank circulation was actually £12,000,000. On the 26th of June, 1838, the bullion in the bank was £9,722,000; in June, 1839, it was reduced to £4,344,000, and the country bank circulation, instead of being diminished, was again increased. It amounted to £11,740,000 when the bank had £10,000,000 of gold, and it was increased to £12,725,000, when the bank had only £4,300,000 of bullion. Surely these facts, taken in conjunction with the admissions of the country bankers as to the principles on which their issues are regulated, are decisive proofs of defects in our present system of currency. I do not mean to say that country banks or joint-stock banks were alone responsible for the events that occurred at those periods. I do not defend the conduct of the Bank of England throughout the whole of those periods, but assigning to the bank its full share of the responsibility, there is abundant evidence that the principle of unlimited competition, that the increase of issue with the increase of prices, that the unwillingness or inability to regulate the issue of paper by a close observance of the state of the exchange, is fraught with danger. I do not underrate the importance and value of the banking establishments of this country. They are most useful instruments for facilitating the distribution and profitable use of capital, according to the wants of the community, enabling those who require the temporary advance of capital to procure it on the most advantageous terms from those who can supply it. I do full justice to the integrity and high character of the great majority of those who are connected with these establishments. But, if there be defects in the system on which they act, it is our duty to apply a remedy: if there has been an abuse of the privilege of issue; if great losses have been sustained by innocent parties, both as shareholders in joint-stock banks, as depositors, and as the holders of promissory notes of private banks, which have become insolvent—we are bound to take whatever precautions legislation can provide against the recurrence of such evils. Can we review the history of private banks within the last thirty or forty years, and deny the necessity for legislative interference? In the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, the failures of country banks amounted in number to 240. The number of commissions of bankruptcy was 89. The lamentable occurrences of 1825 and 1826 must be fresh in the recollection of many of us. With regard to the last few years, a return has recently been laid before the House, which demonstrates the necessity for legislative interference. I hold in my hand a return of the number of private banks which became bankrupt in the years 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842, and 1843, with the amount of dividends paid, so far as the same can be ascertained. The following is the result:—

Year.	Number of Bankruptcies.	Of which were Banks of Issue.	Number that paid Dividends, and Amount of Dividends.
1840	24	8	2 under 5s. 4 under 10s. 1 under 15s. 17 no dividend.
1841	26	11	{ 5 under 5s. 6 under 10s. 1 under 15s. 1 under 20s. 13 no dividend.
1842	12	4	2 under 5s. 9 no dividend. 1 div. not ascertained.
1843	11	6	{ 2 under 5s. 1 under 10s. 1 under 15s. 1 under 20s. 6 div. not ascertained.

With respect to the bankers who have become bankrupts, I have before me returns furnished by the bankruptcy office, from which I have made extracts. They refer to failures which have taken place since the 1st of January 1839, and give, in some cases, the amount of the assets, in others the causes of failure. The failures to which these extracts apply were ten in number. The names of the concerns I do not mention.

ESTATES OF BANKERS WHO HAVE BECOME BANKRUPTS, FROM THE 1st OF JANUARY, 1839, TO THE 1st OF APRIL, 1844.

1. Speculation on Spanish Bonds.	7. This bank had been insolvent for many years. Lost large sums in a sugar refinery, and £67,000 in a commercial house at Glasgow.
2. Banker a spirit merchant; the spirit trade was obliged to pay much more than its whole profits to the family of the banker's father, and acted as a drain upon the bank.	8. Uncle and nephew partners. In the course of eleven years the nephew dissipated £100,000 of the partnership assets. The uncle died in 1808, leaving a large fortune among his relations. The nephew committed suicide in October, 1840, when the frauds were discovered.
3. Advances to the partners, and bad speculations entered into by more than one of the partners.
4. Loss on Railway Speculations.
5. The bank had been insolvent for many years. Loss by bad debts, £145,600.
6. The banker succeeded to a considerable property, mortgaged his estate, overdraw his private account with the bank, issued promissory notes to the amount of £14,000, bearing interest to depositors of small sums among the humble classes of society, £5,500 of promissory notes payable to bearer on demand.
	ESTATES.
	9. Liabilities £157,960. Dividend none. Assets £20.
	10. Date of fiat 12th July, 1842. No dividend yet made. Bankrupt had certain race-horses, from which the sum of £750 6s. was netted.

Surely the conclusion we must draw from the details to which I have referred, both with respect to the frequent failures of banks, and the loss and suffering entailed upon their creditors, is in favour of legislative interference. It is said that the banks which failed were not in all cases banks of issue; but I propose, not merely a check upon the privilege of issue, but an amendment of the law under which banks not being banks of issue are constituted. Should these measures receive the sanction of parliament, they will not, in my opinion, limit the extent of legitimate accommodation which banks can afford to those who are engaged either in manufactures or in agriculture. I know that it is supposed by some that the issuing power of country banks is intimately connected with, and essential to, the maintenance of agricultural prosperity; and that the paper of the Bank of England cannot be made to serve the purposes to which country paper is applied. Now, let it be remembered, that in a very extensive district surrounding the metropolis, the circulation is in a great measure composed of Bank of England paper. In a circular area round London having a radius of sixty-five miles, the only competitors in issue with the Bank of England are certain private banks. That area includes a very extensive and important agricultural district. It includes the counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, Oxfordshire, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, with a great part of Suffolk and of Northamptonshire. Now, it appears, from the returns made to the Stamp Office, that throughout this great agricultural district the total amount of the circulation of private banks is only £1,329,000. The whole of the remainder of the circulation is supplied by the Bank of England. In some also of the chief manufacturing districts of this country the paper of the Bank of England constitutes almost the exclusive medium of exchange. I mention these facts for the purpose of quieting the apprehension that such a restriction as that which I propose, upon the issues of country paper, will unduly lower the prices of agricultural produce, or diminish the legitimate accommodation which the dealers in capital and money can afford to the trader or the agriculturist. It is said that the Bank of England will not have the means which it has heretofore had for supporting public credit, and of affording assistance to the mercantile world in times of commercial difficulty. Now, in the first place, the means of supporting credit are not means exclusively possessed by banks. All who are possessed of unemployed capital, whether bankers or not, and who can gain an adequate return by the advance of capital, are enabled to afford, and do afford, that aid which it is supposed by some that banks alone are enabled to afford. In the second place, it may be a question whether there be any permanent advantage in the maintenance of private or public credit, unless the means of maintaining it are derived from the bonâ fide advance of capital, and not from a temporary increase of promissory notes issued for a special purpose. Some apprehend that the proposed restrictions upon issue will diminish the power of the bank to act with energy at the period of monetary crisis and commercial alarm and derangement. But the object of the measure is to prevent (so far as legislation can prevent) the recurrence of those evils from which we suffered in 1825, 1836, and 1839. It is better to prevent the paroxysm than to excite it, and trust to desperate remedies for the means of recovery. I now commit these measures to the consideration and judgment of the House. They will be thought by some to fall short in the practical application of the principles on which they are founded; by others, probably, to effect too hasty and extensive an alteration of the system which now exists. By the great majority of this House, I trust, they will be deemed a safe and just compromise between conflicting considerations, reconciling the establishment of sound principles with a fair and liberal treatment of private interests. The right hon. baronet concluded by moving the first of the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to continue to the Bank of England, for a time to be limited, certain of the privileges now by law vested in that corporation, subject to such conditions as may be provided by any act to be passed for that purpose.

2. That it is expedient to provide by law, that the Bank of England should henceforth be divided in two separate departments; one exclusively confined to the issue and circulation of notes, the other to the conduct of banking.

3. That it is expedient to limit the amount of securities upon which it shall henceforth be lawful for the Bank of England to issue promissory notes payable to bearer on demand, and that such amount shall only be increased under certain conditions to be prescribed by law.

4. That it is expedient to provide by law, that a weekly publication should be made by the Bank of England of the state both of the circulation and of the banking departments.

5. That it is expedient to repeal the law, which subjects the notes of the Bank of England to the payment of composition for stamp duty.

6. That, in consideration of the privileges to be continued to the Bank of England, the rate of fixed annual payment to be made by the bank to the public shall be £180,000 per annum, and shall be defrayed by deducting the said sum from the sum now by law payable to the bank for the management of the public debt.

7. That, in the event of any increase of the securities upon which it shall be lawful for the bank to issue such promissory notes as aforesaid, a further annual payment shall be made by the bank to the public over and above the said fixed payment of £180,000 equal in amount to the net profit derived from the promissory notes on such additional securities.

8. That it is expedient to prohibit by law the issue of promissory notes payable to bearer on demand by any bank not issuing such notes on the 6th day of May 1844, or by any bank thereafter to be established in any part of the United Kingdom.

9. That it is expedient to provide by law, that such banks in England and Wales as on the 6th day of May, 1844, issued promissory notes, payable to bearer on demand, shall continue to issue such notes, subject to such conditions and to such limitations as to the amount of issue as may be provided for by any act to be passed for that purpose.

10. That it is expedient to provide by law for the weekly publication of the amount of promissory notes, payable to bearer on demand, circulated by any bank authorised to issue such notes.

11. That it is expedient to make provision by law with regard to joint-stock banking companies.

In reply to some remarks by Mr. Charles Buller—Sir Robert Peel observed, the hon. gentleman had said, that many banks had failed which were not banks of issue; but when he spoke he was addressing himself to the memorial of the joint-stock banks, in which it was stated that the present system of banking was perfect, or so good that they deprecated any alteration. He had stated, that it was difficult to maintain this perfection after the experience of the last twenty-five years, when he found that during three years 240 banks had failed, and that during the last four or five there had been eighty-five failures, it could not be inferred that the present system was excluded from all possible improvement. He thought he had proved that the powers of issue were a great encouragement to the establishment of banks and to their mismanagement. It was true that other banks might mismanage their concerns, but he was going to try and improve the system of banking generally; he was about to remedy the evils under which the joint-stock banks laboured: he was about to provide that, on the establishment of joint-stock banks, a certain portion of the capital should be paid up, and he was about to introduce new modes of management. Although he could not control every private bank, although there might still be transactions in railway shares, and in Spanish bonds, yet he would call upon the public to exercise vigilance and caution in their transactions, and if they placed their confidence in banks which were badly managed, they must suffer for it. He rejoiced that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Baring), and the hon. member for Birmingham, made so near an approach to his views. He had never done the latter hon. gentleman the injustice of supposing that he was the author of the letters he had quoted, the letters might be the production of one of the hon. member's constituents. He was glad to hear, however, that the hon. gentleman advocated a standard price, only that he thought it should be in corn, and not in gold. The hon. member deprecated any interference with banks, and yet he advocated a law which fixed a certain amount of bullion; but how could the hon. gentleman deprecate such an interference when he would have enacted such a law? If paper were to be convertible into gold, what would be the details of the hon. gentleman's measure by which we would compel the bank to make the conversion. He said, "here are ten millions which you are never to touch, here is a sacred deposit." [Mr. Muntz had not advocated non-interference with the bank.] How a bank which was always liable to pay on demand could be made to do so, when there was a fixed amount of bullion, he could not tell. My hon. friend (Mr. Newdegate), continued the right hon. baronet, has put a question to me, which is important, because, although it was put briefly, yet it includes the chief objections which are felt by many to the measure which I propose; and I am anxious, both on that account, and from feelings of esteem for a young member of this House, who will, I am sure, distinguish himself, to give an answer to it. The question of my hon. friend was this—"How far the extension of the principle of the act of 1819, as carried out by the alteration of the system of issues, and by the re-organization of banking establishments, taken together, as now proposed by the government, will, by limiting the amount of circulating medium and the facilities for circulating to the average of the last two years, without reference to the increase of production in this country, affect prices? For, if the quantity of commodities produced increase, and the amount of money remain the same, will not the price of commodities fall in proportion to the increase of their production? To this question my answer is, that the present measure is not an extension of the principle of the act of 1819—it is the fulfilment and complement of that act, but it does not carry the principle of a metallic standard farther than it was carried by the Act of 1819. That Act restored a metallic standard; it required that promissory notes should not be issued, excepting on the condition that they were convertible into gold at the will of the bearer. They are issued on that condition. Under the system that exists, they may not, for a time, conform in value to gold—they may be issued in excess—they may be the means of affording a greater degree of temporary accommodation than could be afforded by a metallic currency—they may increase prices, and create for a time the appearance of prosperity. But they do all this with the certainty of ultimate reaction,—the certainty that the time must come when, if you adhere to a metallic standard, and if you maintain it unaltered, that standard will assert its supremacy, will refuse to conform to the value of paper, and will require that paper shall conform to the value of gold. When the depreciation of the paper is sensible,—when it becomes a matter of notoriety, the law enjoining its equivalency to coin will be enforced by every holder of paper, from the man whose whole property is a single five-pound note, to the great capitalist who influences the foreign exchange by the extent of his dealings in money. The certain means of realising a small profit, will impel every holder of paper to demand coin in exchange. What advantages will there have been in the temporary accommodation, what advantage in the temporary increase of prices, if they are to be followed—as I contend they inevitably will—by such a contraction of paper as will make it equal in value to coin? Let us not confound that accommodation which is afforded by the liberal advance of capital, that increase of prices which springs from general prosperity and increased demand, with the accommodation and increase of prices which rest on no surer foundation than an undue issue of paper. I call it an undue issue, if its value do not conform with that of the coin which it professes to represent, and which the law has made the measure of value. I have thus given to the question of my hon. friend that answer which I believe to be a satisfactory answer, provided that you admit that there is, and that there ought to be, a metallic standard. He had omitted to mention one evidence of the operation of inconvertible paper. In 1797 there were only 240 private banks, but the moment liability to convert was removed, more of these banks were established, and when they had to deal eight or ten years afterwards with them, their number had increased from 240 to about 800; it was because they found such great advantages in inconvertibility, that the banks of issue were so much increased.

In answer to a question from Mr. Thomas Baring—Sir R. Peel said, I understand my hon. friend to imply a doubt as to the policy of that part of the plan which will limit the issue of the bank upon securities to a gross amount, and will require that the profit of any issue upon securities that may be permitted, under certain circumstances, beyond that amount, shall belong to the public. My hon. friend asks, what inducement will the bank have to supply any void that may arise in the country circulation, since the bank is to have no profit for an issue made for that purpose? I answer, in the first place, that we must assume that the bank will feel an interest, apart from the mere consideration of pecuniary profit, in increasing its control over the general circulation, and thus diminishing the risk that the action of the bank upon the exchanges, whenever such action is necessary, can be counteracted by other issuers of paper. In the second place, the bank may protect itself from loss by supplying the void that may be created in the country circulation, and will thus have a direct pecuniary inducement to supply it. Suppose the notes of the bank, issued for the circulation of the metropolitan district, and for the general purposes of commerce, to amount to £22,000,000, and that the banking department has a supply of £6,000,000 of notes lying dormant, received from the issue department in exchange for gold; suppose also £2,000,000 of the country circulation to be withdrawn, and a demand therefore for an increased issue beyond the ordinary circulation of £22,000,000 to arise; it would in that case be a source of profit to the bank to supply the void from the stock of notes in the banking department, without requiring permission from the Queen in Council, to increase its issues upon securities. Let us now take the case of there being no stock of unissued notes in the banking department, justifying the supply of the void from that department. The bank would then have no alternative but to supply the void, with the consent of the Privy Council, by an issue upon securities beyond the amount of £14,000,000. The question is, what interest will the bank have in seeking permission to make such an issue, as the profit will belong to the government? I answer, that the bank, by obtaining such permission, will protect itself from a loss to which it will be otherwise liable. According to the assumption, the void in the currency takes place, and is not supplied by the bank from its ordinary resources. The notes remaining in circulation will then become more valuable; there will be an influx of gold; and that gold will be tendered to the bank, which must give notes in exchange for it. On that issue, there would not only be no profit, but there would be an absolute loss, amounting to the charge of the manufacture and the issue of notes, which, in the case supposed, will fall upon the bank. Should the increased issue take place upon securities, although the nett profit will belong to the public, yet the charges also, namely, the commission of one per cent. upon the issue, and the expense of the notes, must also be defrayed by the public; and it will be less disadvantageous to the bank, under the circumstances supposed, to issue notes upon an increased amount of securities than upon gold. He should be glad, the right hon. baronet continued in reference to Lord Worsley, to attempt to relieve the noble lord's anxiety with respect to country banks; the noble lord feared that, by taking an average of the last two years, there might be some inconvenient restriction on the issue of country banks, and, therefore, a diminution of the accommodation given to agriculturists. The noble lord said, that during a considerable portion of the last two years, there was a depression in the price of agricultural produce, and there was a panic; and, therefore, it was unfair to take the last two years. Now he would just read the issues of country banks for the last six months. They were represented by these figures: £3,400,000, £4,900,000, £4,500,000, £4,800,000, £4,900,000, £4,900,000. These were the average monthly issues of country banks for the last six months, during which period there had been no panic, and no great depression of agricultural produce. Was he going to call for the reduction of these issues, an average which would tell inconveniently on the banks, and restrict their issues? Take the first six months which he was going to admit into the average; he must begin, of course, with May 1842. The noble lord would observe, that the last six months never in any case exceeded five millions. He would take the first six or eight months he was going to permit country banks to take into the average, and beginning with May, it was £5,360,000, £4,999,000, £5,100,000, £5,100,000, £5,098,000, £5,488,000, 4,434,000, £5,085,000. So that he was going to permit the country banks to have an average of two years, and he showed to the noble lord that the first six months of these two years exceeded, in every case but one, five millions; and in the last six months there was no depression of price, no panic, no want of accommodation. He asked the noble lord whether he had satisfied him that country banks could extend their accommodation. The noble lord said that Lincolnshire was a fair test. Now, he believed that Lincolnshire and Leicestershire were the counties in which there was the greatest variation in the amount of issues. At one time in Lincolnshire it was £4,100,000, at another time £4,500,000, the mean was £4,250,000. What could prevent the Leicester banks keeping £40,000 Exchequer bills, and to provide for an increased circulation of notes, by selling out £25,000 of the Exchequer bills, demand notes of the Bank of England, and supply the accommodation as usual with Bank of England notes? This was all he asked them to do. He did not ask them to make a deposit as of securities. All he asked of them was, if they wanted £25,000 more, to supply that out of capital, and not from credit. There were seventy banks, which contrived to give accommodation without any issues of their own. He left to these banks the power of issuing £4,250,000, and if on any occasion they wanted an excess, all he asked of them was to give security for that excess, to supply it from the capital.

Resolutions agreed to; House resumed, Resolutions to be reported.

BANK CHARTER.—THE CURRENCY.

On the motion that the above bill be read a second time,—Mr. Hawes moved as an amendment, to substitute the words: "That no sufficient evidence has been laid before the House, to justify the proposed interference with banks of issue, in the management of their circulation."

SIR R. PEEL said, that having listened with great attention to the speeches which had been made in the course of the discussion, he could not reconcile the opinion of any one man who had spoken in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Lambeth, with the maintenance of the principle upon which this bill was founded. They all professed to recognise the great doctrine of a metallic currency—they all admitted that we ought to maintain a metallic standard, but there was not one of them, from the hon. gentleman who had commenced the debate, to the hon. gentleman who had just concluded his speech, who did not appear to entertain an opinion—whatever the professions might be—that a metallic standard ought to be abandoned. [Mr. Hawes: "No, no."] The hon. gentleman had certainly been loud in his professions of adherence to a metallic standard, and to the great principles upon which the report of the Bullion Committee was founded; but although the commencement of the hon. gentleman's speech was a declaration that the determination of that committee was right, yet the hon. gentleman argued that the facts which it had collected led to a different conclusion. The hon. gentleman said that paper was not depreciated during the suspension of cash payments. That he did not expect to hear, and he had never before heard such a declaration from any one who professed an adherence to the opinion of the Bullion Committee. A declaration more hostile to that committee than for the hon. gentleman to state this night, in the year 1844, that during the suspension of cash payments inconvertible paper was not depreciated. What, then, were all the attacks upon the bill of 1819, he had never heard, for restoring a gold currency without foundation? Was it untrue that the agricultural produce of the kingdom was raised in price during the war, in consequence of an inconvertible paper currency, and did the return to cash payments make no difference whatever in all the engagements that had been entered into? The hon. gentleman said, you might have sent any quantity of gold to the continent at any time, and purchased articles as cheap there as in England, and realized as large a profit here; and the hon. gentleman referred to various articles for the purpose of showing that prices were not affected by the paper being inconvertible. Why, how vain was the discussion as to prices at particular periods, for the purpose of drawing any inference from them as to the state of the currency. Look at the prices of manufactured cotton. That was the argument which the late Mr. Alderman Waithman was continually using. He said, "While you require the same amount of taxes, the price of cotton goods has fallen off." But surely, with the improvements in machinery, with the reduction of the price of the raw material, and with our great command of capital, it would have been marvellous if there had not been a great decrease of price. And what inference did the hon. gentleman draw from the prices of those particular commodities with respect to the currency? Did the hon. gentleman know what took place with respect to silver during the Bank Restriction? The hon. gentleman said, "Oh, you must not estimate the depreciation by the price of gold." But did the hon. gentleman recollect, during the suspension of cash payments, an attempt to issue silver? That was not then a legal tender: it was not the standard of value. Certain dollars, however, were issued for the purpose of supplying the place of gold, and it was discovered that the silver dollars soon followed the gold guineas, and disappeared from circulation. The hon. gentleman said paper was not depreciated. But as an Order in Council was issued increasing the value of silver, and what had been issued at 4s., the Mint price, was allowed to circulate at 4s. 6d., and this kept the silver currency in circulation. A new value was given to the dollar, according to the depreciated value of the paper; and what you had attempted in vain to circulate at the Mint price, as soon as a new value was placed upon it, according to the depreciated paper, remained in circulation. For the hon. gentleman to contend that, during the inconvertible paper currency, it was not depreciated, and prices were not affected, was a blow at the report of the Bullion Committee, which he should not have expected from one who professed to adhere to its opinions. It was a contradiction of facts which he thought every man acknowledged. If the doctrine of the hon. gentleman were correct, he should not have escaped much abuse and calumny for attempting to restore gold currency in 1819.

The hon. gentleman had referred to the United States, and to the pamphlet of M. Galatin, for the purpose of showing that the analogy of the United States was inapplicable to this country. Why should the example of the United States be inapplicable to this country? There were joint-stock banks in the United States—there was a paper currency, nominally convertible into gold on demand. As far as regarded the parties and their property, there was every appearance of a perfect guarantee for solvency; but there was unlimited competition of issue, and the consequence was bankruptcy and general failure. In 1811, there was in the United States, the State Bank, in some respects corresponding to the Bank of England—having an imperfect control over the issues, because it was well conducted, and maintained the principle of convertibility; and as the notes of other banks could be turned, by exchange, into notes of the central bank, it possessed some control over the issues of other banks. In 1811, the first central bank was abolished. In three years afterwards there was a universal suspension of cash payments, in consequence of that imperfect check having been removed. In a few years afterwards—about 1818, another central bank was established, and it ceased in 1833. Again, in a few years all the banks of the United States, twice in succession, were found suspending their specie payments. Was not that a strong proof of the advantage of a central bank, and of a complete control over the issues? This was an example of another country of great resources, with a large amount of capital, sufficient to command good banking establishments; and if he showed that on two occasions, within a short period while a central bank existed, that other establishments were preserved, and that after the control of the central bank had been removed by the government, notwithstanding regulations to ensure solvency, notwithstanding the universal profession of convertibility, there occurred universal bankruptcy, and suspension of cash payments, he thought that was a case perfectly applicable to this country, and a proof of the advantages of central control. He would take the opinions of the two highest authorities in the United States on this subject. He could not name two higher authorities than Mr. Galatin and Mr. Webster. And what said Mr. Galatin, who had been quoted by the hon. member for Lambeth? He said that "The creation of new state banks to fill the chasm which was the natural consequence of the dissolution of the bank of the United States, and, as was usual under such circumstances, the expectations of great profits, had led to the establishment of a greater number than were wanted; and as the salutary regulating power of the bank of the United States no longer existed, the issues were increased beyond what circumstances rendered necessary,—that it was his deliberate opinion that the suspension might have been prevented at the time it took place, had the former bank of the United States been in existence—that the exaggerated increase of the state banks occasioned by its dissolution, would not have occurred had that bank still have retained power over those bodies, and checked their issues."

If the example of a great country, and the authority of great writers, could have any bearing upon this country, that example and that authority were in favour of his argument. But what said Mr. Webster, in his speech on the Treasury Bill, on the 12th of March 1838, effecting the banking of that country? "I lay it down as an unquestionable principle, that no paper can be made equal and kept equal to gold and silver, but such as is convertible into gold and silver on demand; but I have gone further, and still go further than this, and I contend that even convertibility, though itself indispensable, is not a certain and unfailing ground of reliance. There is a liability to excessive issues of gold even while paper is convertible at will. Of this there can be no doubt. Where, then, shall a regulator be found? What principle of prevention do we rely upon?"

Here was a gentleman, not indulging in speculation, but acquainted with the principles of banking in the United States, originally adhering to the doctrines of Adam Smith and Mr. Ricardo, that convertibility on demand was sufficient to check issues, yet, warned by experience, in his own country, acknowledging that with unlimited competition even convertibility on demand was not a security against over issue. If the United States were to be quoted at all, it was in favour of the principles embodied in the present bill. And what was the case in our own country? Did he propose to disturb any perfect and successful system of currency? He took it for granted that they all adhered to a metallic standard, and the principle of convertibility, but it was said, agreeing with those principles, that there was not sufficient ground for interference. Why, what was our experience during the last twenty years? In that period had we not many proofs of the necessity of legislative interference to maintain the principle of convertibility? There had been four monetary crises—in 1825, 1832, 1836-1837, and 1839—and there was in each of these an increase in the issues of country bank paper; in each there was proof that the issues were not made conformable to the exchanges, but that an increase of the country bank paper had taken place, when, if there were truth in the principle for which he contended, there ought to have been a reduction, and thus in each period there had subsequently arisen the necessity for a rapid and ruinous contraction. The hon. gentleman who had spoken last had said, that the Bank of England was always able to protect itself, and to prevent its notes from being discredited. He knew it was. He knew that when the paroxysm was at its height, and it became the duty of the bank to make great efforts, it could, by means of great sacrifices, save itself and ensure continued convertibility. The bank could always maintain its credit; it could always cover its own notes; but by a tremendous sacrifice of the mercantile and other interests. That was what he wished to prevent, and it was not to do that which had been attributed to him, of leaving the country banks wholly at the mercy of the Bank of England. So far was he from doing that, that he would compel the Bank of England to conform to certain principles, advantageous to the public and to private bankers, which, at certain periods of monetary crises, the bank had neglected. He wished to prevent the bank from doing that which it has done—from issuing its notes to meet the demands for deposits. He said to the bank, there were certain principles laid down, and it must conform to them—that it might issue notes on securities, but to the limited amount of £14,000,000—the whole of the issue above that amount must be based on gold. But then it was said this would be a great restriction upon the issues. Now, they took security against the possibility of there being too great a restriction upon the issues, because if the bank restricted the issue of its notes till they became more valuable than coin, then every man had a right to take gold to the bank and get notes for it. That was his answer to the objection; and those who did not admit it to be a good answer, did not admit the principle upon which the measure is founded. The principle is, that as the paper promises to pay in gold, it ought to conform to gold; and he said it would be no accommodation whatever to commerce if bankers were to be allowed to coin their personal credit into money instead of their capital. He said then, that every precaution has been taken on the one hand, that the bank shall not issue paper beyond the proper amount, by compelling the bank to give notes in exchange for gold. And on the other hand, we take security that the bank shall not restrict its issues below the necessary amount, by giving to the holder of gold the power of demanding bank notes. But then it was said that restriction imposed upon the issue of private paper would subject the country to the greatest inconvenience. It was said, also, that the only effect of their interference in discrediting the paper issues of the private banks would be to make men invent some other species of paper credit for themselves, to be substituted for country notes. Now, if country paper were necessary to agricultural prosperity, why had not that question been answered which he had put before? Why was it that in eight or ten of the greatest agricultural counties the issue of the country paper does not exceed £1,300,000? He had shewn that in Sussex, Middlesex, Kent, Surrey, Cambridgeshire, Oxfordshire, part of Norfolk, and the greatest part of Suffolk, all situated within a radius of sixty-five miles from London,—that in all those counties the necessities of the district were provided for by an issue of country bank paper to the amount of only £1,300,000; and supposing that the country banks were to restrict that issue, do not believe that the Bank of England would refuse to supply its place. Or supposing the country banks should wish to substitute the Bank of England paper for their own—to deal with the Bank of England as no less than sixty banks dealt with it at this moment—the Bank of England would give them its paper and pay a commission of 1 per cent. on the use of it. If the restrictions on the issues of country paper would, as it has been said, lead to the issuing of bills of exchange to supply its place, why, he asked, have they not been issued within the districts to which he had referred? The Bank of England provides a circulation for that district, amounting, I believe, to £6,000,000, the remainder £1,300,000 being supplied by country bank paper. Why have not bills of exchange been used there? Because the circulation is sufficient, and because there is confidence in the Bank of England. It is said that the inhabitants of that district are accustomed to the use of Bank of England paper, but that there will be a prejudice in other parts of the country against it. Depend upon it, a very little experience would remove that difficulty, and that a very short trial would remove the prejudice which it is supposed exists against the circulation of Bank of England paper, which would soon be found acceptable in the agricultural districts. But would they tell him how it happened that in some of the principal manufacturing districts there are scarcely any banks of issue, and that the whole of their wants are supplied by Bank of England paper. Take Birmingham for example. He apprehended, that no great proportion of the paper used in that town consists of country notes. The Bank of England at this moment circulated £621,000 in notes in Birmingham, and he doubted if there was £100,000 more in country notes. [Mr. Muntz: Not so much.] Then that was the amount of paper circulation in that great manufacturing district. There they contrived to carry on their trade, and yet required only a paper circulation of £700,000, and still but £100,000 of that was in country notes. Were there any bills of exchange issued there to supply the deficiency of the circulation? If there were any apprehension as to the Bank of England paper, there could be a supply of country paper in the district; but the proportions in which they circulated were as had been mentioned. If there were a deficiency, did bills of exchange supply it? [Mr. Gisborne believed they did.] He doubted it very much, at least he never heard that the circulation was supplied by bills of exchange. Of course there were bills of exchange used for the purpose of commerce; but he had never before heard that they had been issued for the purpose of supplying the local circulation of £5 notes. The circulation of Gloucester was supplied by the Bank of England with notes to the amount of £107,000. At Manchester it might be supposed that its great commercial transactions would be supplied by the notes of country banks. The Bank of England supplied it with a circulation of £2,167,000. He believed that almost the whole of the circulation of Manchester was supplied by the Bank of England. Now, he had never heard of a want of circulation in Manchester. The notes of the Bank of England were sufficient. They had bills of exchange there for carrying on their great transactions, but not for the purpose of supplying in any way a local circulation. In Liverpool the Bank of England supplied the circulation to the extent of £1,000,000. They might depend upon it that where a vacuum was felt, notes would be issued consistent with the principle which the maintenance of the standard of value required. They might depend upon it that the Bank of England would be willing to fill up the vacuum, but if the Bank of England were unwilling, then they had not to depend upon its good will, for they had always had it in their power to command the issue of Bank of England notes. Let it be supposed that there was a restriction to the amount of one ninth on the country issue, then the country banks and the joint-stock banks would have nothing else to do than to keep in London such an amount of available securities as would enable them to command and ensure Bank of England notes to supply the banks in the country. If the bank should refuse, which the bank would not—if it should refuse to issue paper to supply the void, then they did not depend upon the good will of the bank, they could by a small sacrifice have the void supplied by the exertions of the country bankers. All that was required from them was, not to submit to a restriction which would be an inconvenience. They could, by a deposit of securities, command a supply of paper, and with a smaller amount of difficulty than under the present regulations. The hon. gentleman asked him to define what he meant by money? and the hon. gentleman said that he had not, on a former occasion, defined it. Now, he had already stated that by money he meant either the coin of the realm or that species of paper credit named a promissory note, which, passing from hand to hand, and not requiring any personal guarantee beyond the credit of the issuer, supplies the place of money. He stated that he thought there was a clear distinction between a promissory note payable on demand, without any personal guarantee beyond the credit of the issuer, and any other form of public credit; and that he had a strong impression, that if they wanted a metal standard, with a circulating medium, supposed to take the place of gold, it could not be maintained upon any other basis than the actual and instant convertibility of the paper in circulation. With that system he thought they might leave without restriction and interference those other forms of paper credit, which are a proper superstructure on the basis of a metallic circulation and a paper circulation equivalent in value to gold. The hon. gentleman opposite said, that they ought not to interfere with the dealings between man and man; another hon. gentleman said, that though private banks had failed, there was no instance of misconduct on the part of joint-stock banks. That hon. gentleman, however, corrected himself by saying, that there were no proofs that in the ultimate winding-up of the affairs of these banks, the notes issued by them had not been paid to the holder. Why that might be true—it might be that by calling upon all the unfortunate shareholders in those banks, they had contrived, after the lapse of, perhaps, four or five years, to pay the holders of notes; but he did not think that the House would be of opinion that that was a satisfactory arrangement. The hon. gentleman, the member for Nottingham (Mr. Gisborne,) said, that he should vote for the proposition that there was not sufficient evidence to justify an interference with banks of issue—what evidence would the hon. gentleman have? He had already stated the dividends paid by a number of banks of issue: and he held in his hand a detailed account of the failure of different banks, among which he found the bank of Manchester, the Northern and Central bank, the Norfolk and Norwich joint-stock bank, the Commercial Bank of England, the imperial bank, the Yorkshire agricultural and commercial banking company, the Isle of Wight joint-stock company, the Isle of Man Bank, the Leamington bank, and several others, which present such details of fraudulent practices, in many instances, as he had never before heard of. These instances clearly proved the policy of interference to the extent which he proposed, namely, requiring that the original prospectus should be deposited, that the names of partners should be given, and that there should be some provisions, imposing a responsibility on the directors who are to govern the establishments. If he wanted conclusive proofs of the policy of interfering with respect to the future regulations of joint-stock banks, the statement which he held in his hand would afford that proof. Here, for instance, is the Commercial Bank of England, with a nominal capital of £500,000, and a paid-up capital of £260,000, started in the year 1834, and which by the year 1840, had lost its entire capital, and about £30,000 or £40,000 in addition. In February 1840, only four months before it came to an end, the directors stated to the proprietors, that "they continued to stand firm in the confidence of the public," and that "the profits of the bank for the previous half-year had been larger than for any similar period since its establishment." This bank had advanced to one man £180,000, and one of the directors stated, that that man could not have got credit for £500 for two years in the town in which he lived from any other establishment. Although these banks acted in this reckless manner, these were all banks of issue, and their notes were freely circulated amongst all classes of society, from the wealthiest down to the very poorest. These parties were all subject to the consequences of these reckless proceedings, and yet the hon. gentleman said, that parliament should not interfere with these banks in any way. The hon. gentleman said, that these banks ought to be left to themselves, to do as they pleased, as was the case in Scotland. But he (Sir R. Peel) said, that when they found these banks establishing themselves in towns, and buying up the private banks, in order to make and extend their connection; when he saw that the notes issued by these banks were imposed upon all sorts of persons, many of whom had not the power to reject them, he considered that there was an amount of misery entailed upon society which called aloud for the interference of this House. He was not condemning all the joint-stock banks: on the contrary, he believed that many of them had conferred great benefits upon society, but it was by the legitimate application of their capital in advancing loans upon fair interest. But he said it was fair to the respectable establishments, conducted in this manner, to protect them from the injury which must be done to them, in common with the community, by the reckless proceedings of other establishments, which were not conducted with any regard to fair commercial principles. The hon. and learned member for Liskeard complained, in the course of his speech, that there had been some misapprehension in the returns of the number of failures of bankers since 1838, owing, as he said, to persons who had become bankrupts from other causes, but who happened to be shareholders in joint-stock banks, having been described in their flats as private bankers; and the hon. and learned gentleman referred to the highest authority, namely, the returns in the accountant's office in the court of bankruptcy, in confirmation of what he said. A statement of this kind had come to him (Sir R. Peel) before, and he immediately wrote to Mr. Montague, of that office, requesting him to make some inquiry into the subject. Mr. Montague wrote him a reply, which he would read to the House. Mr. Montague stated—"It is perfectly true that there had been some persons against whom flats had been taken out, who had been wrongly described as bankers, because they happened to be shareholders in country banks; but that the whole number of these cases was only six out of eighty-six."

So that there had been an error, as the hon. and learned gentleman had stated, but only to a very small amount. He had stated so fully on a former occasion the principal grounds upon which he supported the measure now proposed by her Majesty's government, that he would not, at this late hour of the night, detain the House by going any further over the same grounds. He trusted that the House would bear in mind, that during the last twenty years there had been four decisive proofs, at four distinct periods, that under the present system of currency, the principle of convertibility was endangered. The first was in 1825, when the Bank was exposed to the greatest danger, brought on not altogether by the increase of country bank paper, but because there had been a great increase of the circulation at a time when, if the effects of the exchanges had been properly attended to, there ought to have been a reduction. In 1832, again there was a panic in the commercial world, and the bank was again endangered; and the circumstances under which the danger was then averted, if he were to enter into an explanation of them were of such a nature as only to confirm the principles which he was now contending for. In 1837 and 1839, there were fresh panics, attended by similar circumstances. The Manchester chamber of commerce declared that those distresses were consequent upon the fluctuations in the circulating medium of the country, and added, that from this cause there had been a loss upon five articles of manufacture, including woollen and hardware, of £40,000,000 of capital. The hon. member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden) gave evidence before the committee of the enormous amount of loss of capital, and of moral and social misery which had been the result within a very short period of these fluctuations. The hon. member for Paisley referred to the year 1839, and asked what they could do if such a state of things were to come again, and the bullion in the bank were reduced from £9,000,000 to £2,000,000? Now, to this, he (Sir R. Peel) answered that he hoped that the Bank of England by acting on the principles of this measure, would avert the possibility of such an occurrence. In 1839, the Bank of England had to lean for assistance upon the Bank of France, tending to introduce confusion and embarrassment into the monetary affairs of this country. Therefore, in twenty years, proofs had from time to time been afforded that the present system was objectionable. It was the duty of the government to propose measures which they thought would be effectual for the amendment of that system; and yet taking care not to harm existing interests. They knew the difficulties they might have to contend with, if a combination of personal interests were permitted to prevail, but they had acted from a sense of public duty, and to all the great principles of the measure before the House they steadily adhered. If difficulties were thrown in its way the House must make itself responsible for them, and not the government, if the present measure failed and a period of increased issue again arrived. If that should happen, and again unwarranted speculation should ensue from that increased issue, ministers would have the satisfaction of reflecting that they had given the advice, and taken the course which they thought best calculated to avert the evil. They were not wild enough to suppose that this measure would prevent all undue speculation or ensure an invariable paper currency; but there was a species of speculation dependent on an undue issue of paper, which they hoped the measure would check. Speculation could not be prevented in a commercial community, but it might be aggravated by a species of paper credit within the power of parliament; and though ministers did not hope nor aim at checking legitimate speculation—though they admitted that they could not prevent illegitimate speculation, which was, perhaps, necessarily incident to mercantile enterprise, particularly in a country like this—still they asked parliament by assenting to this measure, not to aggravate evils it could not control, nor refuse to check those which came properly within its jurisdiction. Amendment negatived, and the bill read a second time.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

JUNE 17, 1844.

On the Order of the Day being read for the House to resolve itself into committee on the Sugar Duties bill—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said—Sir, it is probable that the House expects from me some statement of the course which her Majesty's government propose to pursue under the circumstances in which they are placed by the vote of Friday night on the Sugar Duties, and assuming that I am right in respect to the wishes of the House as regards the statement I am prepared to make, probably the House will allow me to make it when the House shall have resolved itself into committee, and Mr. Greene is in the Chair.

House in committee.

On the 1st clause—(" That the duties imposed by Acts 6 and 7, William IV., c. 26, and 3rd and 4th Victoria, c. 17, be continued till the 5th day of July, 1845)—and on the question that the words proposed by Mr. Miles be added, viz.:—" To leave out from the words 'continued until the' to the end of the clause, in order to add the words 10th day of November, 1844, and that from and after that date, until the 5th day of July, 1845, in lieu of the duties now payable thereon, there shall be charged the duties of customs following; that is to say," &c.—

Sir Robert Peel spoke as follows: Sir, I propose now, with the permission of the committee, to put it in possession of the views which her Majesty's government entertain with respect to the effect of the decision of Friday last on the subject of the Sugar Duties, and to state the course which it is their intention to pursue. Preliminary to that statement of their intention, the committee will, I am sure, permit me to refer in the first instance to the course her Majesty's government have pursued in the present year in relation to the financial policy of the country, and the considerations which have induced them to take that course, and to refer especially to the views they entertain upon the subject of those particular duties which are imposed upon foreign and colonial sugar. Sir, the opinions we entertain upon the subject of the sugar duties are those which we have entertained for several years—views which we expressed when we were opponents of her Majesty's government, which we have avowed since we have been intrusted with power, and which at the present time we still entertain and intend to act upon. We are of opinion that the ordinary considerations which determine matters of financial and commercial policy do not apply to the particular article of sugar. We find that with respect to the slave-trade this country has adopted a particular line of action, from which it may be inferred that this country considers the continuance of the slave-trade one of the greatest evils and curses by which humanity can be afflicted. We have treaties with foreign powers by which they are engaged to co-operate with us in the suppression of the slave-trade. Under ordinary circumstances we are ready to admit that the regulation not only of the internal affairs of countries, but of their commercial relations and interests generally, is within the province of the exclusive jurisdiction of each independent state. But we have engaged other powers by special treaties to co-operate with us for the suppression of the slave-trade, though the chief onus of the attempt to suppress it has fallen on this country. The legislature has thought itself justified by a general regard for the interests of humanity to aim at the suppression of the slave-trade and the extinction of slavery. In our own dominions the legislature has thought itself justified by considerations wholly apart from any interested motives—by considerations of general humanity—to call on the country to make a great sacrifice, not only for the suppression of the slave-trade, but for the abolition of slavery. The country voted without reluctance £20,000,000, for compensation for the abolition of slavery in the British dominions. At the present day a great annual expenditure is incurred on the coast of Africa and in other parts of the world by this country for the suppression of the slave-trade, that expenditure not being intended to benefit any part of our own dominions, but to put down a trade carried on for the supposed advantage of other parties with whose domestic institutions we have no right to interfere. In the course of the last session of parliament we passed an act prohibiting—or at least enforcing additional penalties against—the application of British capital to enterprises carried on in foreign countries through the medium of slavery, and encouraging the slave-trade. Both Houses of parliament concurred in that act, extending it to all the dominions of the Queen, and visiting with heavy penalties all those subjects of her Majesty who in Brazil or Cuba, or any other place, made use of their capital to encourage the slave-trade. We have, therefore, I conceive, by the whole tenor of our policy, given conclusive proof that this country is governed with respect to the slave-trade by a different principle from that which regulates every other kind of commercial transaction. When her Majesty's present government were in opposition in the year 1839, we supported those who were then in power in resisting the proposal then made by the present member for Dumfries, the effect of which, if it had met the sanction of the House, would have been to reduce the protective duty on foreign sugar, as compared with British colonial sugar, to the amount of 12s. That proposal was resisted by the noble lord, the member for London, and his colleagues in the government, upon grounds which I have before quoted; and in quoting which I am sure the right hon. gentleman opposite, then President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Labouchere,) will do me the justice to say that I did not use them in the way of taunt, or as supposing that the declaration then made presumed that they placed any impediment in the way of a reconsideration of the Sugar duties at some other time. I do not refer to them again, except for the purpose of showing that a very high and respected authority did entertain opinions with respect to the slave trade, not very different from those we have subsequently adopted. The right hon. gentleman, whose opinion I am about to quote, did not profess to be permanently bound by his opinions; still he did state, as I now state, that in determining matters connected with the slave-trade we were bound to be regulated by other considerations than those which governed us in ordinary financial and commercial operations. In 1840, in opposing the motion of the present hon. member for Dumfries, the right hon. gentleman, the then President of the board of trade, who had been asked, why he consented to take slave grown tobacco and cotton if he refused to take slave-grown sugar, said—"He was not prepared to say that upon this subject the course of legislation in England had been consistent; but he thought that a broad distinction was to be drawn between the importation of sugar and the importation of tobacco and cotton. It was to be borne in mind, that the two latter commodities did not enter into competition with any similar articles raised by free labour in our own colonies."

The right hon. gentleman also stated, that a great experiment had then been recently made in the West Indies, and referred also to some extraordinary and temporary causes of depression in the colonies; but stated that he was unwilling to interfere with the success of the measure for the extinction of slavery in our British colonial possessions, by opening the floodgates to a supply of foreign sugar, which would inundate the British market, and materially interfere with the prospect of a successful termination of that experiment. Whether the views we still entertain on this subject be well founded or not, at least they are consistent views—views which we did entertain, and which we avowed and acted on when we were opposed to the right hon. gentleman. They appeared to receive a sanction also from the very high authority of a gentleman whose name I have never mentioned without accompanying it with professions of respect for his opinions on all matters of finance—I mean Mr. Deacon Hume. That gentleman was the advocate of the removal of the restrictions on the trade in corn, and he was the decided opponent of the protective system; he was the authority of all others who has given the most express and positive opinions, deriving great weight from his official situation and connection with the government, in favour of unrestricted commerce and the abolition of protection. Mr. Hume himself did except this article of sugar and the slave trade from the ordinary principles which should govern the commercial regulations. He said—"I cannot conceive; after our having thirty years ago abolished the slave-trade, and after having abolished slavery itself, that any question of free trade can arise as regards Cuba—with her abundance of rich soil, not only having the advantage of a population of slaves, but notoriously importing the enormous amount of 40,000 to 50,000 slaves annually, having in fact both the slave-trade and slavery—when the law has deprived the planter of the means of raising his produce. I consider the question as altogether taken out of the category of free trade."

Those were the opinions of Mr. Deacon Hume, delivered so recently as the year 1840, at a time when he was the advocate of the abolition of all restrictions. Her Majesty's government entertain the same opinions; they think, that to expose the British planter, who has neither the advantage—if it be an advantage of slavery—nor still less of the slave trade, to the necessity of competing with Brazil and Cuba, spots the most favoured by nature for the production of sugar—the parts of the world, containing probably the most of rich and virgin soil, and with a climate peculiarly adapted to the production of sugar:—we entertain Mr. Hume's opinion—that if you prohibit the slave-trade and abolish slavery, it does require the most mature consideration before you subject the British planter to competition with countries possessed of such facilities for increased production. We have the most conclusive proofs that our endeavours to extirpate the slave-trade in Cuba and Brazil have been ineffectual; that the public mind of those countries is not opposed to the continuance of that system, but that it exists to a frightful extent; and we still entertain the opinion that to admit the sugar of those countries on the same terms that we admit the sugar of Manilla, and that we shall admit that of China, would be unjust to the British planter. Remember too in considering this question that it was but comparatively recent that the House, by an unanimous resolution, addressed the Crown to enforce the regulations as to slavery and the slave-trade; that the Crown has acted on that address so far as to make increased pecuniary exertion to suppress the slave-trade, and that the feeling manifested on that occasion was such as to leave no doubt that, in the opinion of the House of Commons, considerations of expense were subordinate to the great object of suppressing the slave-trade, we certainly think that the opening the British market to the sugar of Brazil and Cuba would give an increased stimulus to the slave-trade as carried on in those countries and on the coast of Africa, aggravating the status of slavery, and that, therefore, after such public professions, it would be inconsistent so to open our markets to that slave-grown sugar. We are not insensible to those considerations—at least we attach due weight to them—urged by the opponents of protection, that the admission of sugar the growth of free labour would give, though not a direct, yet an indirect encouragement, to a certain extent, to the slave-grown sugar of Brazil and Cuba. That, certainly, may be the result at first; but I cannot help entertaining the opinion that, if you will encourage the protection of sugar the growth of free labour in such countries as Manilla and Java, and perhaps in China, you will by that give a permanent encouragement to the production of free-grown sugar—that, though there may in the mean time be a temporary increase of the produce of Brazil and Cuba, yet that the encouragement you will give will ultimately tend to prove that free-grown sugar can compete favourably with slave-grown sugar, and that you will thus be striking a blow, indirectly but effectually, at the slave-trade, and by those means tend to ameliorate the condition of the slaves themselves. Sir, these are the general grounds on which we still entertain the opinion that though it may be safe with respect to the West India interests to permit a limited and qualified competition of sugar the produce of free-labour, yet that it will be dangerous to those interests to admit, as the noble lord proposed at a differential duty of 10s., only the sugar of Brazil and Cuba, and that it would be inconsistent with the course this country has taken, and the declarations we have made, on the subject of slavery and the slave trade. I do not wish to provoke any controversy, but merely to state the grounds on which her Majesty's government have formed their conclusions, and on which they are prepared to act. With these opinions, the question upon which we had to decide at the commencement of the present year was this—what course shall we pursue with respect to the admission of foreign sugar? Of course I do not ask hon. gentlemen to acquiesce in my views, and to make a distinction between slave-labour sugar and free-labour sugar. I only ask them to allow me to assume, for the sake of argument, that my opinions are correct in supposing that there is to be a distinction made. Entertaining those opinions, then, what course ought we, consistently with our public duty, to pursue with respect to the admission of foreign sugar? As bearing on the question, an event of considerable importance is to occur this year. On the 10th of November, 1844, the existing treaty with Brazil will expire. Previously to that day it is most difficult for a government, entertaining the opinions we do to deal at all with the question of sugar, because Brazil is entitled, by the engagements of the existing treaty, to have her produce received in the markets of this country on the footing of the most favoured nations. There is no qualification—it is an equivalent condition—the engagement is express and absolute. The produce of Brazil must, with respect to duty, be admitted on the same footing as the produce of Manilla or of Java; but on the 10th of November in this year, that state of things will cease. We therefore considered, at the commencement of this year, what course it would be our duty to take. It has been said that it would have been more advisable, if instead of postponing the consideration of that great question—which must be considered previously to the expiration of the Income-tax—we had declared our general financial and commercial views this session; and that, supposing they had led to the conclusion that there ought to be a continuance of the Income-tax, accompanied by further modifications of the tariff, and greater reductions in the import duties on foreign articles, it would better have been made in the present year than have deferred any proposal we might have to make until the next. Now, I will state to the House the reasons which induced us to think it our duty to postpone the consideration of the general financial condition of the country, as connected and interwoven with the renewal of the Income-tax, until next year. We thought it most desirable, that the House, before coming to a decision on so important a question as the renewal of the Income-tax, and many other questions necessarily depending upon it, should be in possession of the greatest and fullest experience as to the effect of those alterations in the customs duties which were made in 1842, when the Income-tax was proposed. Many of those duties did not take effect until within a rather recent period. But, if we are to decide that great and important question of the renewal of the Income-tax, it would be most advantageous to us to know the result of the past reductions of the customs duties. In the case of the timber duties, the experience of their effect is very deficient, because, in the case of timber, as to some of the most important articles in respect of which reductions were made, the whole alteration did not take effect till the month of October last; therefore, we have now only a very limited period from which to determine the effect of the reductions in the timber duties. There has also been, for some months past, decided indications of an increased demand for industry, and of greater employment among the manufacturing and working classes generally, that cannot be considered as an evidence of increasing and returning prosperity as far as the trade and manufactures of the country are concerned. I am sure I am expressing the earnest wish of this House that these indications may be significant of permanent improvement. At the same time we have on former occasions been deceived by delusive indications of returning prosperity, and there are some who still think that these indications cannot be relied on. But this, in my opinion, constitutes a decisive reason why, before reviewing the whole of our commercial policy, and why, before taking into our consideration the renewal or the abandonment of the Income-tax, or whatever other financial course we might think advisable, sufficient time should elapse in order that we might be enabled to judge of the effect of the alterations then made. But there was another and a still more conclusive reason for postponing until next year the consideration of the Income-tax. We had no alternative in the present year, as we had reason to believe at the commencement of the session, but to draw the attention of the House to two other great financial questions, which probably would press in the course of the present session for immediate discussion. The one was the reduction of the interest on the three-and-a-half per cent. stock—an operation, from the amount of that stock, by far the greatest that has been undertaken in modern times, and the failure of which would have been to every interest most unfortunate. We had also no alternative but to bring forward a proposal of the greatest importance, which I have had, as the organ of government, the honour of submitting to this House, namely, the measure for the renewal of the bank charter, the regulation of joint-stock banks, and of the system of paper circulation in this country. We foresaw at the commencement of the session that there was every prospect that both these measures would undergo consideration. Seeing also the mass of legislation, which I freely admit was left undisposed of at the end of last session, and which pressed for decision in the course of the present,—the necessity of proposing the reduction of the interest of the three-and-a-half per cent. stock, and the other necessity of proposing a measure for the regulation of the bank charter, induced us to think that it was not desirable to call the attention of the House to another measure of the greatest financial and commercial importance, namely, the question of the renewal or discontinuance of the Income-tax. There was a third reason also for postponing the measure till next year, which, in our opinion was equally conclusive. How were we to deal with the question of the admission of foreign sugar? To propose the continuance of the Income-tax, and make no proposal on the subject of sugar, would probably not have conciliated the approval of the House of Commons. I doubt whether the House would not almost have considered a proposal respecting the sugar duties a necessary condition of the renewal of the Income-tax. It was impossible for us, pending the treaty with Brazil, to make that proposal. Supposing in the month of March we had brought on the question of the Income-tax and the sugar duties, and proposed in that month any considerable reduction of the duties on sugar, Brazil would have been entitled until November, 1844, to share in all the advantages of that reduction, and would have had a positive claim to admit her sugar into the market of this country with the advantage of whatever reduction would have been made. Now, from the combined operation of these three reasons, I think any gentleman who permits me to assume that we are right in making a distinction between free-labour sugar and slave-labour sugar, will admit that we had no alternative but to postpone the consideration of any very extensive measure in respect to the sugar duties until our discretion was unfettered, so far as Brazil was concerned, by the termination of the treaty. We therefore did resolve deliberately not to ask the House to pronounce an opinion in the course of the present session with respect to the continuance of the Income-tax. At the same time, we felt it to be our duty to make a proposition to the House on the subject of the sugar duties. We saw indications of a rising price. The price of sugar at the commencement of the spring was about 2s. higher per cwt. than the average of the last two years. There were reasons to apprehend that there might be a deficient supply. In the month of November, 1844, the period would arrive when we should be at liberty to deal with the question of free-labour sugar. The only monopoly that remains almost is that of sugar. ["Corn, Corn."] I do not wish to provoke discussion. I am making a statement of a very important kind, and I wish studiously to avoid saying anything which is capable of contradiction in the way of argument, still less that can provoke angry controversy. But, certainly, of the great articles of consumption in this country, the only one in respect of which an unqualified monopoly exists is sugar. On the article of foreign sugar there is a duty of three guineas, which operates as an exclusion of that produce from our market. We thought, therefore, it was our duty to avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of proposing a measure we thought might be passed without detriment to the interest of the West-India Colonies, with advantage to the community at large, and without injury to the revenue; namely, to break down the monopoly as far as this—to admit sugar the produce of the same description of labour which the West-Indians could command, namely, free-labour sugar, to competition with West-India sugar; and we resolved to propose that, after the 10th of November next, the whole extent of the protecting duty between Colonial sugar and free-labour sugar should not exceed 10s. We thought that if at this period of the year, when there is an increased demand for sugar, there should be a deficient supply—if the expectations of an abundant supply from our own colonies should be disappointed—if the price should suddenly rise, there being an increased demand for the commodity, on account of increasing industry in the manufacturing districts—we did think that the West-India interest would not be benefited by such a rise in price, and that it would be for their advantage, as well as that of the consumer, to take a security at least against any rapid and considerable increase in price. We, therefore, resolved not to diminish the duty on sugar the produce of our own colonies, but, the very earliest moment at which we could deal with free-labour sugar, without giving any corresponding right of admission to slave-grown sugar—to permit this qualified competition. We had another reason for dealing with this question in the present year. We wished the producers of free-labour sugar to know what were the opinions and intentions of parliament. We wished them to be assured whether parliament intended to confine the competition to free-labour sugar, and whether parliament would sanction government in establishing a distinction between free-labour and slave-grown sugar. It became most important to our views that early notice should be given that in China, in Manilla, in Java, the present producers of sugar, and the capitalist, inclined to speculate in the increased production of sugar, should know what were the intentions of the British government, in order that at any future period there might be the means of competition with sugar the produce of our own colonies; and the desire, therefore, to take a security against increased price, and the desire that early notice should be given in the countries which were to be the competing countries with colonial sugar, induced us to resolve not to postpone beyond November 9th, 1844, the admission of that description of foreign sugar into our own market. I am bound to say that, notwithstanding the discussions which have taken place, we adhere to our opinions. We believe the course we have proposed to be more safe for the revenue, and advantageous for the consumer here, and, so far from being detrimental to the West-Indian interest likely to promote the enlarged and permanent advantage of the West-Indian body. In submitting that measure, however, to the consideration of the House we were met, in the first instance, by the amendment of the noble lord (J. Russell), who proposed that slave-labour sugar should be admitted into competition with colonial sugar upon the same terms on which free-labour sugar should be admitted. The noble lord, assuming our distinction, proposed that a duty of 34*s.* should be indiscriminately applied to sugar, the produce of any country, without reference to the source whence it was derived, or the kind of labour by which it was produced. The noble lord took a division on that point, and the proposal of the government in that respect was affirmed by a considerable majority. On a subsequent stage of the proceedings we were, however, met with a counter-proposal on the part of the West-India body. It was proposed by an hon. friend of mine—the hon. member for Bristol (Mr. Miles)—that there should be a departure from the scheme of the government,—that instead of the relative amounts of sugar being as we proposed (24*s.* and 34*s.* from November next), my hon. friend proposed, and the House implied an opinion, I presume, that his scheme was preferable to ours [“No, no.”]—well, an opinion adverse to our proposal—my hon. friend proposed, that instead of the relative duties being 24*s.* and 34*s.* the relative duties should be 20*s.* and 30*s.*: that there should be from the 10th of November next, a reduction of duty on British sugar to 20*s.*, and that from the same day there should be a discriminating duty as respects certain descriptions of sugar called white clayed sugar, or sugar equivalent to white clayed sugar, to the extent of 14*s.* His proposal limited the protecting duty on sugar of all descriptions to 10*s.*, and with respect to a particular description of sugar, that there should be a protecting duty of 14*s.* Her Majesty's government have, as was their duty, considered the proposal of my hon. friend. Acting, I trust, not under the influence of temper or disappointment at being in a minority, they have maturely considered the proposal which I still must think, if the government were inclined to adopt it, would probably meet with the sanction of the House, because I cannot help thinking there must have been some understanding, that hon. gentlemen whom I see opposite were, many of them at least, to support the proposal of my hon. friend. [“No, no.”] I don't say that the vote given the other night at all involved any obligation to support it, but certainly I inferred that there was an understanding that the proposal of my hon. friend was to receive support from the other side of the House, as opposed to the proposal of the government. [Mr. Roebuck: “No.”] The hon. and learned gentleman is under no such objection, having expressed his opposition to it. I do not say that the other side of the House, generally, is under the least obligation to support it; but I certainly do entertain the opinion that many gentlemen on that side of the House were prepared to support the motion of my hon. friend as contradistinguished from the proposal of the government. I do not say that the vote itself binds any gentleman, but certainly it gave reason to suppose that there was, on the part of many, a disposition to support the proposition of my hon. friend, as opposed to the motion of the government. I will now, Sir, assign the reasons why her Majesty's government, after mature consideration, notwithstanding the vote come to the other night, retain their original opinions, and are not prepared to adopt the motion of my hon. friend. They cannot acquiesce in that motion as a mode of escaping from the difficulties in which they may be placed, because, on additional and more mature consideration in the interval, they disapprove of that proposition, and they think their own original proposition preferable for every interest in this country. My hon. friend proposes that there shall be from the 10th of November next a prospective reduction of duty. We think prospective reductions of duty, to take effect from a certain defined period, are objectionable in principle. We think that the consumer will derive little advantage from that reduction of duty, that the revenue will be subjected to loss, and that the West-India interest will not be the party that will benefit by the increase of price which will take place in the meantime. We think it not impossible, if the market is to be supplied until the 10th of November at the present rate of duty, with a certainty that on the 10th of November there will be a diminished rate of duty—at this period of the year, which is a very critical one as respects the Sugar Duties (the period of the year when there is an increased demand for sugar on account of the prevailing habit of preserving fruits and the making of home-made wine)—we think that at this particular period there will be an observable increased demand and an increased price, on account of the unwillingness of retailers of sugar to take out supplies in the interval between the present day and the month of November, when there will be a known reduction of duty to a certain prescribed and definite amount. We think the West-India interest will not benefit by that increased price, but that those grocers and retailers who may happen to have ample supplies of sugar will refuse to increase their stock, but will increase their demand on the public. In the course of this day I have looked at the effect that was produced by our proposal for the reduction of the timber duties from a certain date. At the instance of those who had stocks in hand, in conformity with what appeared to be the general concurrence of the House, in order to give the opportunity of disposing of the stock in hand, we altered our original plan, in 1842, in respect to the timber duties, and provided that in the month of October, 1842, there should be certain known reductions of the duties on Baltic timber. The measure of reduction was to receive its completion, and the duties, which were to continue permanent, were to take effect from the 5th of October, 1843. I have attempted to ascertain what was the effect, on the timber duties, the demand for timber, and what was the effect on the revenue by the prospective reduction of the duty on timber; and for that purpose I compared the amount of duty received in the quarters ending the 10th of October, 1841, and the 5th of January, 1842, with the produce of the two corresponding quarters—the 10th of October, 1843, and the 5th of January, 1844. I omit 1842, because the duties then were in a state of change. I think the fairest period for comparison is between 1841 and 1843, there being in 1841 no notice of a reduction in the timber duties. In the quarter ending the 10th of October, 1841, the total amount of timber duty received by the Exchequer was £646,000, and in the quarter ending on the 5th of January, 1842, the following quarter, the total amount of timber duty was £292,000. The proportion, therefore, of the timber duty received in the one quarter to the other was, taking the centesimal form of expression, as 100 to 45; showing that the quarter ending the 10th of October was that in which the great demand was made for foreign timber. In October, 1843, the new duty was to take effect, and the total amount received in the October quarter was only £158,000, instead of £646,000; but in the following quarter, from the 5th of January, 1844, the amount of duty paid, when the duties were settled and it was known what amount of duty was to be paid, when there was no withholding of supply in order to pay a diminished duty, the receipts of the Exchequer were £268,000, as compared with £158,000, that is to say, the proportion which had been in 1841, 100 to 45, was changed in the two quarters when the remission of duty was expected, and after it had taken place, from 100 to 45 to 100 to 169—showing what the effect was of a prospective reduction of duty on any article. There was diminished demand for the article—diminished payments into the exchequer—parties waiting till they could take advantage of the diminished duty, and then, having got the diminished duty, the supply was taken out in the ordinary way. Now the amount of reduction in the timber duty made by the tariff was about one-sixth of the previously existing duty; it very nearly corresponds with the proportionate amount of reduction proposed by my hon. friend. He proposes to make a reduction, on the 10th of November next, of about one-sixth of the present duty. My opinion is, that although I am willing to admit that the stocks of timber are much larger than the stocks of sugar, yet still I think it highly probable that the same results will follow—that there will be a limitation of supply in the sugar market for the five months that will elapse before the 10th of November next, that there will be increased price, and that that increased price will not go into the pocket of the West-India proprietor, the object of your sympathy—that there will be increased loss to the revenue, loss to the consumer, and no benefit, except to the retailer, who has no particular claim on your protection. I therefore retain my opinion that this prospective reduction of duty, to take effect from November next, is unwise. I know it is said that we ourselves encourage an expectation that at no distant period the sugar duties may be reconsidered. I apprehend that any such expectation as this, contingent on the continuance of the Income-tax, would produce a very different effect on the market from the notoriety that upon a certain day, the 10th of November next, an amount of duty named also is to apply to a given article. If any evil arises from the vague expectation that the sugar duty may possibly, dependent on certain contingencies, be reviewed, notwithstanding the declamations and sarcasms of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the present government will not be the only one that is chargeable with having made prospective changes of duties. I have heard the right hon. gentleman opposite, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, more than once, when the late government were charged with taking the West Indian interests by surprise, say, that the late Lord Sydenham, in 1839, gave them notice that they must expect a revision of the sugar duties at a very early period; and that was his vindication for proposing in 1841 the measure that he had even proposed the year preceding, still falling back upon the prior motion of Lord Sydenham's. Thus the former government cannot be said to have always accompanied the word with the blow, for they told the West Indians long beforehand to prepare for the blow, as they felt themselves under the necessity of making a general statement that parties must be prepared for a reduction of the sugar duties. But we have said nothing more than that which must be notorious—that the Income-tax will expire in the course of next year, and that when it does expire the question of its renewal or discontinuance must be accompanied by the consideration of the sugar duties. Therefore, I must contend that the effect of a prospective reduction to a definite amount at a declared period would be totally different, in respect to the dealings in the commodity affected, from vague, general declarations that next year the subject must be reconsidered. But, Sir, upon another ground that government cannot acquiesce in the proposition of the hon. gentleman. We cannot agree to a proposal that there shall be a discriminating duty of 1*s.* in favour of certain species of colonial sugar. I will not now enter into the question whether or not there should be a classification of sugar according to certain processes of manufacture; all I contend for is this—that if this classification be desirable it ought to be universal in its application—that in justice to the consumer, if you classify sugar the produce of foreign countries, you should classify sugar the produce of our colonies. I am of that opinion, because there is as great a variation in the quality of sugar the produce of your own colonies as there is in the quality of sugar the produce of foreign countries; and there is as much of injustice in subjecting the coarser description of sugar to a competition with sugar of the highest qualities, each being the produce of our own colonies, at an equal rate of duty, as there is in subjecting your own sugar to competition at an equal rate of duty with sugar the produce of foreign countries. The inferior classes of colonial will compete with the inferior of other countries. The superior classes of the colonial will enter into competition with the superior classes of foreign countries. I cannot, therefore, admit the justice of making the classification in the case of foreign sugar unless you are prepared to make it equally in the case of our own sugar. And, therefore (if we ever came to that part of the proposal of my hon. friend,) the government retain their original opinion; and cannot consent to seek an escape from their present difficulties by undertaking to give an increased protection to the West Indian interests. My opinions, Sir, upon the effect of sugar duties are worth very little; they can only be formed upon general reasoning. The effect, for instance, of a prospective reduction of duty can be only estimated by watching the effect of such a measure respecting other commodities. But I have received by post this morning from a high practical authority a strong confirmation of the views I have expressed on this subject—that there is danger in a prospective reduction of duty, and that there is no sufficient ground for a discriminating duty in favour of the "white clayed sugar" of our colonies. From this letter I will read some extracts:—"Having been extensively engaged in the sugar trade for the last twenty years, and latterly having 'turned over' nearly £1,000,000 per annum, I venture to submit an opinion. Of course I am, in common with all other consumers and dealers, anxious to see the duties on all foreign, and more particularly colonial sugar, reduced as low as possible; but I am quite certain, if the proposition of the hon. member for Bristol be carried as it stands, it will be most injurious to all parties interested, as well as to the revenue; for no one will deal in an article that is certain to be cheaper in November. I would likewise strongly advise you to place the same extra duty of 4*s.* on the better qualities of colonial sugar which the hon. gentleman proposes to put on white clayed free-labour sugar, as it is well known that extensive refineries have been recently erected near Calcutta and other places, for the purpose of making a fine sugar very nearly equal to the refined, but just so much under it as to be admitted at the other rate of duty. And this has so far already superseded the use of the refined, or lump sugar, that in Scotland none other hardly is bought. And this fine crystallized sugar is made in Demerara, and now sells at 70s., while the brown Muscovado sells, at 56s. duty paid."

Now, observe the brown Muscovado selling at 56s. is exposed to competition with sugar of our own colonies, worth 70s., at exactly the same rate of duty. The produce of those processes of manufacture, the result of the application of capital, are brought into our market in competition with the ordinary produce of the West Indian colonists at the same rate of duty. You propose to make no distinction there. But you do propose the discrimination in respect to foreign, which you do not admit as to your own sugar. Why, if this very fine sugar, worth 70s., is admitted at the same rate of duty as that worth only 56s., should not the same rule be adopted in the case of the sugar of Java and Manilla? Why should not the finer description of sugars the produce of Java and Manilla compete with our fine sugars at a 10s. discriminating duty, in the same way as the coarser kind of our sugar, of the value of 56s., comes into competition with the foreign article? These are the grounds on which her Majesty's government do not think it would be just to vote for the discriminating duty in favour of clayed sugar proposed in the resolution of my hon. friend, which gives a protecting duty of 14s. We cannot, therefore, assent, to the proposal of my hon. friend, because we entertain, after reconsideration, a decided preference in favour of our own plan. We do not think the measure which he proposes is one which ought to receive the assent of the House, and it is not, therefore, in our power to vote for it on its merits. Sir, I do not hesitate to admit that, differing as we do from my hon. friend on the merits of his proposition, there are also political grounds which make it impossible for me, on the part of the government, to undertake the responsibility of supporting him. It was said that no very material difference existed between the proposal of her Majesty's government and that of my hon. friend; that in respect to one class of sugar he proposed the same amount of protecting duty, and that, therefore, we might without difficulty adopt the amendment of my hon. friend. If it be a matter of unimportance we are disinclined to adopt it. It was carried by a combination of those who generally support us with those who are our political opponents. If the measure, I repeat, be an unimportant one, in proportion to its unimportance, is it significant of a want of confidence in our administration? ["No, no."] If you can effect a great public object, that is a reason for proposing an alteration in the plan of the government; but if you cannot effect any important object,—if there be no great difference in the value of the two propositions, then I say the concurrence between our political opponents and our political friends has a bearing on our position as the executive government of this empire. It does in our opinion require us to resist it by all the means in our power, and if acquiesced in by us, it would be an encouragement of similar combinations. I do not believe, Sir—I cannot believe, that the concurrence in that vote was a casual occurrence, arising out of our debate on the subject. I may be wrong, but my impression is, that it was a preconcerted arrangement between some of those who oppose and some of those who support us. When my hon. friend—of course a word from him would be sufficient to destroy this delusion in my mind, if delusion it be, but I will tell him why I believe the vote was the result of a concert between some of those who support and some of those who oppose us,—I am not complaining. [Laughter.] No, but I have a right to observe upon such a combination. I do not deny the right of hon. gentlemen, if they think fit, to enter into such combinations. I do not condescend to deprecate such a proceeding; but I think I have a right to consider what bearing the result has upon the position of the government, when I am determining whether I will acquiesce in an unimportant proposition, as an amendment to a plan of the government, carried by a combination such as I have alluded to. I am not, I repeat, denying the right of the two parties so to combine. Into that I enter not. But I claim for myself the right—and I mean to exercise it!—the right of determining what effect, upon my position as a minister of the Crown, my acquiescence in the arrangement proposed would produce. Sir, when my hon. friend originally gave notice of his amendment, it was to this effect—that he should propose a reduction of duty on British colonial sugar, to the amount of 20s. My hon. friend indicated no intention at that time, to reduce the duty on foreign sugar from 34s. to 30s.; consequently, according to the original notice of my hon. friend, the amount of protection for all sugar was 14s. The noble lord, the member for the city of London, had then made a motion which proposed only a protecting duty of 10s. on all foreign sugars—namely, 24s. and 34s.; and my hon. friend, it afterwards appeared, amended his proposition, and took as the amount of protecting duty for all sugars not 14s. but 10s. That was the proposal made by my hon. friend. My hon. friend said, that after he had made his proposal, the West-India body, being somewhat alarmed by my hon. friend indicating the amount of protection which he thought sufficient, had quarrelled with him for not taking a higher amount of protection than 10s.; and, fearing that the expression of the opinion of the West-India body, as represented by my hon. friend, might be hereafter quoted against them, my hon. friend was induced to alter his plan, alleging that the forms of the House prevented him from establishing a greater distinction in the discriminating duty. Sir, my hon. friend is quite wrong on that point, because nothing could have been more easy for my hon. friend—if it had suited his views and those of all his supporters—than to have adhered to his original proposition of establishing a duty of 14s., which he could have done in perfect conformity with the orders of the House, and with no probability of being checked by your vigilance, he might have contrived so to have shaped his motion, that he might have established his protection to the amount of 14s., and thus avoided the risk of embarrassment of which he professed such apprehension. But my hon. friend being invited to state whether he could make any relaxation in that part of his proposal which referred to the duty on “white clayed” sugar, I think intimated that he was not prepared to exercise any discretion on the subject, and that he was determined to adhere to the diminished duty of 10s. on the one hand, and the increased protection of 14s. on the other. Sir, I am not inclined, I hope, to be mortified, or to complain of the language used in the course of debate with respect to us, who, as ministers, have to endure with silence, if not with patience, the harshest expressions. I cannot, however, altogether forget the terms in which my hon. friends the mover and seconder of the amendment recommended it to the consideration of the House. Without feeling the slightest ill temper, I am only remarking on the bearing which the proceedings have upon the position of the government. My hon. friend said we had indicated an intention to “sacrifice” the colonial interests; and the first proof he adduced of this was our abolition of the duty on the importation of wool, by which, he said, though it did not interfere with the home produce, we had struck a blow at the Australian interests. I have the satisfaction of stating to my hon. friend, that since the abolition of the duty on foreign wool, there has been a considerable sale of Australian wool, which took place, I think, three or four days since; and I have been assured by an hon. gentleman, who sits on that (the opposition) side of the House, that there never was a brisker sale of Australian wool; and that the rise in the price of such wool, since the reduction of the duty on foreign wool, as compared with the price of Australian wool before the reduction, was greater within the same period than had almost ever been known. So that my hon. friend must give up his argument as to the blow inflicted on our Australian colonies. Then my hon. friend said, we had now “thrown off the mask,” naturally attempting to induce the agriculturists to co-operate with him in revising the sugar duties. Then, my hon. friend made a distinct appeal to the noble lord opposite, declaring he was prepared to combine with him for the purpose of rescuing the colonists from the evils with which they were threatened by her Majesty’s government—making the appeal to the noble lord with the knowledge that the noble lord was prepared to abolish all discriminations in duty between foreign sugar and colonial. Again the hon. member for Inverness improved upon my hon. friend, declaring our course “vacillating and tortuous,” and that the West-Indian interests “could have no confidence in our intentions.” He, also, made an appeal to the hon. gentlemen opposite for the support which they apparently willingly conceded. But, further, and which is more important, and there are occasions on which the most perfect frankness should be shown—the hon. members did, I think, intimate that in their opinion the distinction should no longer be made between free and slave-grown foreign sugar. Sir, these are occasions on which one must speak with perfect unreserve. What are the reasons which induce me—be the consequences what they may—to decline acquiescing in the proposal of my hon. friend? My hon. friend did, I think, say, that certificates of origin would be no security against fraud. If my hon. friend was justified in the observations which he made, I think there would be for him scarcely any alternative but the admission of all foreign sugar at an equal rate of duty, or the maintenance intact of the present monopoly. My hon. friend is of opinion, and regards this as a radical defect in our plan, that certificates of origin offer no security against fraud. If that be so I cannot see how he escapes the conclusion that all foreign sugars ought to be admitted indiscriminately, or that, in order to avert that calamity, we ought to maintain the existing law. The hon. member who seconded my hon. friend I think expressed himself in still more decisive terms as to the impolicy of maintaining a distinction between free-labour and slave-grown sugar. My hon. friend I understand to give an opinion that he would prefer the free admission of all sugars, accompanied, perhaps, with an increased amount of protection to the admission of free-labour sugar, as the amount of protection proposed by her Majesty's government. To exemplify what I mean, I understand my hon. friend to prefer a protective duty, the amount I will assume only for the purpose of exemplification—that my hon. friend is of opinion that a protecting duty of 15s. to be applied to all sugars would be preferable to the 10s. duty, proposed by the government. In the course of the speeches of the two hon. members, there appears a material difference of opinion, with regard to principle, between these two hon. gentlemen and those of whom they are the organs and the government, and the government are determined that they would not be authorised in carrying such intentions into effect. That expression of opinion is an additional reason with her Majesty's government for surmising that in point of principle, as far as slave-grown sugar is concerned, there is a difference of opinion, and on that account they feel increased objection to adopt the proposition of my hon. friend. Under these circumstances the course which her Majesty's government propose to pursue is this:—The noble lord opposite (Viscount Howick) towards the close of the debate the other night invited the hon. gentleman to join with him in excluding certain words, stating, and stating very truly, that the adoption of his suggestion would not bind any one to support the particular proposal of the hon. gentleman. That if this motion were successful, those who had supported it might make any proposal they should think fit as an amendment to the proposal of my hon. friend. I am sure the noble lord would not wish to exclude her Majesty's government from the exercise of the same privilege. The noble lord made his appeal to the House with his usual tact, and it was successful. He pointed out what would be the effect of the amendment, and he said that voting for it did not bind any hon. member to the proposition of the hon. member for Bristol, but that he was perfectly at liberty to move any other amendment he thought proper. For the purpose of giving the House an opportunity of reconsidering the subject, and of determining whether any weight attaches to the reasons I have stated to the House to-night, it is the intention of the government not to accede to the proposition of my hon. friend. When the motion is made—if my hon. friend does make it, that 20s. shall be inserted as the amount of duty to take effect from the 10th of November, 1844,—I propose on that occasion to move, and to take the sense of the House on it, that 24s. be inserted; that is to say, there shall be no reduction of the duty on British colonial sugar. I shall not propose that motion merely because we believe it to be preferable to the other, but because that in carrying a measure this year on the subject of the sugar duties, it is important as indicative of your intentions next year, that the producers of sugar in countries to the eastward of the Cape, should know what will be their fate in the course of the next session with respect to the sugar duties. We do not intend to propose at any time the admission of slave-labour sugar on the same footing on which we propose to admit sugar the produce of free-labour. It may be said, "Why, then, don't you abandon your measure altogether, and propose a continuance of the existing duties until the usual period, or ending some period in the course of the next session?" I will state to the House why we do not adopt that course. Suppose we did adopt that alternative,—in the course of the next session, if we were intrusted with the government, it might be our duty to make a proposal on the subject of the sugar duties. That proposal would, of course, involve a reduction of the duties on free-labour sugar. It might involve a considerable reduction of the duty on British colonial, and a corresponding reduction of the duty upon sugar, the produce of free-labour. But, observe, if no previous notice had been given, and if you still required certificates of origin as the condition for the admission of free-labour sugar—observe the condition in which we are placed, in approaching the consideration of the sugar duties without previous notice, or without any steps having been taken by parliament. [Interruption, a general cry of "Order."] I am aware that the question is a very complicated and uninteresting one; but it is so much the more necessary that the House should grant me its kind attention, in order that they should comprehend the motives by which we have been actuated. If we had merely continued the existing sugar duties till next year, and that next year we proposed to deal extensively with the general question of sugar, in what position should we be? The noble lord would certainly be relieved from any difficulty; for he would admit sugar from all countries, and his proposition would at once take effect. But we, in our opinion of the policy and justice of discriminating between the two classes of free-grown and slave-labour sugar, should have to choose between two alternatives, either immediately to reduce the duty on British colonial to a considerable extent—and observe, in that case, what we should do—we should establish a monopoly in the British market for British colonial sugar for several months, because we should have to wait for a certificate of origin before we could admit foreign sugar. Let us assume, that in the course of a certain time (and I merely put the matter hypothetically), that we proposed a reduction of the duty on British plantation sugar to the amount of 16s., unless we could open some sources of competing supply, the British colonial producer would have a monopoly in the British market, with that reduced amount of duty, and in fact he might fix any sum he pleased. If, on the other hand, we took up the course which would ensure us a competing supply of sugar, and that we made the reduction prospective in its effect, say, at the end of eight or nine months, the consequence would be, that the arrangement would be open to all the objections of the motion of my hon. friend; it would be fixing a definite day for the duty to take effect, and the more we reduce the amount, the more we diminish the market and prevent a regular supply. On that ground I am not prepared to adopt the alternative of continuing the present sugar duties, because that would materially interfere with the general principle which we mean to pursue. I have thus, Sir, endeavoured to state as fully and as clearly as I could, the course which her Majesty's government intend to pursue, and the motives which induce them to take it; but I am not, and cannot be, insensible to the position in which we have been placed, as far as concerns the progress in general legislation. I cannot help feeling that we have proposed measures, in the course both of last session and the present, in respect to which that progress had not been made which we think might have been made, and which, not having been made, leaves us certainly in no enviable position. I do not pretend to blame either side of the House for this; but the fact cannot be denied. We must, therefore, consequently expect the same results at the close of the present session which were witnessed at the end of the last, namely, that we had presented measures connected with the internal policy of the government to the consideration of parliament, and had not been successful in obtaining its consent. We cannot, also, conceal from ourselves, that, in respect to some of the measures we have proposed, and which have been supported, they have not met with that cordial assent and agreement from those for whose character and opinions we entertain the highest and sincerest respect. But I am bound to say, speaking here of them with perfect respect, that we cannot invite their co-operation and support upon the present occasion, by holding out expectations that we shall take a middle or another course with regard to those measures which we believe to be best for the interests of the country and consistent with justice. We must continue to propose and to support those measures. Nevertheless, we regret that our measures have not been deemed entitled to support; and we deeply regret the forfeiture of that confidence which is necessary for the credit of a government, and which has not been so exemplified upon the motion of my hon. friend as it should be; not that there should be a servile acquiescence in all our plans, nor that we should receive indiscriminate support, but, at least, there should be given to us ability to proceed with those measures of legislation which we believe important to the public good. Our business should be to maintain and protect the great existing interests of the country, at the same time administering in them such improvements as we think compatible with their maintenance, and necessary for the purpose of ensuring their general efficiency. We have thought it desirable to relax the system of commercial protection, and admit into competition with articles of the domestic produce of this country, articles from foreign lands. We have attempted to counsel the enforcement of principles which we believe to be founded in truth, with every regard for existing institutions, and every precaution to prevent embarrassment and undue alarm, and we feel it necessary to maintain the laws which preceding parliaments have passed; and we will not conceal that in respect to our ecclesiastical institutions, our intentions appear to have been defeated in the House of Lords in regard to one measure, which, though it may be considered an isolated one, is still a very important one. (But, though I cannot conceal all this, I shall deeply regret it, if we have forfeited the confidence of those who have given us so truly and honourably their support. But I cannot ask for it by encouraging expectations which we are not prepared to realize. We think the course we took the right one; that a gradual, safe, and circumspect relaxation of the sugar duties, which would have prevented undue competition in the domestic produce of this country, was the best. We cannot profess any repentance; we cannot declare our conversion to a different principle. We are prepared to abide by the engagements we have made and the principles we profess; and the same course of gradual improvement is the course we must continue to pursue; and I think it necessary to make this declaration at a period when important consequences may be the result of the ultimate decision of the House on the subject.

On the question that clause 10 be the preamble of the bill, Mr. Duncombe objected to the words "have freely and voluntarily resolved," &c., and moved that they be omitted.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, considering the opportunities which the hon. gentleman has had of maturely considering this question, and the very peremptory manner in which he has pronounced his judgment, not only upon those on whom perhaps he has a right to pronounce a judgment,—that is to say, upon the right hon. gentlemen who sit immediately behind him,—but upon gentlemen also upon this side of the House, I think he ought—assuming the judicial character—also to have made himself better acquainted with the facts of the case. The hon. gentleman says it was the proposal of her Majesty's government to give a protective duty of 20s. to British colonial sugar. Now, that was not the proposal of her Majesty's government. The proposal of her Majesty's government was to give a protective duty of 10s. But the gentlemen opposite who supported me never proposed to give a protective duty of 14s.—that was not the proposal of the hon. gentlemen who sit behind the hon. member for Finsbury—that was the proposal of the hon. member for Bristol; and if her Majesty's government had made that proposal the hon. gentlemen who supported her Majesty's government would probably have concurred with the hon. member in peremptorily rejecting that proposal. The hon. gentleman, then, is manifestly incompetent to pass a judgment, and he is so because he has not thought it worth his while to make himself acquainted with the facts of the case, which I really thought, until I heard him speak, were not unknown to one single member of this House, considering the lengthened debate we have had and the great importance of those facts; and I doubt whether the country will not be disposed to find fault a little with those who show such utter ignorance of the facts, and yet venture to pronounce so peremptory a judgment as the hon. member. The hon. gentleman supposes it to be a degradation for the House of Commons in matters relating to commerce and finance, upon one night, after receiving a full explanation of the subject ["Hear" and laughter]—yes, after receiving a full explanation of the subject, to reverse its decision of a previous night. But I shall have the hon. gentleman's vote to-morrow at any rate. [Mr. Duncombe: What about?] Well, now I am going to tell the hon. gentleman why he is not aware of what has passed to-night. I forgive him his ignorance of what passed the other night, but he really ought to know what has occurred to-night. The right hon. gentleman the late president of the board of trade, expressed this evening a strong opinion that he would be able to persuade the House to reverse a vote of three previous nights. He said, "No doubt I shall be able to show you that the principle of discrimination between free sugar and slave-labour sugar is altogether untenable, and that to-morrow night you will negative the principle altogether." But on Monday, the 3rd of June, it was resolved, upon discussing a motion of the noble lord the member for London, to recognise the principle of discrimination. The noble lord proposed, towards raising the necessary supplies for defraying her Majesty's public expenses, that, instead of the present duty, 34*s.* a cwt. should be charged upon all brown Muscovado or clayed sugar, from what country soever it came, and that motion was negatived by a majority of 197 to 128. The whole of the subsequent proceedings with regard to this subject have been founded upon the proposition that the decision which the House then came to in negativing that proposal was a just one. Yet the right hon. gentleman or the hon. member for Montrose, perhaps on his recommendation, will propose to-morrow night to reverse all that it has been doing, and by so reversing its proceeding abolish all discrimination between sugar the produce of slave-labour and sugar the produce of free-labour, and place the two upon exactly the same footing. I can only say, if the hon. member carries his proposal, that it will be a complete reversal of the whole of our proceedings; and if those proceedings have been wrong, it will be a very proper reversal. But can I give a greater proof that in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite there is no insult to this House in making a proposal to reverse a former decision, and no degradation in acquiescing in it, than that given by the right hon. gentleman himself when he rises in his place and very distinctly declares that he shall to-morrow vote for a perfect reversal of all our proceedings, and that he has a very confident expectation that he shall succeed in his object? I stated the other night no doubt that this was not a mere question between 20*s.* and 24*s.*; but I said that a reversal of our proposal would materially interfere with our commercial and financial policy. I stated the reasons for the government proposal, and distinctly said that we could not act up to our desires with regard to free and slave-grown sugar next year unless this year we gave some sign of what it was our intention to do. I stated that to the House upon Monday. It had not been stated before, and I stated it then to show that it was not a mere question between 24*s.* and 20*s.*, but that it was, in point of fact, a highly important question, having a considerable bearing upon our future proceedings; but it is quite new to me to hear that in matters of this nature it is a degradation to reverse our decisions. I recollect Lord Althorp in a much more important matter than this—with regard to the malt tax—when the House had decided upon the repeal of half that tax, came down to this House and stated to the House that important financial questions were involved in the decision, and asked the House to reverse that decision to which it had come; and I recollect that the House did, at the request of Lord Althorp, so reverse its decision—and I cannot concede to you the use or necessity of the various stages through which every bill must pass, unless we are at liberty in a subsequent stage to amend our proceedings in a previous stage. I must, however, grant that I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the fairness of the construction which he has put upon the words I used upon the occasion to which he referred. I have been represented as saying with respect to other bills also, that her Majesty's government expect complete acquiescence in every proposal we may make. The hon. gentleman put a right construction on what I did say. I never gave utterance to so arrogant a sentiment. With regard to the Welsh bishoprics, I never stated that her Majesty's government expected acquiescence in their views; but I did say that it was with regret her Majesty's government found that their proposal was not approved of. With regard to the question of factory labour and the Dissenters' chapels bill, I found with great pain that the course of the government met with opposition on the part of many hon. friends of mine, who had given generally a strenuous and generous support to the government. I stated, I think, also that there were other measures which would be brought under the consideration of the House on which probably the same differences would prevail. I expressed my warmest acknowledgment for the generous support which the government had received upon former occasions from them; in asking their support, however, upon that occasion I did say that the government could not consent to purchase it by an abandonment of the great principles which they had avowed, and to which they were determined to adhere. I stated that with all deference and respect to them and to the House. I did, no doubt, mean to indicate with respect to this question that I did think it materially interfered with our financial and commercial arrangements, and I did probably intimate what might be the possible consequence of a withdrawal of support. I thought it fair to do so. I knew I should have been taunted if I had said nothing about it, and had concealed my real opinions, and therefore I asked for their support—not because this was a question between 20s. and 24s., but because I thought it would amount to an indication that the House of Commons disapproved of our proposals with respect to the sugar duties. I doubted whether it would not be equivalent to a disapproval of the principles upon which we were about to act—of discrimination between slave-grown sugar and free-labour sugar; and I thought it did amount to an indication of that want of confidence which ought to be followed beyond a doubt by such a result as want of confidence pointed to. Those were exactly the expressions which I used, and by which I must abide; but I totally disclaim the intention or the fact of having stated that with respect to every measure introduced by the government we expected the votes of our general supporters, and insisted upon the complete adoption of all our measures. Those conclusions have been stated for the purpose of dissatisfying my hon. friends behind me; but I do hope that my hon. friends—[Laughter from the opposition]—yes, I say hon. "friends," for I must say that no man speaking of general measures ever received greater proofs of confidence than I have received,—I do hope that my hon. friends will not be deceived by the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman has referred for the purpose of promoting dissension not only upon this, but amongst gentlemen upon his own side of the House. It is perfectly right for the hon. gentleman to quarrel with his own side of the House, but I trust that the hon. gentleman will not attempt to sow dissension amongst us, but that he will allow us to remain united as we are, and I have no doubt we shall remain so. All that the hon. gentleman will have gained from the present proceeding will be—first, to prove that he has not made himself master of the facts of the case; and, secondly, the inutility of attempting to foment the disunion amongst those who are opposed to him.

The amendment was withdrawn; the preamble agreed to; and the House resumed. Bill to be reported.

ABOLITION OF THE CORN-LAWS.

Mr. Villiers moved a series of resolutions having reference to the total and immediate abolition of the Corn-laws.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I can very sincerely assure hon. members that it is not my intention to occupy much of their time upon an occasion when this House has been engaged for the benefit of a company which generally performs at Covent-garden. It is with great reluctance that I do any thing having the least tendency to prevent their enjoying a full benefit, and I must say I was very sorry to observe that during the early part of the performance the front bench on the other side of the House was wholly unoccupied. Of those places, there was not a single occupant until the gallant Admiral took his seat there; and even he was for a considerable time left alone in the occupation of that bench. I can assure the hon. members opposite—many of whom assisted at my benefit the other night—that I had no desire to be the cause of depriving them of a fuller audience. Throughout the evening, I have been here, as well as my hon. friends near me, to witness the performances of that class of gentlemen now present who have rehearsed their parts upon another stage. We have been here the whole of the evening, and we could not help listening with some surprise to the allusion made on the other side to the speech of my hon. friend the member for Northamptonshire. It was too much to say that a considerable portion of the time which my hon. friend took in delivering that speech was spent without his making any reference to the main question. It would seem as if the hon. member for Stockport would, if he had an opportunity, have advised my hon. friend to apply himself more closely to the main question. I cannot help wishing that he had given that advice to the hon. member for Wolverhampton. The House cannot have forgotten that the hon. gentleman who came forward and who gave the tone to our deliberations, who, in fact, was the leading performer, took precisely the same course which the hon. member for Wolverhampton complains against my hon. friend for having pursued. The hon. member for Wolverhampton addressed the House for the space of three hours and a half; one hour and a-half of which period was devoted to the production of newspaper reports of speeches delivered at meetings of agriculturists. The hon. member who spoke last should recollect that his own leader is the author of this practice; and if the example of the hon. member for Wolverhampton be followed at this side of the House, the hon. member for Stockport is the last that ought to complain of it. He is the last that ought to complain if my hon. friends at this side of the House came prepared with documents to remind their opponents of what they may have said respecting this question on former occasions. Now, Sir, I was very glad to see the second topic adverted to by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman delivered a homily against the practice of calling names. Well, it's a very bad practice, but it happens that those who are the most lavish in their attacks upon others, and in throwing imputations upon the motives of others, are very often those who shrink the most from the application of a similar instrument to themselves, notwithstanding the readiness with which they denounce the system of calling names and imputing motives. Sir, I think if there be any party in this House who deal largely in the practice of affixing odious imputations to the motives of those from whom they dissent as to political measures, it is that very party of which the hon. gentleman is so distinguished a member. I don't defend the practice, but the example provokes retaliation. They are exposed to attacks of which they first set the example, and then they are the first to declare that the practice of the calling of names ought to be dismissed from legislative argument, and the first to beg that for the future it might be discontinued. As they set the example of the practice, I hope they will set the example of its discontinuance. The hon. gentleman says, "How is the Anti-Corn-law league to be defeated?" Sir, I believe that they have greatly diminished their own power by the use of the instrument which they have employed. I believe that they have provoked on the part of the tenantry of this country the utmost indignation, from their use of unjust imputation, and from the practice of attributing base, selfish, and interested motives to hon. members. I believe they have provoked that indignation which has led to the combination against their proceedings. But a very short time since those hon. gentlemen boasted that, whatever the landlords might think, the whole of the tenantry and labourers were ranged on their side. I apprehend, and I infer it from that very mitigated tone which they have assumed during the progress of this debate, that they have discovered that they have overstepped the limits within which it would have been prudent to confine themselves, and that they have used instruments which have recoiled against, and in no small measure injured themselves. The hon. gentleman next calls our attention to the particular motion of which notice has been given, and he says, that we must not, and shall not escape from its discussion. But it appears from the speech of the hon. gentleman, that the question now under discussion is the total and immediate abrogation of all protection in every shape on agriculture and manufactures. Well, but if that be the question, why has not notice been given to that effect? Nothing would have been more easy, if that were the intention of the motion, than that the hon. gentleman, the member for Wolverhampton, should have given a distinct notice of a motion to the effect, that every duty imposed on the import of every article, which duty is not intended for purposes of revenue, but which operates by way of protection—that every duty on every article partaking of that character of protection shall be at once abolished. That is not the motion of which the hon. gentleman gave notice. The motion of which the hon. gentleman gave notice is simply this,—“That from the date of the passing of this resolution, protection to one particular department of industry, that is to say, agriculture, shall at once cease and determine.”

What he intends to do with respect to protection to manufactures we know not; but we do know the meaning of the motion of which he gave notice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cobden) shakes his head. Does he dissent from the character which I am giving to this particular motion? The motion is this:—“That any restriction of the supply of food, having for its object to impede the free purchase of an article upon which depends the subsistence of the community, is indefensible in principle, injurious in operation, and ought to be abolished. That it is therefore expedient that the Act 5th and 6th Victoria, shall be repealed forthwith."

The hon. gentleman afterwards promises that having got that he will proceed to destroy protection on manufactures. I think it would have been more satisfactory, and more in consonance with his own arguments, if he had at least commenced with the removal of protection from those articles concurrently with its removal from corn. Well, I defend protection to agriculture on the principle, and to the extent I am bound to say, to which I have defended it before. I am about to pronounce no new opinions on this subject. I have a strong feeling, that speaking generally—and I am not now speaking of the amount of protection—I shall come to that presently—but, speaking generally, I think the agriculture of this country is entitled to protection, and that it is so entitled to protection from considerations of justice as well as from considerations of policy. I do consider that there are special and peculiar burthens on agriculture. I do believe that that portion of the act which imposes burthens for the relief of the poor, and subjects the profits of trade to those burthens as well as the profits of agriculture, has not, so far as the profits on trade are concerned, been acted on, whilst it has been acted on with respect to the profits of agriculture. I say, on that ground, that I think there are special burthens applicable to agriculture. I think, also, that there are restrictions on the application of capital as concerns agriculture. I think, therefore, that considerations of justice do entitle agriculture to protection. I think that considerations of policy, as far as the general interest of all classes is concerned, justify this protection. I do not think so on account of the special condition of the landlord, but because I believe that great public evil would arise were this motion to be affirmed to-night; and I don't believe that there are ten reflecting and thinking men, not excluding those in the ranks of the anti-Corn-law league even, who are of opinion that if to-morrow morning it were announced that the House of Commons had resolved that on next Monday week all protection should be immediately and suddenly withdrawn from agricultural produce—I don't believe, I say, that there are ten men in this country, even connected with the manufacturing and commercial interest, who imagine that such a precipitate withdrawal of protection would be for the advantage of the general interest of this country. See, if we agree to this motion, what is to follow in its rear! If we are to trust the hon. gentleman, and I am sure I give him every credit for speaking the candid and honest impressions of his mind; but if we are to trust him, all protection is to be removed—that is in respect to all colonial productions—in respect to coffee, and in respect to sugar, one fortnight after, every protection is to be removed. Then, my belief is that, in the present condition of this country, sudden withdrawal of all protection would paralyze commerce, and introduce such general confusion and distress, that so far from the labourers benefiting, they would be involved in the common calamity. The proposal, then, which we have to decide is, whether with respect to the whole of your colonial productions—with respect to the whole of your domestic productions, you shall affirm this resolution, which though it appears to be confined to corn, necessarily involves the removal of every protective duty with respect to every product. I believe that nothing but confusion would arise from such a proceeding. I recollect the time when the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Ellice) made a most vigorous defence of the silk manufacturers in opposing a sudden withdrawal of protection from that interest. Why then, did the hon. gentleman not give his notice in conformity with his intentions? Because he knew, that if he had advocated the removal of protection from every class of manufacture—on colonial produce as well as corn—he would have encountered a more formidable opposition to his motion, and would have even aggravated the majority by which he will be met this evening. I do believe that it is for the interest of all classes of commerce and of manufactures, that we should, in such an artificial state of society as that in which we live, deal very cautiously and dispassionately with the removal of these prohibitions. I believe that the advances you make will be much more sure if they are made without grievously affecting existing interests. I ask you to look at the extent of capital employed in the cultivation of the soil—to look at the population of Ireland, entirely depending on its agricultural produce—to see the amount of the supply of corn obtained from domestic agriculture, at least nine-tenths of the whole quantity consumed, and to look at the condition of the population employed in its culture. I know, according to your strict rigid principles of political economy abstractedly—if we were to forget the condition and circumstances of the country and the interests which have grown up under the long endurance of protection—if we were to speak mathematically of these principles, no doubt they may be true. It may be true that a population from which protection is withdrawn ought to apply itself to other applications; but is that strictly true? If we are not mere philosophers and men of science having to deal with abstract or indefinite quantities, but have to consult the convenience, the comfort, the subsistence of great masses of millions of human beings, are we to disregard those convictions which must be presented for the consideration of the Legislature and of statesmen? I speak not merely of tenants under leases, but of tenants at will, and of the labourers. No doubt, as far as the law is concerned, there are few opportunities for the application of capital to other branches of industry; no doubt it is true, speaking literally and technically, that the labourers in Kerry and Galway, may go and seek for subsistence in Manchester and Coventry. That is all true enough in theory, but false in practice. How can you disturb a man who is far advanced in life, to the age, perhaps, of nearly half a century, whose father and grandfather before him were occupied in agriculture, and who knows nothing else himself? How is he to try this project, if suddenly removing himself from his old occupation and locality to new ones? Why, you would destroy his confidence in the application of his capital to agriculture as before, and you leave him without other modes for employing it. You may rejoice and indulge in these theories of modern philosophy and political economy; but when you have endangered and destroyed the peace and happiness of a nation, you will have but a sorry return for your pains. Looking, then, at the long endurance of the protection, at the amount of capital involved in agriculture, and the position of the population dependent on agriculture, and at the interest not merely of the landlords and tenants, but the comprehensive interests of all classes of the community I must give my solemn and unqualified opposition to this proposal for the immediate removal of the present protection to agriculture. But I will not shrink from the other question—am I prepared, then, as I am opposed to the immediate removal of protection, to bring under the consideration of the House any modified proposition for the altering the amount of protection determined upon two years ago, and carried into effect with the general good will and concurrence of the agricultural interest? I say at once I am not. I am not holding language different from that which my right. hon. friend and myself held at an early period of the session. We said then that we never had it in contemplation, and now we say that we have it not in contemplation, to make any alteration whatever in the Corn-laws. The noble lord the member for the City of London is absent upon this occasion. I regret it; but the noble lord last night declared his intention of not voting against the proposal of the hon. gentleman. Now the hon. gentleman has very fairly called upon us to pronounce, to-night, whether we were for or against a total repeal of the Corn-laws. Nothing could be fairer than the proceedings of the hon. gentleman the member for Wolverhampton. You cannot impute to him that he wants to catch stray votes by a vague motion. He says that he does not want you to go into a vague committee on the Corn-laws, but a committee for the purpose of affirming or negating this resolution, that the present Corn-laws should be repealed, and no others be substituted in their room. Thence arises the difficulty of the noble lord—he is not prepared to vote against that motion; he is not prepared for repeal; for the noble lord thinks agriculture entitled to protection. The noble lord is prepared to give protection to agriculture. On what ground then does he withhold the light of his countenance and the benefit of his address from those hon. gentlemen with whom he is agreed? The noble lord said last night that he found himself in a similar situation to that which I had described the government to be—one of difficulty. No doubt we have met with difficulties as well as other governments. But we have overcome them. We gave our votes; we did not shrink from our difficulties; we did not think we discharged our duty by running away from them. What was the objection to the noble lord's voting against the motion of the hon. gentleman? Because my right hon. friend intends to uphold the existing Corn-laws, he cannot vote with us, though he denounces the proposition of the hon. gentleman. But the noble lord was not always so squeamish. For, the other night, when vindicating himself for voting with gentlemen to whom he was entirely opposed, he said he should not have carried the Reform bill and other measures, if he had not voted in company with those from whose views he dissented, provided only that he concurred with them on a particular subject. But the noble lord does concur with us in disapprobation of a particular vote. He has had an opportunity of explaining the grounds on which he finds his dissent; but he cannot make up his mind to give that vote which his judgment tells him is the proper one. The hon. member for Gateshead is an advocate for a fixed duty, and he intends to vote for the hon. gentleman who has done all he can to repudiate his company. An hon. gentleman who tells him, "I do not invite you to vote with me on any such pretence; for the resolution I mean to move in committee is just as much directed on principle against a fixed duty as it is against the present sliding-scale." The member for Gateshead therefore has no more reason for the vote he is about to give, than the noble lord has for absenting himself upon this occasion. Now, the question between the noble lord and between the government is, as to the policy of making any alteration in the existing Corn-laws. We don't intend to make any alteration. I am speaking of those who admit that there should be protection to agriculture. The more discussion I hear, the more convinced I am that if protection is to be given to agriculture, it is infinitely better to maintain the present law than to attempt to conciliate any support or favour by any slight modification whatever. I think with the hon. gentleman, that is the real practical question:—Is the present law to be maintained totally and entirely without any qualification or modification of it? I declare, that I do not see that any public benefit is to be derived from altering the law, not for the purpose of repeal, but even for the substitution of some such duty as that proposed by the noble lord. It would give no advantage to trade. I do believe, that for the benefit of the trader and the consuming classes, the present law is far better than a fixed duty of 8s. would be. I should infer that, from the noble lord's own argument. I never heard a better argument in favour of a graduated scale of duty in preference to a fixed duty, than I heard from the noble lord last night. He was assigning his reasons why he so decidedly opposed the motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton. The noble lord goes quite as far as I do in objections to the removal of protection to agriculture. The hon. gentleman supposes—which I do not impute to the noble lord—that the noble lord is influenced by his unwillingness to declare for the removal of protection; but the noble lord thinks it more convenient for a gentleman in his eminent political station not to discuss the question as to the amount of protection he would give. This is the language of the hon. gentleman; not mine. The noble lord thinks it more convenient to hold out to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that if the worst came to the worst, they would have a fixed duty to resort to. I don't believe the noble lord was influenced by such a motive. I believe him to be a sincere advocate of protection to agriculture; but he is in favour of a fixed duty in preference to a graduated scale. I should be sorry to impute to the noble lord any language which he did not use, and, therefore, I took it down at the time. He said, "What can you reasonably expect from a sudden revolution?"—that is, from the success of the hon. gentleman—"from a state of considerable protection to one of free-trade? The landlord and tenant would be doubtful how far their capital would be employed with profit." I am afraid they would be doubtful also under a duty of 5s. They would be so uncertain of the effects of a good harvest reducing the price of corn, that I am afraid a fixed duty would not relieve that anxiety which the noble lord said the landlord and tenant would feel as to the application of his capital. The noble lord said there would be a diminution in the employment of labour, and therefore a vast portion of suffering on the part of the poor. The next consequence would be, that there would be a much greater importation of corn into this country than would conduce either to the profits of the merchant or the advantage of the consumer, and therefore he would so frame his law as to guard the merchant from loss in consequence of excessive importations. He said, that so important a change would give rise to extraordinary expectations of profit which would not produce cheapness or plenty; but, a glut which would occasion much distress—That is just what I am afraid of. I am afraid that with a good harvest in this country there would be a great influx of corn under a low fixed duty, which would be great discouragement to agriculture here; because when corn is abundant here, a very small supply will produce a greater effect in the market than is proportionate to the amount of supply, and that discouragement would not be averted by a low fixed duty. I cannot help thinking, that there is more certainty with regard to the application of capital under a graduated scale than under a low fixed duty; for it does not expose agriculturists to the effects of unlimited competition. Therefore, the noble lord, fearing a glut, fearing that the foreign merchant would pour in such a quantity of corn, that he himself would suffer, and that the landlords and tenants would be discouraged—just for those reasons he comes to the conclusion that a law which admits the importation of corn when prices are high, and prohibits it when they are low, is not to be preferred to his own proposition of a fixed duty. It is a remarkable fact, how small a part of this discussion has been appropriated to objections against the existing Corn-law. I heard it repeated again to-night, as it was constantly stated before, and denied by me, that in 1842, I gave to the agriculturist an assurance that the present law would secure to him a price varying from 54s. to 58s.—that was to say, an average price of 56s. Now, how is it possible that hon. gentlemen, if they refer to what I did say, can repeat that assertion? [Mr. Ward: So it was understood.] It was understood! But I must ask hon. gentlemen to look to what I said, and not to what they may have understood. I was told the other night that I made a certain statement respecting the bank; I positively denied it, and hon. gentlemen opposite bore me out in that denial. I did state, that I thought there would be no advantage to the agriculturist to have a higher price than 58s., or to the consumer that it should be lower than 54s. Taking 56s. as the sum assumed to be the average, and that which I thought would constitute a fair remunerating price, I distinctly added (this is not my own report, but the report of an impartial record):—"When I name this sum, however, I must beg altogether to disclaim mentioning it as a pivot or remunerating price, or any inference that the legislature can guarantee the continuance of that price; for I know it to be impossible to effect any such object by legislative enactment. It is utterly beyond your power, and a mere delusion, to say that by any duty, fixed or otherwise, you can guarantee a certain price to the producer. It is beyond the reach of the legislature. In 1835, when you had what some thought was a nominal protection to the amount of 64s., the average price of wheat did not exceed 39s. 8d.; and I again repeat, that it is only encouraging delusion to hold out the hope that this species of protection can be afforded to the agriculturist. To return, however, to the subject, I again say, that nothing can be more vague than to attempt to define a remunerating price."

I therefore appeal to any impartial man, to say whether it is not inconsistent with the fact, to say that I even countenanced the impression that the existing Corn-law would guarantee a price of 56s. When I mentioned 56s. as the average of past years, I stated that corn, as far as the legislature was concerned, might vary between 54s. and 58s.; and referring to former acts, I pointed to the disappointments which had taken place under them, and observed how utterly impossible it was for any legislation to guarantee a particular price to the consumer, it being regulated by circumstances over which the legislature had no control. I do hope, therefore, that hon. gentlemen will in future refer to my statements, and not to that authority, high though it be, to whose lucubrations an hon. gentleman has referred—Mr. George Robins, appraiser and auctioneer. I wish that hon. gentlemen desirous of judging of the present Corn-law, would refer to the debate which took place in 1842, when I introduced it. I wish they would observe the predictions which the opponents of it then made as to the certainty of its injurious effects, and see how far they have been borne out, or whether we ought now to be taunted for not having heeded those predictions. First of all, and the most positive prediction was, that the averages would be lowered 4s. or 5s. by the selection of the new towns. Now, the selection of the new towns has not altered the averages. [Mr. Villiers: they have been lowered.] I beg the hon. member's pardon; if calculated from the new towns in combination with the old towns—although I have not lately looked at the return—I think the result will show that the averages have been rather higher by the incorporation of the new towns than they otherwise would have been, and that the duty has therefore been lower. Another hon. member predicted that the new scale would cause a greater amount of speculation than the old one, inasmuch as the stake being small, the risk would be less. Now, I do not believe that there has been so much speculation under the new as under the old law, or so much holding back of corn in order to pour it into the market when the price by reason of a scarcity had increased. I know that in April, notwithstanding the unfortunate appearance of the weather, no tendency was evinced towards the keeping back of foreign corn, and that in the last month there was imported of wheat alone no less than 80,000 quarters. In an agricultural journal (the Morning Post of Saturday last), giving an account of the existing law, I find these remarkable observations.—“There was a time when we had what were then denominated weather markets at this time of the year, when the value of British grown grain was regulated by the state of the weather—when favourable weather for the crops reduced prices in Mark-lane, and when unfavourable weather produced contrary effects. These good times, both for the producer and also for the consumer, existed, however, before the present Corn-law deprived our farmers of that just and fair degree of protection to their crops, against the competition with it of foreign agricultural produce, in all our great markets of consumption, which had previously been extended to all descriptions of native produce. In Mark-lane, yesterday, the alteration in the state of the weather did not produce any proportionable alteration in the value of home grown wheat, its price continuing to be almost entirely regulated by supply and demand.”

It was declared in 1842, that the present law would favour speculation, and yet now we find that there is no weather price for corn, that the price of corn no longer depends on fluctuations in the weather, but is regulated by supply and demand. Does the hon. member for Stockport recollect his prediction as to the effect the present law would have on the commerce and manufactures of the country? He declared in 1842, that by enacting it we were going from bad to worse, and that nothing could be more delusive than to suppose that any increase in the demand for labour or any revival of commercial prosperity could be at all compatible with its existence. “Don't flatter yourselves,” said the hon. member, “that with such a law there can be a revival of trade, for I can demonstrate to you that such a thing is utterly impossible.” [Mr. Cobden: “Are you quoting me?”] Yes, except that the language which you used was much stronger. The hon. gentleman said that Stockport would become something like a howling wilderness occupied by paupers. I won't say that the hon. member made use of the words “howling wilderness,” but he used expressions pretty nearly tantamount to that in reference to his own town. Nothing, however, could have been more express than his declaration that we were utterly deceived, if we supposed that under such a law as the present there could be any thing like a restoration of commercial prosperity. Now, without meaning to say that 1843 afforded that amount of prosperity I should like to see, yet, comparing it with preceding years, you will find that those declarations, those predictions of 1842, have been completely falsified. The hon. gentleman said in that year that we were not aware of the danger that was impending over us,—that before very long society in the manufacturing districts would be in a state of dissolution. [Mr. Cobden: “And it was so.”] It was so? Well, then, if concurrently with the passing of the present Corn-law, society in the manufacturing districts was in a state of dissolution, I ask you, what is its present condition? Is there not a great improvement in it, and has not the prediction of the hon. member, that the present law would be incompatible with an increase of manufacturing prosperity, been completely falsified? Take the declared value of the cotton manufacture in 1843, as compared with that of 1842, and you will find it to have been £16,200,000, that of 1842 being only £13,900,000. The export of yarn has diminished, but the export of goods in a higher state of manufacture has increased. Earthenware—the hon. gentleman particularly dwelt on the export of earthenware—well, from £555,000 in 1842, the export of earthenware has increased to £649,000. Glass has increased, hardware and cutlery have increased, linon manufactures, silk and woollen manufactures have increased. During the existence of this law, which was said to be fatal, at least, to commercial prosperity, and intended solely for the benefit of agriculture, the export of all the great branches of manufactures has in 1843 greatly increased, as compared with 1842. The noble lord says, take great care of your imports; he draws a great distinction between imports and exports—a distinction which, with all respect for him, I have never been able to understand. I have given, in the case of exports, the declared value; I only give the official value of the imports. But, from the importance the noble lord attaches to imports, he will learn with satisfaction that, whereas the imports of 1842 were in point of official value £65,204,000, under the operation of the Corn-law, they had increased in 1843 to £70,093,000. I am only stating these things for the purpose of showing that the confident predictions that were made with respect to the practical operation of this bill as to the increase of the duty on foreign corn by the lowering of the averages, the increased encouragement to speculation, and its incompatibility with manufacturing and commercial prosperity, have been altogether falsified, and that her Majesty's government have no motive whatever, taken from the experience of the past operation of this bill, now to consent to its change. The noble lord (Lord Howick) the member for Sunderland, in the course of a very able speech last night, appeared to differ from the noble lord, the member for London (Lord J. Russell), and to be prepared to go all lengths in respect to the immediate removal of protection to agriculture; and the noble lord justified his opinions by an appeal to feelings and passions which I cannot but think are extremely dangerous. The noble lord predicting in 1844—as there were predictions in 1842—gave the most confident assurance that if you will repeal the Corn-laws there will be an increased demand for industry; that there will be, so far as legislation is concerned, the immediate restoration of prosperity. Sir, there have been many years during which, under the operation of the Corn-laws, there has been the unrestricted import of foreign corn. During the war, the duty on foreign corn was not in operation; the price of corn was then such, that the trade in corn was perfectly free. I cannot discover that during that period of the free importation of corn, there was a cessation of those privations which, I fear, are inseparable from the artificial state of society, in a great manufacturing country. I have the most confident persuasion, that if you were to repeal the Corn-laws, and permit the most unrestricted import of foreign corn, there would not be that immediate demand for industry on which the noble lord relies. The noble lord says, that the poor man has a right to insist from the legislature for this—that there shall be a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. In my opinion, no legislative enactment you can pass can give a guarantee that that right shall be established. The noble lord wishes to maintain the present constitution of society, he wishes, I apprehend, to maintain in the possession of its privileges the present constituency; but if his opinions were to prevail, my belief is, his expectations would not be realised—my belief is that it is impossible in this or any other country for the legislature to realise that expectation which the noble lord says is a justifiable one, and which the legislature ought to be required to realise—namely, that on all occasions, and under all circumstances, he who tenders a fair day's work shall have a fair day's wages. [Lord Howick: I expressly qualified the remark.] I did not understand the noble lord to qualify the observation. If the noble lord wishes me to proceed on the assumption that he did say so, all I can say is that I fear that great disappointment will arise from the position—that it will be found after the repeal of the Corn-laws there is not that perfect prosperity the noble lord seems to anticipate, and that the parties in their disappointment will revert to him and say, your remedy is imperfect. The importation of foreign corn has not fulfilled your expectations—there is not that demand for industry you anticipated—there is not a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. Now, we come and make use of your arguments and urge on the legislature that right we have. We fortify ourselves by your authority, and demand those further changes which will give us that right. { I believe the noble lord's analogy between the state of new countries like Canada and the United States, and the position of a country like this, is totally inapplicable. I think that reasons could be shown why there is a demand for labour with increased wages in countries circumstanced like Canada, the United States, and New Zealand, which do not apply to an old country with great manufacturing establishments. I look to the United States

—even if I admit the analogy of the noble lord's to be strictly applicable—I look to the writings of recent travellers in the United States, and I find where there are no restrictions on food there still prevails great distress. In New York and in Philadelphia, recent writers have declared that there is the severest suffering on the part of the labouring population. On these grounds, I cannot place confidence in the predictions of the noble lord. I don't believe that the removal of these restrictions will have the effect of so increasing the demand for industry as to realise the expectations of the noble lord, that even the honest and industrious man can at all times command a fair remuneration for his labour. Thanking the House for their indulgence, I shall not now further trespass on their attention. I have attempted to assign the reasons why I totally dissent from the proposal of the hon. gentleman with respect to the absolute repeal of all protection; why, without adopting any new opinion for the present occasion, I give my preference to the principle of the bill of 1842, over the principle of the noble lord, who is an advocate for protection; and why I repeat that declaration I made at the commencement of the session, on the part of the government, that we do not intend, and have not intended, to diminish the protection which the existing Corn-laws give to agriculture.

The motion was negatived by a majority of 204.

SLAVE TRADE.

JULY 16, 1844.

Viscount Palmerston concluded a most eloquent speech by moving an Address for "A return, showing the total number of African Negroes landed for the purposes of slavery on the islands and on the continent of America, from the year 1815 to the year 1843, both inclusive," &c.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I could hardly have inferred from the modest terms in which the notice of the noble lord who has just sat down is worded, that it would have afforded him an opportunity for making the rhetorical display in which he has just indulged—a more harmless motion than that which I read on the notices of this day I can hardly conceive. The noble lord calls for, "A Return, &c." [The right hon. baronet read the motion.] Why, really, Sir, a more innocuous motion never yet was made in this House, and it reminds me of the course pursued by the noble lord in former sessions, when, after a period of comparative inactivity, he was wont to come down to this House not for the purpose of stimulating or inviting ministers to activity, but in order to deliver a factious speech in making a motion to which the most captious minister could not raise the slightest objection. I recollect that at the early part of the session the noble lord exhibited some inclination to deliver the speech which the House has just heard. I give him credit for the extent and fidelity of his memory. Having, so long ago as the 11th of March, entertained this intention, the noble lord has, notwithstanding the multitude and variety of public business that has intervened been the present time and that period, not only retained the recollection of his motion, but also the very words in which it was put forward. The noble lord had, at the date I have referred to, a motion on the paper, which was of importance. On the 11th of March, I find a notice of motion—"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, representing that this House, sharing the deep abhorrence with which the people of this country regard the slave-trade, most earnestly beseech her Majesty not to consent to any alteration or modification of any of the treaties now in force between her Majesty and Foreign States, for the suppression of the slave-trade, which by weakening the means which those treaties now afford for the prevention of that piratical offence, might tend to render more easy the perpetration of that detestable crime."

Now, the object which this motion was framed to effect was, I admit, most important; it was nothing less than to ask the House of Commons to request her Majesty to reject all proposals for the modification of the treaty relative to the slave-trade between this country and France. The noble lord wished the House of Commons, by the expression of its opinion, to restrain the exercise of the Queen's prerogative; but the noble lord had met with very little sanction to such an attempt on the part of those who generally act with him. The noble lord himself seemed to shrink from his own attempt. Week after week of the session passed over and the noble lord postponed his motion as they passed, always promising to bring it forward, but as often shrinking from the fulfilment of his promise, as he observed amongst those around him symptoms of the disapprobation with which his course was viewed. The noble lord persevered in renewing his notice, till at length the noble lord was fortunately relieved from his notice by the House being counted out on the night when he was to have brought it forward, that very circumstance being sufficiently indicative of the opinion which his own immediate friends and supporters entertained of the motion. The noble lord, I must confess, appeared to me to be greatly relieved when he was thus extricated from the dilemma in which he had placed himself; for, notwithstanding the perseverance with which he constantly renewed the notice of his motion, he had the good sense to abstain from bringing it forward at last. At the same time the noble lord was unwilling to lose the speech which he had prepared for the occasion; and he has now, in my opinion, pursued a much wiser course by not provoking the opinion of the House in opposition to the royal prerogative, while we have reaped all the advantages which we should then have derived from listening to the noble lord. I shall, in dealing with this question, separate all those parts of the noble lord's speech in which he refers to the slave-trade, from those parts of it in which he has indulged in reflections on her Majesty's government. It is most important that upon those points on which men of all parties cordially concur, we should express that concurrence in a way that cannot be mistaken, and that we should not permit our party or political differences to affect the weight and authority which we may carry when there is a common concurrence upon such a question as that of the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade. In all the first part of the speech of the noble lord, I most cordially concur. I do believe that this is the most iniquitous traffic that was ever carried on; that it engenders more misery—that it stimulates more crime—than any public act ever committed by any nation, however regardless of the laws of God or man. I do not believe that the noble lord has the slightest wish to exaggerate; but I think the noble lord has perhaps rather overrated the number of slaves landed upon the coast of America at the different periods to which he has referred. Possibly I may differ from him on the point that the number of slaves amounted to 150,000. Perhaps it might rather be estimated at 100,000. But, however that might be, if my estimate be more correct than that of the noble lord, I still fully concur with him, that the number landed is no test whatsoever of the misery inflicted upon the people of Africa by the continuance of the slave-trade. I do not believe that the noble lord overrates the number sacrificed in the attempt to gain property in the blood and sinews of these unfortunate men. In what light I ask must we exhibit ourselves to these savage nations—what must they conceive of the doctrines and precepts of that common religion which we profess, when Europeans descend to become parties in this iniquitous traffic? And that I consider to be one of the great evils attendant upon the slave-trade, that it is an impediment to the diffusion and spread of Christianity; for surely savage people never can believe those men to be really impressed with the truths of the religion they profess, when they can be parties to the infliction of so much human misery as that which is the consequence of the perpetration of these crimes. I say too, with the noble lord, and it ought to be known, that there are two countries, and two only, which are now mainly responsible for the continuance of those crimes. There is on the part of every civilized country, with the exception of these two, a desire to co-operate in the suppression of the trade in man. If Spain and Brazil would zealously apply themselves to the suppression of the slave-trade in those parts of the world within which they can exercise jurisdiction, my opinion is that the slave-trade might be, and would be suppressed. France, Portugal, and also Denmark—to her honour be it spoken, she led the way; she set the example—the United States, this country, Russia, Prussia, Austria, every power is ready to co-operate in the suppression of the slave-trade. But whilst these two countries oppose themselves to the abrogation of that traffic, no effectual progress can be made in abolishing it. The public guilt is upon their heads, who derive a profit from this trade, and who are therefore unwilling to suppress it. It can be shown that these two, Spain and Brazil, are the only countries which lend their sanction to the trade, and are the only two who derive a profit from it. They have the power of suppressing the trade, and without their assistance it will be almost impossible to suppress it. Whatever the exertions we may make, whatever the zeal and gallantry of our officers and men, whatever the sacrifices we may impose upon the people of this country for the accomplishment of the object, it is almost impossible for us, nearly unaided as we are in active exertions, to suppress the trade on the coasts of Brazil and Cuba. But we can do much, we have done much, though perfect success we cannot hope for without the co-operation of Spain and Brazil. Whatever may be the public burthens we are willing to incur, we are constantly counteracted and defeated by the connivance and evasions of the local authorities. It would be easy to show that Spain and Brazil might, if they chose, suppress the trade. Brazil made the effort in 1840 and 1841, and the effect was immediate during the period that the government of Brazil and the authorities acting under the direction of that government did actively interfere, and did discourage this traffic. During that period there was a great diminution in the number of slaves imported into Brazil. With respect to Cuba, the experience of the last two years proved conclusively that if an honest and active governor were in earnest to set his face against the slave-trade, he would, notwithstanding all the excitement to its encouragement which avarice and love of gain interpose, be successful in its ultimate abolition. I do think that the gallant officer who recently administered the affairs of Spain, I mean General Espartero, deserves, together with the government of which he was so distinguished a member, the utmost credit for the efforts which were made to carry the law against the slave-trade into effect. He appointed an officer, who proved to be a most honourable man, to take the command of the Island of Cuba—General Valdez—who refused to participate in the gains which his predecessors had shared with the slave-traders, and who also called all the planters and merchants before him, in order to acquaint them with the orders of his government, and of his determination to discourage the continuance of that trade. General Valdez adhered most strictly to this determination as long as he administered the government of Cuba, and the result, I am informed upon the highest authority, was most extraordinary and satisfactory. During the year 1842, when that officer was at Cuba, the importation of slaves did not exceed 3,100, it having been 14,000, in the first year that General Valdez was governor of the island. In the second year of his government, the number was reduced 8,000, and in the year 1842 it had fallen, as I before stated, to 3,100. I have thus shown that when the government of the Brazils in 1841 acted honestly and exerted itself to suppress the slave-trade, the effort was successful; and that when the same determination was manifested by the Spanish government, an honest governor acting on its instructions was able to suppress it most effectually in Cuba. These instances furnish, in my opinion, decisive proofs that without the authority of those governments being interposed for the purpose of putting an end to this traffic, success is totally impossible, and that with their concurrence the trade may be speedily and effectually put down. I, therefore, without hesitation, charge the governments of Spain, and of the Brazils, with being the sole abettors and encouragers of this crime among all the Christian powers of the world, and with being exclusively responsible for the sufferings it causes. I do most earnestly hope that the governments and people of those two countries will, with that regard which is due to their professions of Christianity, feel the grievous responsibility that now rests upon them: that they will consider themselves to be under the eyes of all Europe, and that they are now the only nations calling themselves Christians amongst whom this crime still prevails. But, if higher considerations will not sway them, and if by such motives as those which I have urged the people of Spain and the Brazils will not abstain from this inhuman traffic; if, I repeat, motives of gain are found to prevail over the dictates of justice and humanity amongst them; then let me warn those who persist in this course of the crimes which they are committing, and of the retribution which is certain to follow upon such offences against God and man. Let me remind them of the examples which have been recently afforded of slaves rising in insurrection, let me warn the government of Spain of the condition of Cuba, where the tenure of power over slaves is more than precarious—where those unhappy beings have been known to declare that death even was preferable to the intolerable evils of slavery—where the application of torture to those who had rebelled had only elicited the confession that slavery itself was the state to which they were irrevocably opposed. The feelings which prompted them to rebel were not those of dissatisfaction at any particular law, or at being obliged to perform a certain amount of labour, or at having to move from one place to another, but the total denial on their part of the right of one man to hold another in slavery, a sentiment which it is stated is now spreading throughout a slave population that exceeds in number those who hold them in slavery. They are animated, it is said, by a determination to emancipate themselves, and the most determined amongst them, and the most active are, those who have been most recently brought from Africa, and who, though entirely uneducated, and unable to form a general combination, are smarting under the pangs which they had endured in being torn from their homes and their families. They have communicated the sentiments which I have described to their fellow-sufferers, a great impulse has been given to the negro mind, and if higher and purer motives fail to influence the governments of Spain or the Brazils, those of interest and policy must force themselves on consideration. What I am now stating is the truth and nothing but the truth, with respect to the state of the slave population in Cuba, and the feelings which I have described to exist there, are only repressed by the military, and by the extreme rigour of the law, which is enforced and sustained in a manner which I shall not here stop to detail, but which only confirms my impression with respect to the future. I therefore, viewing all these circumstances, think it right to make this appeal, in the face of the British parliament, to those two nations who are now alone responsible for the continuance of the traffic, and I make this appeal, but more on consideration of duty and of submission to the declared will of that Great Being, whom they in common with ourselves forget to worship, than on considerations of sound policy and enlightened self-interest. I trust I have said enough to show that public men in this country are not disinclined when they approach this great question, but that on both sides of this House we are alike the organs of public opinion in England. That public opinion reacts upon other parts of the world, and being thus expressed, must add to the difficulty and danger that attend the prosecution of the traffic in slaves. I now approach the consideration of the very invidious contrast which the noble lord has thought proper to draw between the conduct of the present government and of the Cabinet of which he was a member. Whatever difference there may ultimately be proved to exist between the lines of conduct respectively pursued by us with regard to this important subject, there is none to be found in our principles; and, whatever may be the accusations against me of the noble lord, I shall certainly not deny him the credit which is due to the efforts made by him to induce other countries to join this in making an attempt to suppress the slave-trade. I am, however, fully prepared to defend the acts of government in this respect also. The great ground upon which the noble lord's strictures were based was, the conduct of the government in regard to the last treaty entered into with France in 1841 for the suppression of the slave-trade. In the year 1838, France concurred with this country as to the policy of inviting the other European states to unite in suppressing the slave-trade, and of inducing them to join in a common league for this purpose. France was, at that time, willing to concede the right of search. No objection was offered by her on the score of national honour. We call upon France to make no sacrifice, in this respect, which we were not prepared as a nation to concede to a much greater extent. France must admit we had no motive in suppressing the Slave-trade except a sense of public duty, and that no country could suffer more, if considerations of national dignity were to interpose, on account of the extent of our marine, and consequently the greater frequency of the visits to which we must be subjected. France, therefore, did give, not a reluctant, but a cordial assent to the proposal to enter into a common league, and for the right of search. The noble lord said the treaty was made ready for signature, and was signed on the part of the French government by the representative of that government having full authority; there was no allegation that that representative had exceeded his power; and certainly, under the ordinary rules which governed transactions of this description, we had a fair right to expect that a treaty so signed would have been ratified. So far as the King of the French and the government of France were concerned, I believe every honest effort was made to fulfil that expectation. But certain feelings of national pride did oppose themselves to the ratification of that treaty, and for raising those feelings I hold the
